JARDINE v. CITY OF PASADENA et al., and three other cases. (L. A. 8186.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1).

Erection of isolation hospital in residential district by city held not such private nuisance that finding of trial court thereon supported by evidence would be determinative.

2. Constitutional law 🔑278(1).

Erection of isolation hospital in residential district held not in violation of Fourteenth Amendment.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑597.

Police power of city in respect to establishment and maintenance of isolation hospital is subject only to control of general laws.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑597.

Under Const. art. 11, § 11, and Pasadena City Charter, art. 1, § 3, subds. 6 and 20, location, establishment, and maintenance of isolation hospital was within police power of city.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑597.

Under Pasadena City Charter, art. 8, § 10, legislative body of city has power of protecting public health.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1).

Legislative body of city, in adopting ordinance fixing location of isolation hospital, was exercising legislative function.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑122(2).

Every intendment is to be indulged in, and all doubts resolved in favor of, validity of ordinance fixing location of isolation hospital.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1).

Determination of facts by legislative body of city which warrant its action will not be set aside or disregarded by court, unless clearly and palpably wrong.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑597.

Evidence held to sustain finding of city legislative body as to proper selection of site for isolation hospital.

10. Nuisance 🔑3(8).

Hospital constructed and maintained for treatment of contagious and infectious diseases is not "nuisance per se."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Nuisance per se.]

11. Nuisance 🔑4.

Erection of isolation hospital will not be restrained as nuisance on mere fear of danger of infection to surrounding premises.

12. Nuisance 🔑33.

Evidence as to danger of infection held insufficient to support finding that isolation hospital in residential district would constitute private nuisance.

13. Municipal corporations 🔑601.

Municipality has right to amend its zoning ordinance as new and changing conditions warrant and require such revision.

14. Municipal corporations 🔑601.

Erection of hospital will not be enjoined as violating zoning ordinance prohibiting erection of hospitals, which was repealed by ordinance fixing location of hospital.

15. Municipal corporations 🔑996—City will not be restrained from using property purchased for waterworks for location of hospital.

City will not be restrained from using property for isolation hospital because purchased with part of proceeds from bond issue for acquisition of water system under Pasadena City Charter, art. 1, § 3, where purchase price of property was transferred to waterworks bond fund.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul Burks, Judge.

Separate suits by John E. Jardine, by the Pasadena Orange Growers' Association, by Morris Cohn and others, and by E. Fleur and others, against the City of Pasadena and others. Decree for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

James H. Howard and R. R. Hess, both of Pasadena, for appellants.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil, Walter K. Tuller, and Norman S. Sterry, all of Los Angeles. for respondents.

LENNON, J. A rehearing was granted in this case, in response to a petition in which it was strenuously urged by respondents that the action of a legislative body was conclusive only with reference to public rights, and that when a question of private rights was involved jurisdiction was vested in the trial court in the first instance to determine whether private rights had been invaded, and the finding of the trial court, if supported by evidence, was controlling upon the appellate court.

Two fundamental questions were involved in the present controversy: (1) Did the establishment of the isolation hospital constitute a private nuisance with reference to respondents? and (2) Was the action of the legislative body in fixing and establishing a certain block of land as a suitable site for the construction and maintenance of an isolation hospital clearly and palpably arbitrary and unreasonable?

In the former opinion this court held in effect that, if the appellate court upon a review of the record found evidence which warranted a finding that the action of the legislative body was not arbitrary and unreasonable, the action of the legislative body must be upheld.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[1, 2] Respondents, however, insist that the objection that the isolation hospital constituted a private nuisance raised a question of private rights, that private rights could only be determined by a judicial tribunal, and that the finding of the trial court relative to those private rights, if supported by the evidence, is determinative of the entire controversy. Respondents in this behalf also invoke the aid of the Fourteenth Amendment. In short, it is respondents' contention that the private rights of the individuals involved are paramount and controlling in the instant case. With this contention we cannot agree.

[3] It must be conceded that the establishment and maintenance of the isolation hospital was an exercise of the police power of the city. And in this respect the police power of the city is as broad as that possessed by the Legislature itself, subject only to the control of general laws. Odd Fellows' Cem. Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 230, 73 P. 987. Almost invariably in cases of the exercise of the police power both public and private rights are involved. And it is almost inevitable, since the very foundation of the police power is the control of private interests for the public welfare, that the public rights will come into conflict with private rights. As public rights are enlarged, private rights are diminished; as private rights are enlarged, public rights are diminished. The mere fact, therefore, that private rights are involved cannot make these rights the controlling factor in the controversy between public benefit and private rights. If private rights were the controlling factor the result would be that almost every attempted exercise of the police power would be rendered nugatory by the fact that private rights had been interfered with. For instance, the exercise of the police power as exemplified by zoning ordinances sometimes depreciates the value of private property, not only in a monetary sense, but in the sense that it deprives the owner of his freedom to use his property as he sees fit. Yet it cannot be said that, in a case involving the validity of a zoning ordinance, the question of private rights is controlling. In that case the determinative factor is whether or not the regulations prescribed by the zoning ordinances are or are not reasonable and for the promotion of the general welfare.

It is of course unnecessary to say that the cases cited from other jurisdictions are of value only by reason of their persuasive force, and need not therefore be distinguished and discussed. The case of Bloom v. City and County of San Francisco, 64 Cal. 503, 3 P. 129, involved the defective and improper sewerage of a city and county hospital. The decision that the city and county of San Francisco was liable for damages has, of course, no application to the instant case, where the nuisance complained of is not the improper conduct of the isolation hospital, but its establishment and maintenance at all on the site chosen. The cases of Sullivan v. Royer, 72 Cal. 248, 13 P. 655, 1 Am. St. Rep. 51, and Strong v. Sullivan, 180 Cal. 331, 181 P. 59, 4 A. L. R. 343, involved the effect of a grant by the city of a permission to an individual to do a certain act or to carry on a certain business. In these cases it was properly held that the permission by the city did not carry with it the authorization to the individual to commit a nuisance. Of course, rules applicable to public grants of privileges to private parties can have no pertinency to a case where the government itself seeks by appropriate means to accomplish for the public benefit any of the objects confided to its jurisdiction. 2 Wood on Nuisance (3d Ed.) p. 1097. The case of Fisher v. Zumwalt, 128 Cal. 493, 61 P. 82, involved the distinction between a public and a private nuisance, as did also the case of Lind v. City of San Luis Obispo, 109 Cal. 340, 42 P. 437. In the case of People v. City of Reedley, 66 Cal. App. 409, 226 P. 408, the appellate court found that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court that there was no nuisance, and hence anything which was said relative to the power of the state board of health to authorize a nuisance was not essential to the decision. Moreover, the discussion does not have any relevancy to the exercise of the police power of a municipality. It concerns itself with the effect of a certificate by a state board of health, and held that the securing of a permit by the city to dispose of its sewage in a certain way was merely the fulfilling of a prerequisite prescribed by the board of health, and that the granting of the certificate did not grant immunity to the city, if in fact that method of disposal consituted a nuisance. In short, the requirement of a certificate from the state board of health was in effect a regulation of the conduct of the city for the better health protection of the citizens of the state, and it was held, and properly so, that it was such a regulation and was not intended as an authorization for conduct which, despite the regulation, would be harmful to others. It is apparent from a reading of the decision that the question of sanitation involved was already covered by state regulations, and no question of the right of the city under its police power was raised or decided. Indeed, in none of the cases cited by respondents was the question of the police power of the city raised or discussed. They are all, therefore, distinguishable from the instant case upon that one fact alone.

We are satisfied in the main with the opinion as originally rendered, which, with certain amendments, reads as follows:

"These are appeals from separate judgments rendered and entered in four separate and distinct actions. The several actions were, for the purposes of trial, consolidated by stipulation of the parties, and the appeals come to this court upon a single record. The facts are substantially the same in each of the four cases. The city of Pasadena, by Ordinance No. 2176, fixed and established a certain block of land owned by and situate in said city as a suitable site for the construction and maintenance of an isolation hospital under the direction of the health department of said city. The several suits were instituted by the several plaintiffs, who were the owners of property adjacent to the block selected as the site for and upon which the isolation hospital was being erected, to enjoin the construction and maintenance of said hospital.

"The grounds upon which the plaintiffs sought an injunction are these: (1) The location and maintenance of the isolation hospital in the particular place selected by the city constitutes a nuisance by reason of the fact that (a) it endangers the health, comfort, and well being of the plaintiffs and their families and damages their property; and (b) there is a danger of infection to the underground water supply of the property owners in the vicinity of the hospital by reason of the presence of the hospital and the system of sewage proposed to be used in connection therewith; (2) the city is estopped to maintain an isolation hospital in a district designated by a zoning ordinance of the city as a residence district, which ordinance expressly prohibits the erection of hospitals or sanitariums within such residence district which embraces the site of the isolation hospital; and (3) the property, having been purchased with part of the proceeds of a bond issue voted for the purpose of acquiring and maintaining a waterworks system, cannot be used as the site of an isolation hospital by the city nor for any purpose other than that for which it was originally acquired.

"Judgments were entered in favor of the plaintiffs, declaring the maintenance of said isolation hospital to be a nuisance, and permanently enjoining the defendants from maintaining or using the building erected upon the site in question as an isolation hospital. From those judgments the defendants appeal."

The selection of the hospital site was a matter within the legislative discretion of the board of directors of the city, and, unless in the exercise of that discretion the board acted arbitrarily and unreasonably, their action ought not to be enjoined.

[4] "The location, establishment, and maintenance of such an institution is clearly within the scope of the police power of the city. General police authority to protect the public health is conferred upon the city by section 11 of article 11 of the state Constitution, which provides that 'any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.' In addition, the charter of the city of Pasadena contains the following provision: 'The said city * * * shall have the power * * * to erect, construct and maintain * * * hospitals.' Subdivision 6, § 3, art. 1, of the Charter (Stats. 1901, p. 888). The city is also given charter powers 'to make and enforce all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are deemed expedient to maintain the public peace, protect property, promote the public morals, and preserve the health of the inhabitants of the city.' Subdivision 20, § 3, art. 1, of the Charter (Stats. 1901, p. 890).

[5] "The function of carrying this municipal power into effect is conferred upon the legislative body of the city. Thus the legislative body is vested with authority 'to make and pass all ordinances, resolutions and orders not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, or of the state of California, or to the provisions of this charter, necessary for the municipal government and management of the affairs of the city, for the execution of the powers vested in the city and for carrying into effect the provisions of this charter.' Section 10, art. 8, of the Charter (Stats. 1901, p. 904). It is also given authority 'to pass ordinances upon any other subject of municipal control, or to carry into force or effect any other powers of the municipality.' Section 10, art. 8, of the Charter (Stats. 1901, p. 904).

[7, 8] "Every intendment is to be indulged in, and all doubts resolved in favor of the validity of its action." The legislative determination of the facts which warrant the action of the legislative body will not be set aside or disregarded by the court unless the legislative discretion is clearly and palpably wrong and such appears to be and is found to be the fact from the evidence educed before the trial court. In re Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 P. 427; Stockton v. Stockton, 41 Cal. 147; Ex parte Tuttle, 91 Cal. 589, 27 P. 933; In re Spencer, 149 Cal. 396, 86 P. 896, 117 Am. St. Rep. 137, 9 Ann. Cas. 1105; In re King, 157 Cal. 161, 106 P. 578.

[9] "There is in the record before us ample evidence to sustain the express finding of the legislative body as set forth in the ordinance that the property in controversy is located in an area adapted to use as a site of an isolation hospital. And such evidence also sustains the finding, necessarily implied from the very fact of the enactment of the ordinance, that the health of the persons living in the immediate vicinity will not be endangered by the proper maintenance of the isolation hospital in the particular locality in question, and that there is no danger of infection of the underground water supply from the presence of the hospital and the system of sewage employed therewith. The evidence shows that the hospital is located in a sparsely settled section of the city, upon a tract of land containing 6.225 acres, entirely owned by the city in fee and entirely surrounded by public highways. A substantial fence has been placed about the building. There is no dispute but that the hospital is being constructed in accordance with the best and most modern conception of the practical application of sanitary science and fully and efficiently equipped for the proper conduct of a modern hospital. There is in the evidence the testimony of medical experts to the effect that any possible danger of contagion arising from the presence of an isolation hospital in a neighborhood may be entirely neutralized and effectively overcome by the application of modern preventive medical measures. Thus, while the evidence shows that certain dangers exist, it also shows, without conflict, that means have been devised to meet and overcome them.

[10] "That the possibility of the danger of contagion has been overcome by modern preventive medical measures is demonstrated by the well-known fact that isolation wards are commonly maintained in hospitals, surrounded by large numbers of people, patients, visitors, and nurses. A hospital constructed and maintained for the treatment of contagious and infectious diseases is not per se a nuisance. Board of Health v. Inhabitants of City of Trenton (N. J. Ch.) 63 A. 897. In San Diego Tuberculosis Association v. East San Diego, 186 Cal. 252, 200 P. 393, 17 A. L. R. 513, this court disposing of the contention that a hospital, no matter how well conducted, is a menace to the public peace, morals, health, and comfort, said: 'A well-conducted, modern hospital, even one for the treatment of contagious and infectious diseases, is not such a menace, but, on the contrary, one of the most beneficent institutions. * * * There is not the slightest danger of the spread of disease from it and this is the only possible ground on which objection could be made to it.'

"The determination of the legislative body necessarily implied in the enactment of the ordinance that there was no danger of an infection of the water supply of the neighborhood is likewise supported by evidence in the record before us. It is true that the evidence shows that the hospital site is somewhat below the level of the nearest municipal sewer, and that the building is sewered by means of draining into a concrete sump with a capacity of about 320 gallons from which it is raised to a street sewer, with a maximum lift of 9 feet, by means of an automatic bilge pump. There is evidence, however, to the effect that the sump is equipped with an alarm bell, which would warn of the presence of water above the level to which it is supposed to be kept by the automatic pump, and is capped with a tight cover so that water under pressure could not escape from it, but would overflow the plumbing in the hospital, thereby indicating that the pump was not working properly. There is also evidence to the effect that the equipment is thoroughly modern and adequate to effectively perform the work required of it." The implied finding of the legislative body that, under modern conditions and with care and diligence used in the maintenance of the isolation hospital and all of its appurtenances, there will be no danger of the spreading of contagious and infectious diseases ought not, therefore, to be disregarded.

[11] "It is true that there exists a strong prejudice on the part of some people against living in the vicinity of such an institution, and as a consequence the value of the land for residential purposes will necessarily be depreciated. But if there be no actual danger of infection, as has been determined by the board of directors of the city, the mere fear of such a danger will not suffice to warrant the issuance of an injunction. Dean v. Powell Undertaking Co., 55 Cal. App. 545, 203 P. 1015; Cook v. City of Fall River, 239 Mass. 90, 131 N. E. 346, 18 A. L. R. 119.

"It may be that, upon complaint and proof by the plaintiffs that the isolation hospital and its appurtenances are not being properly maintained and operated, its improper maintenance may be enjoined. But the complaints in the several suits here before us are directed against the isolation hospital merely as such, and the question of its improper maintenance is not, therefore, involved in these proceedings."

[12] At this point it may be noted that the findings of the trial court to the effect that the maintenance and operation of the isolation hospital would constitute a nuisance rests upon two classes of evidence: First, upon the evidence of real estate agents and others to the effect that the establishment and maintenance of said hospital upon the chosen site will cause a depreciation in property values of the plaintiffs and others in that vicinity; second, upon the testimony of medical experts that in their opinion there will be danger of the spread of contagious and infectious diseases to residents in the neighborhood thereof such as the danger of infection from insects such as flies, fleas, or mosquitos, or from animals such as rats or other rodents, cats, dogs, or birds, or from children or feeble-minded people wandering into the hospital or into dangerous proximity thereto or from escaping patients, or from possible infection of the clothing of nurses, attendants, or from unknown carriers of disease. Concerning this latter class of evidence it is in our opinion entirely speculative, and amounts to no more than the conclusion of these opinion witnesses that every hospital in which any infectious disorders are treated, regardless of the perfection of its construction and operation in accordance with the most up-to-date principles, methods, appliances, and preventatives, constitutes a menace to public health and a nuisance per se in its relation to dwellers in the vicinity of its proposed location. We cannot subscribe to such a doctrine, since to do so would result in the exclusion of all hospitals treating infectious diseases from cities and other places in the near vicinity of private abode, a conclusion obviously in conflict with the clearest mandates of public policy and the exercise of the police power in relation to public health. In addition it may be noted that the specific reasons given by these expert witnesses for their conclusions, viz. the possible spread of infection through insects, animals, heedless persons, or the infected clothing of nurses and others engaged in the operation of the hospital when coming into contact with the outside world, are reasons which, even if cogent, have no greater significance in their application to those residing in the vicinity of the hospital than they would have to the public at large, and hence would not suffice to constitute such special elements of injury as would serve to create a private nuisance for which these plaintiffs would be entitled to relief in this form of action. As to the first above-stated form of proof, viz. evidence of reduced property valuations, such evidence would not of itself, as already above stated, supply sufficient basis for injunctive relief.

[13, 14] "There can be no question but that a municipality has the right to amend its zoning ordinance from time to time as new and changing conditions warrant and require such revision. Miller v. Board of Public Works, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479. To hold otherwise would be to fix cities' development in the mould of the first zoning ordinances enacted. In the instant cases Ordinance No. 2176, fixing the location of the isolation hospital by express terms, repeals all ordinances and parts of ordinances inconsistent therewith. That portion of Ordinance No. 2176 which fixes the location of the isolation hospital in the particular district, is necessarily inconsistent with the provisions of that section of the zoning ordinance (section 8, subd. 3) which prohibits the erection of hospitals in such district, and such section of the zoning ordinance is thereby repealed by the enactment of Ordinance No. 2176. That section of the zoning ordinance prohibiting the erection of the hospitals and sanitariums in the particular district having been repealed, the erection of an isolation hospital may not be enjoined upon the ground that it is in violation of the zoning ordinance.

[15] "The fact that the property in controversy was purchased with part of the proceeds of a bond issue voted for the purpose of acquiring and constructing a waterworks and system to supply water to said city and its inhabitants does not give to the plaintiffs, as taxpayers, the right to restrain the city from using the property in question for any purpose other than water development. The plaintiffs argue that, if property be purchased with the proceeds of bonds voted for a particular purpose, the property so purchased would not be available to the city for any other use. The record shows that the bonds in question were voted 'for the purpose of acquiring and constructing a waterworks and system to supply water to the city' and that the electors were not called upon to authorize the purchase of the particular property which the city subsequently purchased, but in general terms authorized the incurring of the indebtedness for the purpose of acquiring and constructing a waterworks and system to supply water to said city and its inhabitants. The officers of the city sold the bonds, and with the proceeds bought the properties of the Pasadena Land & Water Company, which included the property in controversy. By Ordinance No. 2176. the board of directors of the city transferred the particular property in controversy to the health department as a hospital site, at the same time transferring, from the general fund of the city to the waterworks bond fund, the amount of the market value of the land transferred to be used for purposes for which said bond fund might lawfully be expended. The transfer to the bond fund of a sum of money equal to the market value of the land in controversy, which the record shows was found by the board to be useless for the purpose for which it was first purchased. subserved the purpose for which the bonds were voted in the first instance. Inasmuch as the bonds were not voted for the purchase of this particular property, it was well within the general power of the city to control and dispose of it as its legislative body might deem best. Charter, § 3, art. 1 (Stats. 1901, p. 888).

"It will not be necessary for us to discuss in detail other contentions incidentally made, which are necessarily involved in the main contentions which we have already discussed and disposed of."

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. DILLON. (Cr. 2796.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 28, 1926. Rehearing Denied July 26, 1926.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑174—Offense of city commissioner of finance in paying for private purchases of others from city funds held under Code provision denouncing unauthorized use of public money (Pen. Code, §§ 424, 426, 503, 504; Const. art. 11, § 17).

Offense of city commissioner of finance in paying for personal purchases of others with city funds held governed by Pen. Code, § 424, passed in obedience to Const. art. 11, § 17, denouncing unauthorized use of public money as defined in section 426, and is not ruled by sections 503, 504, relating to embezzlement, notwithstanding accused might have been proceeded against under latter statutes.

2. Criminal law 🔑29.

That accused might have been prosecuted under another statute is no defense.

3. Constitutional law 🔑70(3).

Province of regulating quantum and kind of proof required to establish guilt in any class of crime is legislative prerogative, and courts may not interfere except in extreme cases.

4. Officers 🔑121.

In prosecution of public officer under Pen. Code, § 424, for malfeasance in use of public money, proof of fraudulent intent is unnecessary.

5. Embezzlement 🔑2.

Legislature has right to provide that embezzlement of public moneys is offense, even though accused have no fraudulent intent.

6. Criminal law 🔑21.

In view of Pen. Code, §§ 7, 20, proof of intent to violate law is not essential to conviction; intention to commit forbidden act being sufficient.

7. Officers 🔑121.

Pen. Code, § 424, making wrongful appropriation or use of public moneys a crime, without proof of fraudulent intent, is proper exercise of police power.

8. Officers 🔑111.

Custodians of public moneys or funds must hold and keep them inviolate and disburse them only in strict compliance with law.

9. Officers 🔑122.

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 424, for malfeasance in use of public funds, refusal of instruction that state must prove existence of intent to appropriate moneys to unauthorized use held proper.

10. Constitutional law 🔑70(3).

Wisdom of statute is not judicial question.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Charles F. Dillon was convicted of malfeasance in use of public funds while occupying office of Commissioner of Finance of City of Fresno, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Carl E. Lindsay, Matthew Conley, and Lindsay & Conley, all of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SEAWELL, J. Appellant, commissioner of finance of the city of Fresno, this state and as such officer charged by the laws of the state and by the charter provisions of said city of Fresno with the recipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public funds of said city, was convicted upon 11 counts of an indictment which contained a total of 33 counts charging him with malfeasance in the use of public funds while he was occupying said office. The gravamen of the said 11 counts upon which convictions were had, and which constitute the basis of this appeal, are identical except as to dates, persons, and amounts, and, in substance, allege that said officer, by virtue of his office as commissioner of finance, did, without authority of law, appropriate sums of public moneys to the use of the several persons named therein, contrary to the law prescribing his duties as such public officer.

By virtue of his office as commissioner of finance, appellant also performed the duties of city purchasing agent for said city of Fresno, and as such public officer was able to and did obtain substantial discounts on all contracts of purchases of materials or supplies made by him for the use and benefit of said city in the course of his official duties. Appellant, making use of the advantages that the prestige of the office of city purchasing agent afforded, made a number of purchases extending over a period of 2 years of automobile tires and automobile accessories for the private use and benefit of a number of the city's officers and employees and for two other persons who were not in any way connected with the city government. In one instance a camping outfit was purchased. The persons thus favored were enabled to purchase for their private use, through the agency of said official, supplies and materials at prices apparently available only to the city, and which were lower than the prices demanded of persons not privileged to enjoy the favor of said purchasing agent. Usually, it appears, the sales and deliveries of goods were made directly by the seller to the purchaser. Requisitions were subsequently drawn by appellant as finance commissioner, and the amount of the article purchased was afterwards paid to the seller by warrants drawn on the city treasury, which were drawn and signed by the appellant in his official capacity. In other words, public funds were used in making payments for goods that were purchased for admittedly private uses. The city was reimbursed through appellant's office either by cash payments or by checks of the purchasers made payable to the city or to the appellant. Payments, so far as shown by the transactions before us in the instant case, in some instances were made forthwith upon delivery of the goods, in others within a period of 30 days or more thereafter, while in one case no reimbursement had been made to the city at the time of the commencement of the trial.

The indictment, which is in the language of the Code section defining the offense, was framed upon the authority of section 424, subds. 1 and 2, Penal Code, which provide as follows:

> "Sec. 424. Embezzlement and falsification of accounts by public officers. Each officer of this state, or of any county, city, town, or district of this state, and every other person charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of public moneys, who either:
> "1. Without authority of law, appropriates the same, or any portion thereof, to his own use, or to the use of another; or,
> "2. Loans the same or any portion thereof; makes any profit out of, or uses the same for any purpose not authorized by law; * * *
> "Is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one or more than ten years, and is disqualified from holding any office in this state." (Italics supplied.)

The other subdivisions of said section—3, 4, 5, 6, and 7—provide, in the order of enumeration, that each officer who knowingly keeps any false account or makes any false entry or erasures in any account of or relating to the same, or fraudulently alters, falsifies, conceals, destroys, or obliterates any such account, or willfully refuses or omits to pay over, on demand, any public moneys in his hands, upon the presentation of a draft, order, or warrant drawn upon such moneys by competent authority, or willfully omits to transfer the same, when such transfer is required by law, or willfully omits or refuses to pay over to any officer or person authorized by law to receive the same any money received by him under any duty imposed by law so to pay over the same, is likewise guilty of a felony, and is punishable as prescribed by the general penal clause of said section heretofore set out.

The section as it now exists is the result of an amendment approved March 3, 1905, and it is the latest act prescribing a penalty for the violation of the statutory duties of officers charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of public moneys.

It is clear that the said section has to do solely with the protection and safe-keeping of public moneys as defined by section 426, Penal Code, and the duties of the public officer charged with its custody or control and with no other kind of public property. The phrase "public moneys" includes "all bonds and evidence of indebtedness, and all moneys belonging to the state, or any city * * * and all moneys, bonds, and evidences of indebtedness received or held by state, county, district, city, or town officers in their official capacity." Section 426, supra.

[1] Section 17, art. 11, state Constitution, adopted in 1879, provides:

> "The making of profit out of county, city, town, or other public money, or using the same for any purpose not authorized by law, by any officer having the possession or control thereof, shall be a felony, and shall be prosecuted and punished as prescribed by law." (Italics supplied.)

It will be observed that subdivision 2, § 424, Penal Code, responds to the mandate of the Constitution in substantially the same language used in the Constitution, and there can be no doubt but that it was re-enacted in obedience to said constitutional mandate. Neither the same nor substantially the same language used with reference to the single subject of the duties of an officer charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of public moneys appears in any other section of the Penal Code. Section 424 was re-enacted subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution of 1879. We make this early observation in refutation of the contention made by appellant to the effect that it was not the legislative intent that section 424 should be applied to the facts of the instant case in the limited and restricted sense which the letter of its text would seem to compel, but that the case is ruled by sections 503 and 504, Penal Code, the first of which defines in general terms embezzlement to be the "fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted," while the latter, section 504, provides that every officer of this state, or of any county, city, or other municipal corporation, and every officer, director, trustee, clerk, servant, or agent of any association, society, or corporation, public or private, who fraudulently appropriates to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust any property which he has in his possession or under his control by virtue of his trust, is guilty of embezzlement.

[2] Conceding that a public officer who embezzles public moneys that have come into his possession by virtue of his office may properly be proceeded against as prescribed by section 504, supra, it by no means follows that said section occupies the entire legislative field with respect to the safe-keeping of public moneys and the duties of public officers with reference thereto. It is certain that the indictment was drawn under section 424, and no attempt was made to conform with the requirements of section 504. If the conviction is sustainable under the former section, it would not be rendered void by reason of the existence of said section 504. "It is no defense under one statute that the defendant might have been prosecuted under another." Bishop, New Criminal Procedure, § 612, subd. 4.

[3-7] Section 504 merely defines embezzlement, and fixes the punishment of both public and private corporate officers who may commit the offense as therein described. It does not assume to regulate the official conduct of public officers in charge of the public revenue, nor does it command or forbid the doing of the many acts specially mentioned in section 424, supra, as safeguards of the public moneys. On the other hand, the subject-matter and the language of section 424 clearly indicate that the legislative mind was intently concerned with the single, specific subject of the safekeeping and protection of public moneys and the duties of public officers in charge of the same. No language is to be found in the act which supports the contention that a public officer who uses public moneys for a "purpose not authorized by law," and which is designated a felony, and not embezzlement, cannot be prosecuted under the provisions of section 424, Penal Code, a section enacted in obedience to the express mandate of the Constitution, nor is there any room for the claim that the prosecution must fail because, forsooth, there is to be found in another part of the Code a section that is less specific and direct in its application to the particular subject of legislation. The province of regulating the quantum and kind of proof that shall be required to establish guilt in any class or grade of crime is a legislative prerogative, pure and simple, and courts may not interfere with this right except in extreme cases. No one will deny the power or right of the Legislature to provide that embezzlement of public moneys is committed by a public officer when he uses public funds in a manner forbidden by law, even though he may have no fraudulent intent when he does so. To render a person guilty of crime it is not essential to a conviction that the proof should show such person to have entertained any intent to violate law. Pen. Code, § 7; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 171, 31 P. 45. It is sufficient that he intentionally committed the forbidden act. Statutes which come clearly within the exercise of the police power of the state, of which section 424 is a striking example, fully illustrate the rule. People v. McClennegen, 195 Cal. 445, 234 P. 91, and cited cases. Section 20, Penal Code, is too clear to require juridical support. It provides:

> "In every crime or public offense there must exist a union, or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence." (Italics supplied.)

The only construction that may be placed upon the above-quoted section is that there must be an intent to do the forbidden thing or commit the interdicted act. It furnishes no basis for the claim that there must exist in the mind of the transgressor a specific purpose or intent to violate law. If it were so, innumerable statutes would be rendered ineffectual. The true rule was announced a number of years ago in People v. O'Brien, supra. Denis O'Brien was named as grantee in a conveyance of a certain tract of land. After the execution and delivery of the deed to him, he erased his name and inserted the name of his wife. In this form the deed was at his request recorded in the office of the county recorder. Thereafter he called upon the county recorder before whom the deed had been acknowledged, informed him that he had erased his own name and substituted the name of his wife as grantee, and requested the recorder to change the record so that it would speak the truth with reference to the transaction. The grantor named in the deed and Mrs. O'Brien having consented to the making of the change, the recorder, as requested by O'Brien, changed the record by erasing the name of the wife, Mary O'Brien, and inserting the name of the husband, Denis O'Brien. The defendant, Denis O'Brien, was convicted of the crime of altering the public record. He was prosecuted under the provisions of sections 113 and 114, Penal Code, which make it a crime for a public officer, or a person not a public officer, to willfully alter a public record. Fraudulent intent is not specifically made an ingredient of the offense. In that case, as in the instant case, it was urged that it was necessary in making out the offense to prove a fraudulent intent. After holding that ignorance of the law, upon rules that rest upon public necessity, the welfare of society, and the safety of the state, does not constitute a legal excuse for the commission of a criminal act, the decision proceeds to discuss fraudulent intent as an element of crime. We quote:

> "It is a familiar rule that to constitute crime there must be a union of act and intent; but our Code provides that 'the word "willfully," when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage.' Pen. Code, § 7. In Halsted v. State, 41 N. J. Law, 552, 32 Am. Rep. 247, this subject was carefully considered and elaborately discussed. After reviewing the authorities, the court reached the conclusion stated in the syllabus, viz. that, 'when an act, in general terms, is made indictable, a criminal intent need not be shown, unless from the language or effects of the law a purpose to require the existence of such intent can be discovered. The question appertains to the department of statutory construction, and, to introduce into the act the requisite of a guilty mind, it must appear that such was the intent of the lawmaker.' In State v. McBrayer, 98 N. C. 623 [2 S. E. 756] the court said: 'It is a mistaken notion that positive, willful intent to violate the criminal law is an essential ingredient in every criminal offense, and that where there is an absence of such intent there is no offense; this is especially so as to statutory offenses. When the statute plainly forbids an act to be done, and it is done by some person, the law implies conclusively the guilty intent, although the offender was honestly mistaken as to the meaning of the law he violates. When the language is plain and positive, and the offense is not made to depend upon the positive, willful intent and purpose, nothing is left to interpretation.' [Citing cases.] * * *

"It has been held that one who marries a second time under an honest but erroneous belief that a decree of divorce which had been granted was valid is afforded no protection by the invalid decree, and that evidence of his good faith will be excluded. 2 Wharton's Crim. Ev. (8th Ed.) § 1695a. The same principle is applied to many cases, such as selling intoxicating liquors to minors, abducting girls under a certain age, usurping an office under the belief that the usurper was truly elected, illegal voting under the belief that the voter is a qualified elector, publishing a libel in ignorance of its contents, storing gunpowder, and the like. 1 Wharton's Crim. Law, § 88; 2 Wharton's Crim. Law, § 1584; Hill v. State, 62 Ala. 170. * * *

"Sections 7, 112, and 113 of the Penal Code, when read together, clearly establish the proposition that it was not necessary in making out the offense to prove any fraudulent intention on the part of the defendant."

The changing of a record to make it conform with the fact, or to speak the truth, is surely less reprehensible than is the conduct of a public officer who, in the face of the express provisions of the law, withdraws public funds from their lawful place of deposit and uses them or permits them to be used in the transaction of private business by others and in open violation of law.

That it was not the purpose of the framers of section 424, supra, to incorporate or adopt, by implication or otherwise, the elements essential to constitute embezzlement as defined by section 504, is made manifest by the context of section 424. A number of the acts therein described as felonies do not possess a single element of the statutory definition of embezzlement. In fact, considered as unrelated acts, many of them bear not the slightest analogy to acts ordinarily regarded as elements essential to constitute embezzlement. The greater number of the acts therein denounced as felonies are not punishable under the provisions of said section 504, and, if appellant's argument is sound, it is no offense for a public officer to use public moneys for private purposes ad libitum if there exists no fraudulent intent. In the face of the many statutes enacted for protecting and safeguarding the revenue of the state and the declared policy of the whole scheme of legislation such a contention is rather appalling.

To again state the situation more succinctly, section 424 has to do solely with the receipt, safe-guarding, transfer, and disbursement of public moneys by official custodians Its care is for but one single subject, to wit, public moneys, while section 504 defines embezzlement generally as it relates to private officers as well as to public officers and provides for the punishment of officers who embezzle any kind of property which may have come into the possession of said officers, whether acting in a public or private capacity. Said sections are arranged and captioned under different titles in the Code. Section 424 appears in part 1, tit. 12, entitled, "Crimes against the Revenue and Property of this State," while section 504 is found in part 1, tit. 13, c. 6, under the title "Embezzlement."

People v. Church, 3 N. Y. Cr. R. 57, was a case that presented a striking resemblance in many important features to the instant case. On principle it cannot be distinguished. It is pertinent both as to offenses made indictable under two separate statutes and also as to the question of fraudulent intent. Church was the custodian of the public funds of the city of Troy. He was convicted on an indictment which charged him with having fraudulently and feloniously appropriated to his own use certain United States Treasury notes, the property of said city of Troy, with the intent to convert them to his own use. Upon disposing of the first point, which is not material to any issue before us, the case tersely disposes of the two main points made by appellant which were referable to statutes of New York very similar, in substance, to the Code sections under consideration:

"With respect to the other points, I think the district attorney might have framed the indictment under either section 470 or section 528. An illegal act frequently offends against the provisions of two or more statutes, and a prosecution under any one of them is proper. Commonwealth v. McConnell, 11 Gray (Mass.) 204; Commonwealth v. Trickey, 13 Allen (Mass.) 559; 1 Bish. on Crim. Law [7th Ed.] § 778. There is, however, a marked distinction between the two sections. Under section 528, the important element of the offense consists in 'the intent to deprive or defraud the true owner of his property' which is distinctively alleged in the pending indictment. Section 470 does not require any such intent to exist in the mind of the defaulting official when he is appropriating public moneys intrusted to him. More must be proven against the defendant to convict him under the pending indictment, than if on trial under section 470."

Admittedly there is a specific class of offenses created by statutes which make the intent to accomplish an evil design or purpose an essential ingredient of the offense; just as essential as the act itself. In that class of crimes the act and specific intent, operating together, constitute the crime, and it is not complete if the intent is absent. An assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder furnishes a typical illustration of this class of crimes. It is not only necessary to prove the assault but also the specific intent with which the assault is made. So with the crime of embezzlement, except in that class of offenses where the statute defines certain interdicted acts and declares them per se to constitute embezzlement, as was done by the Legislature of 1851 (Hittell's General Laws, 1850–64, p. 698) with reference to this identical subject. In addition to showing the appropriation of another's property the specific intent to appropriate it to one's self with a fraudulent intent is essential to constitute the crime. But the statute in the instant case does not make fraud an ingredient of the offense. There is nothing contained in the body of the act to show that it was the purpose of the Legislature to require a criminal intent in the doing of the things therein denounced as a crime. To justify a court in introducing into an act a requisite not found therein, it must affirmatively appear that such was the intent of the Legislature. People v. O'Brien, supra. No such showing can be made in view of the Code section itself and the history of antecedent and present legislation on the subject.

[8] The safe-keeping of public moneys has, from the first, been safeguarded and hedged in by legislation most strict and severe in its exactitudes. It has continuously been the policy of the law that the custodians of public moneys or funds should hold and keep them inviolate and use or disburse them only in strict compliance with the law. The public treasury or depository of public funds was created solely as an agency for the receipt and disbursement of public funds with reference to public business and not as a place of exchange for the transaction of private business in the sense that banks and other commercial institutions are created or chartered. A brief résumé of the several acts of the Legislature defining the duties and prescribing the penalties for violations thereof will suffice to make clear the legislative policy with respect to public moneys. As early as 1851 the Legislature provided that, if any public officer—

> "charged with the safe-keeping, transfer or disbursement of public moneys, shall convert to his own use in any way whatever or shall use by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan with or without interest any portion of the public moneys, bonds, * * * every such act shall be deemed and adjudged to be an embezzlement of so much of said moneys as shall be thus taken, * * * which is hereby declared to be felony." (Italics supplied.) Hittell's General Laws, 1850–64, p. 698.

This was the first act to specifically prohibit the use of public money for private uses. It will be noted that to loan or use the public moneys in violation of the act was made per se embezzlement, a felony. Nothing further than the use of the moneys in violation of the act was required to be proved. By an act entitled "An act to provide for the better keeping, protection and disbursement of public moneys," Approved March 24, 1863 (Stats. 1863, p. 97), it was provided that it should be the duty of every public officer, intrusted with the custody and disbursement of public moneys, to keep and disburse in coin so much of said moneys as he shall have received in coin and in paper currency so much thereof as he shall have received in said currency. Such officer was required to keep all moneys in his custody or under his control in his own possession. He was forbidden to place the same or any part thereof in the possession of any bank or banker, or any person or persons whatsoever, to be used by them for any purpose whatever for their own benefit or for the benefit of any other person or persons. Said officer was forbidden and prohibited from loaning, borrowing, or in any manner using said public moneys or permitting the use thereof by any other person for any purpose whatever, except as provided by the laws of the state. Said officer was prohibited from changing or converting public money, or any part thereof, from coin into currency or from paper currency into any other paper currency or coin. The only method by which public moneys could be placed without the possession of the custodian was by making a special deposit of the same with a bank.

Upon the adoption of the Codes in 1872, the Penal Code was arranged in the following order:

> "Title XII.
> "Of crimes against the revenue and property of this state."

In the space intervening between the title above set out and the subject-matter of the section of the Code which contained the number of said section, there was printed in small type and arranged in numerical order the number of the several sections of the Code included within the title above designated. To illustrate:

> "Section 424. Embezzlement and falsification of accounts by public officers."

Directly under this section followed section 425, in form as follows:

> "Section 425. Officers neglecting to pay over public moneys."

The other sections contained within the title followed with brief references made to each subsequent section as above indicated. This arrangement, which brief reference to each section, was made for the sake of convenience and was no part of the title or subject-matter of the act. In 1880 section 424 was amended, and the language of the subhead used by the Code compilers as means of identification was adopted as the title to an amendment of the said Code section, as follows:

> "An act to amend section 424 of the Penal Code relating to embezzlement and falsification of accounts by public officers." Amends. to Codes 1880 (Penal) p. 39.

Said section was amended in 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 53) for the last time in precisely the same manner. Thus it will be seen that the designation of the offense, to wit, "Embezzlement and falsification of accounts by public officers," which appears as the side heading to section 424 as it is printed in the Code at the present time, had its origin with the codifiers or compilers in 1872, but it was neither a part of the body of the Code section nor a part of the original act.

"Embezzlement" was defined by section 504, under title 13, c. 6. Following the same method of arrangement as was adopted in the preceding title defining "crimes against the revenue and property of this state," the following side head appears:

> "504. When officer, etc., of any association, guilty of embezzlement."

Thus it will be seen that no reference whatever was made in the subheading, which corresponds in arrangement with section 424, to embezzlement of public moneys or revenues by a public officer. But as above pointed out, the subheads or side heads were the result of compilations. In other words, the subhead to section 424 as inserted in the Code of 1872 was carried into the title of the amending acts of 1880 and 1905. This circumstance, however, is not sufficient to change the substance of the statute or overcome the manifest intent of the Legislature.

Whether a use of public moneys by a public officer in any manner not authorized by law becomes, in the purview of the statutes on the subject, ipso facto, embezzlement, is a question about which we express no opinion, as the case is ruled by section 424 as herein construed.

[9] Prejudicial error is assigned upon the ground that the court refused to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. Those instructions were based upon the theory that to justify the conviction of the defendant it was incumbent upon the prosecution to establish the existence in the mind of said defendant of an intent to appropriate said public moneys to a use not authorized by law. In our view of the law such instructions were properly refused.

Appellant has earnestly called to our attention unusual and exceptional instances in which the law, if interpreted as we construe it, would bring about a hard situation. He uses to illustrate his argument the case of a public officer who, in obedience to an invalid statute which he believes to be valid, in good faith, disburses money as therein directed and thereafter said statute is declared to be invalid. In such a case, it is argued, the public officer would be unjustly punished as a felon. Our answer to this argument is that no such case is before us. The officer in the instant case did not act in obedience to a law presumably valid, but he acted in disobedience and contrary to the statute as written. Besides, it is not necessary to here declare what the decision of this court might be in case an officer acted in good faith under color of the authority of law.

[10] It is not for us to consider the wisdom of the statute. It cannot be said to be invalid on the ground that it is unreasonable or harsh. An officer accepts his office with a knowledge of its duties, and in the instant case there was little excuse for the defendant to have been misled into the error he committed. Certainly there was no provision of law or rule of moral right that could have justified him in making the uses of public moneys which the evidence shows he made. The wisdom of the Legislature in requiring custodians of public moneys to hold them inviolate is both a protection to the public and to the officer, as it tends to remove from him the temptations that beset those who have large sums of money in their possession free from immediate demands.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

BACON SERVICE CORPORATION v. HUSS.

Rehearing Denied July 30, 1926.)

1. Automobiles 🔑65—Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act held measure to provide revenue for public highways outside cities (St. 1923, p. 706).

Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act held designed to impose license tax on operators of motor vehicles for hire on highways to provide revenue to maintain and repair highways outside incorporated cities, and not to be police measure.

2. Automobiles 🔑73—Constitutional law 🔑205(3)—Statutes 🔑72—Exemption of operators transporting persons to and from public schools from motor vehicle license tax held valid (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706], § 1; Vehicle Act [St. 1923, p. 538] § 78; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21).

Exemption of operators of motor vehicles used solely to transport persons to and from public schools from Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 1, held reasonable when construed in light of Vehicle Act 1923, § 78, and not violative of Const. art. 1, § 21, prohibiting discriminatory grant of privileges, and section 11, requiring general laws to be uniform.

3. Automobiles 🔑73—Constitutional law 🔑205(3)—Statutes 🔑72—Exemption of persons transporting their own property or employees, and those not transporting for hire, from motor vehicle license tax, held valid (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706] § 1; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21).

Exemption of operators of motor vehicles solely to transport their own property or employees or both, and persons transporting no persons or property for hire, from Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 1, held reasonable, under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21.

4. Automobiles 🔑73—Constitutional law 🔑205(3)—Statutes 🔑74(1).

Exemption of city vehicles not running over regular routes from Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act (St. 1923, p. 706) § 9, held reasonable, under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21.

5. Automobiles 🔑73—Constitutional law 🔑205(3)—Statutes 🔑74(1).

Exemption of sight-seeing motor vehicles from Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act (St. 1923, p. 706) § 9, held unreasonable, and hence invalid under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21.

Exemption of operators who derive percentage of their gross receipts from United States mail contracts from Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 10, held unreasonable, and hence invalid under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21.

7. Statutes 🔑64(1)—Entire act fails if unconstitutional portions are inseparable from balance thereof or their exclusion renders act inoperative as complete enactment.

Where unconstitutional portions of an act are so connected with the rest of act as to be inseparable therefrom or to render it inoperative as a complete legislative enactment, in event they are excluded, entire act fails.

8. Statutes 🔑64(1)—Valid portions of act will stand if completely operative with unconstitutional portions excluded and it was legislative intent to enact former regardless of latter.

Where an act is operative as a complete legislative enactment with unconstitutional portions excluded, and intent of Legislature was to enact valid portions irrespective of invalid portions, valid portions will be permitted to stand.

9. Statutes 🔑64(8)—Provision that if portion of act be held unconstitutional "decision shall not affect remaining portions" held mere evidence of legislative intent and not binding on court (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706] § 11).

Provision that, if any portion of act be held unconstitutional, such decision shall not affect validity of remaining portions, Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 11, cannot bind court, but is deemed legislative declaration of intention that separable invalid portions should not destroy entire act.

10. Statutes 🔑64(8)—Provision that Legislature would have passed act, and each portion, irrespective of fact that any portion be declared unconstitutional, requires court to support legislative will as far as possible (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706] § 11).

Provision that Legislature would have passed act, and each portion thereof, irrespective of fact that any portion be declared unconstitutional, in Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 11, requires court to support legislative will so far as possible.

11. Statutes 🔑64(1).

Where provisions of act are excluded because objectionable under Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring uniformity, act stands as if provisions had never been inserted.

12. Automobiles 🔑73—Provision that moneys collected from motor vehicle license tax shall be appropriated to state and to counties for highways held not unconstitutional as imposition of taxes by Legislature on counties (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706] § 8; Const. art. 11, § 12, art. 4, § 36).

Provision in Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 8, that moneys collected from license tax upon vehicles operated for hire on highways shall be paid into state treasury and apportioned, half to state and half to counties, for maintainance and repair of public highways, held not violative of Const. art. 11, § 12, prohibiting Legislature from imposing taxes upon counties or residents thereof for county purposes.

13. Statutes 🔑64(8)—Provision that moneys collected from motor vehicle license tax shall be paid into state treasury held unaffected by assignment of part to counties (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706] § 8).

Provision in Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 8, that moneys collected from license tax upon vehicles operated for hire on highways shall be paid into state treasury, held not affected by provision assigning portion thereof to counties, even if invalid.

14. Automobiles 🔑73—License tax of percentage of gross receipts on motor vehicles operated for hire held valid (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706] § 4; Const. art. 13, § 14).

License tax upon operation of motor vehicles for hire on public highways of percentage of gross receipts under Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, § 4, held valid, being a property tax and not a franchise tax which, under Const. art. 13, § 14, must be assessed at actual cash value.

15. Statutes 🔑64(8)—Invalidity of exemptions of sightseeing vehicles and those deriving receipts from mail contracts in Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, held not to destroy whole act (St. 1923, p. 706, § 11).

That exemptions of operators of sight-seeing motor vehicles and those deriving receipts from United States mail contracts were void held not to invalidate remainder of Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, provisions being separable, and section 11, providing that invalidity of any portion should not destroy remainder.

16. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—Supreme Court properly determined validity of repealed act, where rights and liabilities thereunder survived repeal (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act [St. 1923, p. 706]; St. 1925, p. 833).

Validity of Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act 1923, though subsequently repealed by Act May 23, 1925 (St. 1925, p. 833, held properly considered by Supreme Court, where rights, duties, and obligations of those subject to act survived repeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by the Bacon Service Corporation against Fred C. Huss, as Captain of Fresno County Traffic Squad, to enjoin enforcement of Motor Vehicle Transportation License Act of 1923. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant.

Theodore M. Stuart, of Fresno, for respondent.

SHENK, J. The plaintiff and respondent is a California corporation having its principal place of business in the county of Fresno. It has been and is engaged in the business of transporting property for hire as a private carrier and persons and property for hire as a common carrier over the public highways of the state by means of motor vehicles operated between fixed termini and over regular routes. The defendant and appellant is a law enforcement officer of the state whose duties relate chiefly to the enforcement of laws governing the use of the public highways by motor vehicles in Fresno county. In July, 1924, he was threatening criminal prosecutions against the respondent for alleged violations of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to impose a license fee for the transportation of persons or property for hire or compensation upon public streets, roads and highways in the state of California by motor vehicle; to provide for certain exemptions; to provide for the enforcement of the provisions hereof and for the disposition of the amounts collected on account of such licenses, * * *" approved June 13, 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 706). This action was brought to enjoin him from enforcing or attempting to enforce the provisions of that act. The complaint set forth the foregoing facts, and charged that said act contravened certain provisions of the state and federal Constitutions and was therefore void.

The appellant answered admitting generally the allegations of the complaint, but denying specifically the alleged unconstitutionality of the act. By stipulation, the cause was submitted to the trial court on the facts alleged in the complaint and on the issues of law raised by the answer. The court found the allegations of the complaint to be true, concluded that the act was void in its entirety as in violation of both state and federal Constitutions, and rendered judgment enjoining the defendant from enforcing the same. The defendant appeals. The sole question for determination is the alleged unconstitutionality of the statute.

[1] As indicated by its title, the act was designed to impose a license tax upon those engaged in the business of operating motor vehicles upon the public highways for the transportation of persons or property for compensation. Section 1 defines certain words and phrases employed in the act. The term "operator" is declared generally to include all persons, firms, associations, and corporations who operate motor vehicles upon any public highway in the state and thereby engage in the transportation of persons or property for hire or compensation. The term "motor vehicles" is defined to mean and include all vehicles, automobiles, trucks, or trailers operated upon or over the public highways of this state whether the same be propelled or operated by steam or electricity or propelled or operated by combustion of gasoline, distillate or other volatile and inflammable liquid fuels. The term "gross receipts from operation" is declared to include all receipts from the operation of any such motor vehicle beginning and ending entirely within this state and excluding revenues from interstate commerce.

Section 2 of the act provides:

> "Each operator of a motor vehicle within this state who transports or desires to transport for compensation or hire persons or property upon or over any public highway within this state shall apply to and secure from the board of equalization of the state of California a license to operate each and all of the motor vehicles which such operator desires to operate or which such operator from time to time may operate."

Under section 4 of the act the renewal of said license is made conditional on the payment by the applicant of 4 per cent. of the "gross receipts from operation" ascertained as provided in the act. Said section further provides:

> "That there shall be deducted from said four per cent. of the gross receipts the amount of any county or municipal licenses, and any city, or county or city and county taxes paid by such operators to any city, or county, or city and county in this state upon any of the property actually used and necessary in the operation of such motor vehicles for the transportation of persons or property and upon such payment said state controller shall issue a receipt, in duplicate, to such applicant."

It is provided in section 7 that any operator using the public highways of the state for the transportation of persons or property for hire, either as a public or private carrier, without first obtaining the license and making the return of gross receipts provided for, is guilty of a misdemeanor and is punishable by a fine or imprisonment or both. Section 8 provides that after the funds are paid to the state they shall be apportioned one-half to the state of California and one-half to its several counties as therein provided, the whole to be used exclusively for the maintenance and repair of the state and county highways.

The respondent concedes the right of the state to impose a license for revenue on all persons operating motor vehicles for hire on the public highways. It makes no objection to fixing the amount of such license tax at a percentage of the gross receipts, but it has refused to comply with the requirements of the law because of its alleged invalidity resulting from certain exemptions included in sections 1, 9, and 10 of the act. Section 1 excludes from the definition of the term "operator" every one "who solely transports by motor vehicle persons to and from or to or from attendance upon any public school," and also every one "who solely transports his or its own property, or employees, or both, and who transports no persons or property for hire or compensation." Section 9 reads as follows:

> "This act shall not apply to taxicabs, drays, transfer vehicles and other like city motor vehicles which do not run over regular routes nor shall it apply to hotel busses meeting trains, cars or boats or to sightseeing motor vehicles."

And section 10 provides:

> "Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to nor to levy a license upon the operation of any motor vehicle or motor vehicles of any operator, or the gross receipts therefrom, when as much as fifteen per cent. of the gross receipts of such operator in the aggregate from such motor vehicle or motor vehicles shall have been earned by the transportation of United States mails, parcels post or other government matter under contract with the federal government."

The respondent contends that the statute applies only to some of those who operate motor vehicles for hire over the public highways and in terms exempts others who stand in the same relation to the burdens imposed as does the respondent; that no reasonable distinction can be found to justify their preference; and that the act is therefore in violation of section 21 of article 1 of the state Constitution, prohibiting the granting of privileges or immunities to citizens or any class of citizens which, upon the same terms, are not granted to all citizens; also in violation of section 11 of article 1 requiring laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation; also in violation of section 12 of article 11, which prohibits the Legislature from imposing taxes upon counties or the inhabitants thereof for county purposes, and in violation of section 14 of article 13, providing that all franchises other than those mentioned in the section shall be assessed at their full cash value exclusively for the benefit of the state.

On the former hearing the subject was treated particularly with reference to the applicability of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution. A rehearing was granted in order that more attention might be given in the first instance to the effect of section 21 of article 1, in the light of the provision of section 11 of the act in question.

An examination of the entire statute discloses that the obvious and only purpose of the act was to provide a revenue with which to maintain and repair the public highways of the state outside of incorporated cities, and that such revenue was to be obtained by the imposition of a license or privilege tax on the business of operating motor vehicles for hire over such public highways. The act is not a police measure in any sense. It provides for a license tax for revenue purposes only. As stated, the respondent concedes that this is a proper purpose to justify a license tax. It contends, however, that if operators of motor vehicles for hire constitute a proper classification to satisfy constitutional requirements, there is no natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction between the use to which its motor vehicles are put and the use exercised by certain of the exempted vehicles.

[2] Taking up the exemptions in the order in which they appear in the statute, it is first noted that section 1 exempts operators of motor vehicles used solely for the transportation of persons to and from the public schools. In providing for this exemption, the Legislature doubtless had in mind the motor vehicles operated by or under contract with public school authorities for the conveyance of school children to and from school. The expense of such operation is a charge on the public treasury, and the exaction of the license tax thereon would naturally increase the general tax burden. The state has a special interest in the development of the public school system and in as full and regular school attendance as possible. To that end such conveyances have been provided at public expense. It is easily conceivable that the Legislature had in mind that by relieving such operators from a state license tax, cheaper transportation for a public purpose would thereby be had. An instance of a similar classification is noted in the exemption from the payment of registration fees under the California Vehicle Act of vehicles owned by the state or by any political subdivision thereof (section 78, Stats. 1923, p. 538). There would therefore seem to be no objection to the classification of motor vehicles so operated at public expense apart from those operated for hire by private individuals, associations, and corporations.

[3] The next exemption applies to those who use said public highways for the transportation of their own property or employees or both and to those who transport no persons or property for hire or compensation. It is obvious that those who operate motor vehicles for the transportation of persons or property for hire enjoy a different and more extensive use of the public highways. They are thereby enabled to engage in business on the public highways and to provide for themselves a livelihood, particularly because of the existence of the public highways and the facilities thereby afforded. Such extraordinary use constitutes a natural distinction and a full justification for their separate classification and for relieving from the burden of the license tax those who merely employ the public highways for the transportation of their own property or employees.

[4] The respondent next contends that the exemption of "taxicabs, drays, transfer vehicles, and other like city vehicles which do not run over regular routes" is such an exemption as disturbs the required uniformity of the act. It is apparent that this exemption and the further exemption of hotel busses meeting trains, cars, or boats were intended to apply to those who are engaged in the business of operating such motor vehicles for hire within the limits of incorporated cities. As such, they may be properly so separately classified for the reason that highways within municipalities are usually not maintainable directly at the expense of the state but from municipal revenues derived from the exercise of municipal powers of license and taxation, and it must be assumed that the Legislature had this distinction in mind in limiting the license to the use of highways maintainable by the state and for whose maintenance municipalities are not responsible.

In providing for the exemptions heretofore considered, we are of the opinion that the Legislature has not acted arbitrarily nor without reason in making such classifications. We do not intend to hold, however, that the exemptions provided for in section 9 of the act would apply to operators therein mentioned who are engaged also in the business of transporting passengers or property for hire outside of incorporated cities as the fact in each case may appear.

[5] A different situation is presented as to the exemptions next to be considered. It is insisted by respondent, and it is not denied by the appellant, that sight-seeing motor vehicles carrying passengers for hire are quite generally operated in county territory outside of incorporated cities. That being the fact, it is clear that the operators of such vehicles come within the definition of those who are required to obtain licenses and to pay 4 per cent. of their gross receipts to the state under the general provisions of the act. There appears to be no natural or intrinsic and certainly no constitutional distinction between the use of the public highways by the vehicles of the respondent and the same use by sight-seeing busses regularly using the highways of the state outside of municipalities in the business of transporting persons or property for hire.

[6] Likewise it is insisted by the respondent that the exemption of operators who derive as much as 15 per cent. of their gross receipts from United States mail contracts constitutes a classification having no basis of distinction except the arbitrary declaration of the statute itself. It is difficult to perceive how this exemption may be justified when it relieves from the burden of the license tax those operators who conduct a motor bus business outside of municipalities and who perchance may have acquired a government contract for the carriage of mail from which they derive at least 15 per cent. of their gross receipts. Under this exemption the entire revenues of such operators derived from business exclusive of mail contracts—and which may be as much as eighty-five per cent. of their gross receipts—are relieved from the deduction of 4 per cent. license tax while a like percentage of the gross receipts of those operators of the same class having no mail contracts are subjected to the tax. We see no legally justifiable basis for the distinction. It will be noted that the statute does not merely exempt the mail contract revenues from the license tax of 4 per cent., but exempts the entire revenues of such operators from the requirements of the act. We think that the exemption of sight-seeing motor busses operating outside of municipalities and the exemption of the entire revenues of operators a part but not all of whose business embraces the carriage of United States mail and parcels post by contract were not based on any properly cognizable theory of classification. In further considering these exemptions it would seem desirable and necessary to view them first in the light of respondent's contention that they are in violation of section 21 of article I of the Constitution. It is insisted that they confer special privileges and immunities upon the operators there singled out which are not enjoyed by the same classes covered by the general terms of the act. It requires no argument or citation of authority to demonstrate that the respondent's position in this respect is well taken. We feel no hesitancy in holding that said exemptions attempt to confer special privileges and immunities upon operators of such sight-seeing busses and mail and parcels post contract carriers in violation of said section 21 and are therefore void.

[7, 8] It is then to be determined what effect the presence in the act of those unlawful exemptions had on the balance of the act. It is well settled that if the objectionable portions of an act are so connected with the rest of the act as to be inseparable therefrom or to render the act inoperative as a complete legislative enactment in the event the objectionable portions be excluded, the entire act must fall. It is also the rule that if the act, with the objectionable portions excluded, be completely operative as a legislative enactment and it is plain from the terms of the act that the objectionable portions were not the considerations or conditions which moved the Legislature to enact the statute and that it was the intention of the Legislature to pass the act though the objectionable portions were eliminated, then the balance of the statute may be permitted to stand as a complete expression of the legislative will. The rule in such cases is expressed in Hale v. McGettigan, 114 Cal. 112, 45 P. 1049, where it is said:

> "Whether a statute containing an unconstitutional provision, with others which are constitutional, will be sustained as to those which are constitutional and held invalid merely as to those which are not, depends upon the nature of the different provisions in view of the evident purpose of the Legislature. If the provisions are so interdependent that those which are invalid are to be regarded as the condition or consideration upon which others were enacted, and it is evident that the Legislature would not have enacted the statute except in its entirety, and did not intend that any part should have effect unless the whole could be made operative, the entire statute must be held invalid. On the other hand, if the different parts of the statute are severable and independent of each other, and the provisions which are within the constitutional power of the Legislature are capable of being carried into effect after the void part has been eliminated, and it is clear from the statute itself that it was the intent of the Legislature to enact these provisions irrespective of the others, the unconstitutional provisions will be disregarded and the statute read as if these provisions were not there. For the purpose of statutory construction, the intention of the Legislature, as shown by the general scope and purpose of the law, is to be ascertained. It is never to be assumed that the Legislature intended to enact an unconstitutional statute, or that it supposed that any part of its act was beyond its constitutional power; and, if the general scope of an act is within its power, the act is not to be rendered null by reason of a subsidiary provision which was beyond its power to enact. If the manifest purpose of the Legislature can be carried into effect by upholding the act and disregarding such subsidiary provisions, that purpose will not be defeated by an unconstitutional provision contained in a subordinate section in the act."

See, also, People v. Capelli, 55 Cal. App. 461, 203 P. 837.

It cannot be questioned that the said unlawful exemptions are separable from the balance of the act, and when they are eliminated it is apparent that the statute is a legislative enactment complete in all respects and sufficient to accomplish the purposes for which it was adopted. It remains only to consider whether it was the intention of the Legislature, gathered from the act itself, that the statute should operate notwithstanding the unlawful exemptions in the event such exemptions be stricken as constitutionally unauthorized. The provisions of section 11 of the act afford unmistakable evidence that such was the legislative intent. That section reads as follows:

> "If any section, subsection, clause, sentence or phrase of this act is for any reason held to be unconstitutional such decision shall not affect the validity of the remaining portions of this act. The Legislature hereby declares that it would have passed this act, and each section, subsection, sentence, clause or phrase thereof irrespective of the fact that any one or more sections, subsections, clauses or phrases be declared unconstitutional."

[9] The purpose of that section was undoubtedly to meet such a situation as is here presented. It was inserted in the act for the purpose of indicating to the court, when required to pass upon the constitutionality of the act or of any portion thereof, and to apply the rules of law applicable thereto, that the statute would have been enacted with the objectionable portions omitted in the event the court should conclude that said portions were separable and beyond the power of the Legislature lawfully to incorporate in the statute. It is conceded by the respondent that—

> "Without such a declaration in the statute it would be the duty of this court, if the act were in part constitutional and in part unconstitutional, to sustain the constitutional part if the good and the bad were not so blended that they could not be separated and the constitutional part could stand alone as a complete expression of the intention of the Legislature."

But it is insisted that section 11 is ineffectual to accomplish the purpose contended for by the appellant. It is first pointed out that it is beyond the power of the Legislature to bind the court by the assertion that if any portion of the act "is to be held unconstitutional, such decision shall not affect the remaining portions" of the act. To this contention we accede. But we cannot view the language of the statute as an inexorable command for it is a judicial question in each case whether the good may stand notwithstanding the bad. But the use of such language may rightly be considered by the court as a declaration of intention on the part of the Legislature that in so far as lay within its power a separable invalid portion of the act should not destroy the whole.

[10, 11] It is next contended that the second sentence of section 11, to the effect that the Legislature would have passed the act and each portion thereof "irrespective" of the fact that any portion be declared unconstitutional, is a challenge to the courts that the Legislature would have persisted in adopting an unconstitutional act, including the invalid portions, notwithstanding certain parts of the act be held unconstitutional. To this we cannot agree. The second sentence is inaptly worded just as the first sentence is too broad in its apparently mandatory phraseology. But here again the purpose of the language is plain. It is an assurance to the court that the Legislature would have adopted the act with the invalid portions excluded if it had known that the inclusion thereof was constitutionally unauthorized, thus evidencing an intention which otherwise might not have been apparent on the face of the act, and indicating a purpose to avoid if possible a determination by the court that it could not be said from the language of the act whether the Legislature would have enacted the statute with the invalid portions excluded. The section also makes it plain that if any exemptions should be held invalid it was the intention of the Legislature that the operators whose exemption was attempted should be subjected to the general requirements of the act. A section similar to section 11 was involved in the Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 639), and was given its proper effect in the Matter of the Application of Schuler, 167 Cal. 282, 139 P. 685, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 706, where it was said:

> "Similar sections have been subjects of interpretation in other states and its seems to be the concensus of belief that they impose upon the courts the duty of supporting the legislative will as far as possible [citing cases]."

When the invalid portions of the act here in question are excluded, it is clear that the balance of the act contains all of the elements of a completely operative statute and that it was intended by the Legislature so to be. The enactment then is in the same status it would have assumed had the unlawful exemptions originally not have been included therein. In other words, their inclusion was a nullity, and the operators thus attempted to be exempted are included within the general terms of the act and can claim no rights or privileges by reason of the attempted exemption because, under the prohibitory provisions of the Constitution, they were never entitled to the same. As so construed the statute is not then objectionable to the provisions of section 11 of article I of the Constitution requiring uniformity. Nor does this conclusion result in judicial legislation as urged by respondent. It is no more than the application of approved rules of construction, having in mind that the power of the court to declare a statute unconstitutional is one of the utmost delicacy in its exercise and should not be asserted to strike down the statute unless there is no proper basis for its reconciliation with the organic law. Stockton & V. R. Co. v. City of Stockton, 41 Cal. 147, 159; Matter of Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 124 P. 427. Section 11 of the act is not an attempted delegation of legislative authority to the court, nor is it an inconsistent alternative. It is a positive declaration of the purpose of the Legislature to put the law in force to the full extent of the legislative constitutional power. Snetzer v. Gregg, 129 Ark. 542, 196 S. W. 925, L. R. A. 1917F, 990; State v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 117 P. 1101, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 466; Standard Lumber Co. v. Pierce, 112 Or. 314, 228 P. 812; 6 R. C. L. 123. It may be granted that if the problem here presented were approached solely from the standpoint of the applicability of section 11 of article I and that if there were no place in its proper solution for a consideration of section 21 of the same article in connection with section 11 of the act, then the conclusion might seem irresistible that the entire statute would fall for lack of uniformity. But the latter conclusion is properly made unnecessary by measuring the statute by other constitutional tests which when properly applied permit the act in general to stand.

The case of Mordecai v. Board of Supervisors, 183 Cal. 434, 192 P. 40, is strongly relied upon by the respondent. A careful consideration of the decision in that case in the light of the terms of the statute then before the court discloses that the conclusions there reached are not controlling in the present case nor are they inconsistent with the rules applied in this controversy. The statute involved in that case provided generally for the creation of irrigation districts in counties throughout the state and conferred special powers upon the board of directors of such districts over irrigation and other districts theretofore organized and existing in all counties pursuant to general state laws. The act then provided that nothing therein contained should affect or apply to any irrigation, protection, flood control, conservation, or other improvement district situated wholly or in part within any county which had adopted a county charter prior to June 4, 1915, or within any city and county, and that the board of directors provided for in the act should have no power or jurisdiction within the excepted counties or city and county. It was held that there was no natural, intrinsic or constitutional distinction between districts in chartered and unchartered counties and that the act was therefore void for lack of uniformity in its operation throughout the state. The reasoning and conclusions of the court in that case when applied to the particular act under consideration cannot be questioned, but they do not here apply for several reasons. In the first place, if the act there involved were considered a burden imposed on the districts included within its general terms and that special privileges and immunities were granted to the districts in the excepted counties the exceptions would be objectionable to section 21 of article I of the Constitution. But there was no language in the act such as was incorporated in section 11 of the present act, evidencing the intent of the Legislature that if the exceptions be held to be unconstitutional the remainder of the act, if possible, should stand. Furthermore, there were in that case valid reasons for concluding that the exceptions in the act were material considerations or conditions attending the favorable vote on the entire measure in the Legislature and that without the exceptions the statute would not have been adopted. Again, if the general terms of that act be deemed a denial of the same privilege, the general terms of the act would necessarily fall as in contravention with section 21 of article I and nothing would remain to operate as a legislative enactment.

Other cases cited by respondent do not warrant a different conclusion. In City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 P. 604, the privileges were conferred by the general terms of the act and the disabilities or burdensome conditions were imposed upon the municipalities included in the exception and the entire act was therefore properly declared void. In the case of In re Raleigh, 177 Cal. 746, 171 P. 950, this court had under consideration the Real Estate Brokers' License Law of 1917.[1] The act contained an exemption of those who had received from the insurance commissioner or the bureau of building and loan supervision a certificate of authority or license to do business within this state. The exemption was held to be unlawful and the entire act was declared to be invalid. There was nothing in the statute in that case which indicated that if the attempted exemption were invalid and separable the balance of the act should shtand or that the Legislature would have adopted the statute with the invalid exemption omitted.

It is contended by respondent that Hill v. Wallace, 259 U. S. 44, 42 S. Ct. 453, 66 L. Ed. 822, is decisive of the present case. Its effect in that respect might be conceded if it were here determined that the valid and invalid portions of the act in question were inseparable. The Federal Trade Act of Congress, approved August 24, 1921, 42 Stat. 187, under consideration in that case, was found to contain regulations which were unenforceable. The act also contained a section which was the same in effect as section 11 of the present act. The court determined that the invalid portions were so interwoven with the other regulations contained in the act as to be impossible of separation and to render the saving clause ineffectual. A similar saving clause was considered in an Alabama case, concerning which it was held that "such an expression in an enactment serves only to render certain the legislative intent with respect to passage of the valid parts, notwithstanding the invalid, and does not avail to clothe the valid with immunity from the invalidating effect" of the law because of the inseparable blending of the bad and good. State v. Montgomery, 177 Ala. 212, 241, 59 So. 294, 302. In Dorchy v. State of Kansas, 264 U. S. 286, 44 S. Ct. 323, 68 L. Ed. 686, it was said that such a saving clause was "not an inexorable command" to the court. So here it is recognized that such a clause cannot always save a statute. In Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 540, 22 S. Ct. 431, 46 L. Ed. 679, the Anti-Trust Law of Illinois was under consideration. It provided that its terms should "not apply to agricultural products or live stock while in the hands of the producer or raiser."[2] It was determined that those affected by the general terms of the act were denied the equal protection of the law and the whole statute must fall for the reason "that the Legislature would not have entered upon or continued the policy indicated by the statute unless agriculturalists and live stock dealers were excluded from its operation." The effect of a saving clause was not there involved. In Spraigue v. Thompson, 118 U. S. 90, 6 S. Ct. 988, 30 L. Ed. 115, the court having found certain provisions of a Georgia statute invalid, refused to declare that the balance of the act should remain unaffected for the reason "that by rejecting the exceptions intended by the Legislature of Georgia the statute is made to enact what confessedly the Legislature never meant." It was held that such a construction would confer "upon the statute a positive operation beyond the legislative intent, and beyond what any one can say it would have enacted in view of the illegality of the exceptions." Likewise in that case the effect of a saving clause was not before the court.

Respondent relies on a statement in Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (volume 1, 2d Ed. § 306) where it is said:

> "If, by striking out a void exception, proviso or other restrictive clause, the remainder, by reason of its generality, will have a broader scope as to subject or territory, its operation is not in accord with the legislative intent, and the whole would be affected and made void by the invalidity of such part."

The foregoing is unquestionably the rule except when a contrary legislative intent is ascertainable from the language of the statute or the general purposes or terms of the act. But when it appears in the statute that it was the intent that the separable void portion should not destroy the whole, the invalidity of the entire statute will not necessarily result, especially when it is determined, as here, that such was the intent, and that the remainder is a full and complete legislative enactment of the subject to which it relates.

Numerous other cases cited and relied upon by respondent have been examined. In many of them we find a general recognition of the rules applied in the present case, and we find none of them, when properly considered, compelling a conclusion contrary to that at which we have arrived.

Cases from other jurisdictions, cited by the appellant, declare the effectiveness of such a saving clause in proper cases. In N. R. Bagley Co. v. Cameron, 282 Pa. 84, 127 A. 311, it was held that a saving clause declaring statutory provisions separable is effective to raise a presumption of the intent to severally enact the remaining provisions of the act if any severable parts thereof be declared unconstitutional. In Saari v. Gleason, 126 Minn. 378, 148 N. W. 293, it was held that under such a saving clause the rule is that if a part of a statute be unconstitutional the remaining portions must nevertheless be sustained if enough is left to constitute an enforceable law. In Ohio Tax. Cases, 232 U. S. 576, 34 S. Ct. 372, 58 L. Ed. 737, such a saving clause was given recognition. Further reference to this line of cases is deemed unnecessary, but for a general statement of the rule as applied in this state see 5 Cal. Jur. 643, 648, and supporting cases cited.

[12, 13] In section 8 of the act it is provided that all moneys collected under and by virtue of the act, except such sums as are received for emblems, shall be paid into the state treasury and credited to the motor vehicle fuel fund. This section then appropriates one-half of said collections to the state to be devoted to the maintenance and repair of public highways. The other one-half is apportioned to the several counties of the state in accordance with the plan therein provided and to be devoted exclusively to the maintenance and repair of public highways within the counties. It is contended by the respondent that section 12 of article 11 is thereby violated which provides, among other things, that the Legislature shall have no power to impose taxes upon counties or upon the inhabitants of any county for county purposes, but may by general law vest in the authorities of the county the power to assess and collect taxes for such purposes. We find no merit in this contention. The license taxes here imposed by the Legislature are in furtherance of a state purpose for the maintenance of state highways and to extend aid in the maintenance of county highways. This action of the Legislature would seem to be fully authorized by section 36 of article 4 of the Constitution, which provides that—

> "The Legislature shall have power to establish a system of state highways or to declare any road a state highway, and to pass all laws necessary or proper to construct and maintain the same, and to extend aid for the construction and maintenance in whole or in part of any county highway."

The cases of People v. Martin, 60 Cal. 153, and San Francisco v. Insurance Co., 74 Cal. 116, 15 P. 380, 5 Am. St. Rep. 425, relied upon by the respondent, are not in point for the reason that the license taxes there involved were required to be paid into the county treasuries and were imposed and made available for expenditure for county purposes in the absence of constitutional authority or a general law authorizing the county authorities to impose the same. But in any event the assignment of a portion of the fund accumulated under the act here in question to the several counties of the state would not destroy the effectiveness of that portion of the act which requires the license tax to be paid into the state treasury. Matter of the Application of Schuler, supra, 289.

[14] There is no merit in the contention of the respondent that the license tax here involved is a tax on its so-called franchise or right to operate its motor vehicles under a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by the railroad commission, and therefore void under section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution. That section provides that all franchises such as the respondent claims to own shall be assessed at their actual cash value and be taxed at the rate of one per cent. each year exclusively for the purposes of the state. It is argued that inasmuch as section 8 of the act in question provides that one-half of the license tax collected shall be paid to the several counties the section of the Constitution referred to has been violated. The answer is that the tax on the alleged franchise of the respondent as contemplated by the section of the Constitution referred to is a property tax on an ad valorem basis and is not in any sense a license tax for the privilege of carrying on a business such as the act here involved intended to impose.

[15] We therefore conclude that when the separable and unlawful exemptions are excluded from the act as being obnoxious to section 21 of article I of our state Constitution, the remainder of the act is a completely enforceable statute as to all operators engaged in the business of using the public highways of the state outside of municipalities for the transportation of persons or property for hire, including those unlawfully exempted, and that the remainder of said act violates no provision of the state or federal Constitutions invoked by the respondent.

[16] The act here under consideration was repealed by section 11 of a similar act approved May 23, 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 833). Inasmuch as certain rights, duties, and obligations of those operators who were subject to the requirements of the 1923 statute, and who were doing business between the effective date of that act and the effective date of the 1925 statute, as well as the rights of the state to revenues during that period, still survive said repeal, the questions involved herein are not considered moot.

The judgment is reversed.

COLBERG et al. v. STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION et al. (S. F. 11452.)

1. Automobiles ⊂⊃77—Renewal of license to operate motor vehicle for hire held properly conditioned on payment of license tax (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act [St. 1923, p. 706]; St. 1925, p. 833, § 11).

Under Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act 1923, subsequently repealed by Act May 23, 1925 (St. 1925, p. 833) § 11, requiring operator of motor vehicles for hire on public highways to secure license and making payment of specified percentage of gross receipts a prerequisite to renewal thereof, renewal of license held properly conditioned on payment of such fee.

2. Mandamus ⊂⊃16(1).

Writ of mandate will not issue where repeal of act under which relief was sought has made question moot.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by William C. Colberg and another against Board of Equalization of the State of California and members thereof to compel issuing of license to operate motor vehicles for hire under Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act of 1923. Writ denied.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondents.

SHENK, J. [1, 2] This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondents to issue to the petitioners the renewal of a license to operate their motor vehicles for hire pursuant to the Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 706). The petitioners, who are operators as defined by that act, refused to pay the license tax for the same reasons advanced by the plaintiff and respondent in the case of Bacon Service Corporation v. Fred C. Huss, etc. (S. F. No. 11419) 248 P. 235, this day decided, wherein the constitutionality of the statute was upheld. They seek the issuance of the license on the theory that the provisions of the act which require the same may be valid and enforceable notwithstanding the alleged unconstitutionality of the remaining provisions of the act requiring the payment of license tax. A petition for rehearing was granted herein for the same reasons noted in the above case this day decided. On the grounds stated in the opinion in that case, it is here decided that the provisions of said act both as to the license and as to the license tax were applicable to the petitioners herein, and that a renewal of the license was properly conditioned by the respondents on the payment of the accrued license fee. Said act was repealed by section 11 of a similar act approved May 23, 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 833). From our ruling as to the validity of the 1923 statute, it follows that the petitioners were not entitled to said license except upon payment of the license tax.

On the authority of the above case this day decided, and on the additional ground that the issues herein would seem to have become moot by reason of the repeal of the act under which the relief was sought, the peremptory writ is denied.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; SEAWELL, J.; CURTIS, J.; RICHARDS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

1. Automobiles ⊂⊃73—Constitutional law ⊂⊃205(3)—Statutes ⊂⊃72—Exemptions of operators transporting persons to and from public schools, and those not transporting for hire, from motor vehicle tax, are valid (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833] § 1; Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21).

Exemption of operators of motor vehicles used solely to transport persons to and from public schools and those solely transporting their own property or employees or both, and those not transporting for hire, from Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act, § 1, imposing tax upon operation of motor vehicles on public highways, are reasonable, and so valid under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21.

2. Automobiles ⊂⊃73—Constitutional law ⊂⊃205(3)—Statutes ⊂⊃74(1)—Exemptions of vehicles operated within city limits from motor vehicle license tax held valid. (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833] §§ 4, 9; Const. art. I, §§ 11, 21).

Exemption of vehicles operating within incorporated cities or towns from Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act, § 9, held valid, under Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21, in view of section 4 of the act that vehicles operating both within and without city should be exempt only to extent county and municipal licenses and taxes are paid by them.

3. Automobiles ⊂⊃73—Classification of operators of motor vehicles for licensing is justified by nature of business transacted (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833]).

Under Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act, it is not the type of vehicle, but nature of business conducted on highways, that justifies classification made in the statute.

4. Automobiles 🔑73—That concerns transporting own materials added cartage of price held not to require inclusion in classification of those engaged in transporting for hire (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833]).

That concerns used public highways for transporting their own materials and added cost of cartage to price of material delivered held not to require their inclusion in classification of those engaged in business of using highways for transportation for hire singled out by Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act for payment of license fee.

5. Licenses 🔑7(2).

Classification for licensing purposes is within Legislature's discretion, and its determination will not be overthrown unless palpably arbitrary.

6. Statutes 🔑47.

Exemption of vehicles operating within "usual transfer delivery zone" from Motor Vehicle Transportation Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833] § 9 held void for vagueness.

7. Statutes 🔑64(8)—Void portion of act, separable from remainder, will be ignored in considering validity of remainder of act (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833] § 12).

Where void portion of Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act is incidental to and separable from remainder of act, it will be ignored in considering validity of remainder of act, in view of section 12 that Legislature would have adopted act with unconstitutional portions omitted.

8. Automobiles 🔑73—Exemption of revenue derived from carrying mail under contract entered into before named date after act was adopted from motor vehicle license tax held valid (Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act [St. 1925, p. 833] § 9½; Rev. St. U. S. § 3966 [U. S. Comp. St. § 7459]).

Provision that Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act, § 9½, should not apply to income derived from carrying United States mail under contract entered into before May 1, 1925, held valid, since such revenues may be separately classified, and date named, though subsequent to adoption date, was not discriminatory, in view of circumstances and Rev. St. U. S. § 3966 (U. S. Comp. St. § 7459).

In Bank.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by Paul Schmolke to be directed to Chief of Police, City and County of San Francisco, to secure his release from custody upon charge of violating Motor Transportation License Act of 1925. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, and Theodore M. Stuart, of Fresno, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

SHENK, J. The petitioner seeks a release on habeas corpus from his detention by the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco. He was arrested pursuant to a warrant issued upon the filing of a complaint in the police court of said city and county charging him with a misdemeanor in that he did, on the 21st day of September, 1925, engage in the business of transporting property for hire upon and over the public highways of the state of California without having obtained a license so to do as required by the Motor Vehicle Transportation License Tax Act, approved May 23, 1925 (Stats. 1925, p. 833). In and by said act it is made a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment or both for any person, firm, association, or corporation to operate motor vehicles for hire upon and over the public highways of the state without procuring a license and thereafter paying the license fees as prescribed in said act. The petitioner is now and for several years last past has been engaged in the business of operating for hire motor vehicles upon and over the public highways of the state. He has refused to apply for a license, claiming that the said act is unconstitutional. The objections which he urges in that respect are substantially the same as those made by the plaintiff and respondent in Bacon Service Corporation v. Fred C. Huss, etc. (S. F. No. 11419) 248 P. 235, this day decided. The 1925 statute covers the same subject-matter as the former statute (Stats. 1923, p. 706), which it repeals. The provisions of the present statute are the same as the 1923 statutes with certain exceptions which will be noted.

In section 1 of the present statute the definition of an "operator" is the same as declared in the former statute, but following the definition a new provision is inserted requiring that all exempted freight-carrying vehicles shall obtain exempt emblems from the state board of equalization and display the same in the manner provided. No objection is raised to this additional regulation. Section 4 provides for the payment of the license fee after deduction therefrom of all county and municipal licenses and taxes and is substantially the same as the former statute. Section 7 provides the penalties for violations of the act and section 8 for the allotment of the revenues derived under the act. These sections are likewise substantially the same as the former statute. Section 9 is as follows:

> "This act shall not apply to hotel busses meeting trains or boats, nor to taxicabs, drays, transfer vehicles and other like city motor vehicles operating within incorporated cities or towns or the usual transfer delivery zone adjacent thereto, nor shall it apply to such vehicles operating between incorporated cities or towns where no portion of any state or county highway is traversed in said operation."

Section 9½ provides:

> "Nothing in this act shall be construed to apply to nor to levy a license upon that part of the gross income from the operation of any motor vehicle earned on account of carrying United States mail or parcels post under any contract with the United States government entered into prior to the first day of May nineteen hundred twenty-five."

Section 12, referred to in the former decision as the saving clause, is the same as section 11 of the former statute.

It is insisted by the petitioner that the exclusion from the definition of the term "operator" in section 1 of those who solely transport persons by motor vehicle to and from or to or from public schools and of those who solely transport their own property or employees or both and of those who transport no persons or property for hire or compensation constitute unlawful exemptions; that the exemptions provided for in section 9 of hotel busses, etc., and other like city motor vehicles operating within incorporated cities or towns, are unlawful, and that the designation of "the usual transfer delivery zone adjacent to" incorporated cities or towns is void for vagueness; and that the exemption in section 9½ of that part of the gross income of operators derived from United States mail and parcel post contracts entered into prior to the first day of May, 1925, is unlawful. It is urged that the said exemptions are in violation of sections 11 and 21 of article 1 of the state Constitution; that the allotment of one-half of said revenues to the counties in the state is in violation of section 12 of article 11, which prohibits the Legislature from imposing taxes on counties or the inhabitants thereof for county purposes; that the alleged unlawful provisions of the act are inseparable from the remainder and invalidate the entire statute; that the act as a whole is obnoxious to section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution, which, among other things, prohibits the Legislature from passing local or special laws for the assessment or collection of taxes; or granting to any corporation, association, or individual any special or exclusive right, privilege, or immunity, and exempting property from taxation. It also is contended that the said act violates the Fifth and Fourteenth amendments of the federal Constitution.

[1, 2] Considering first the objections to the several provisions of the act and then to the act as a whole, it will be noted that the exemptions provided for in section 1 have been determined in the Bacon Service Corporation Case to be lawful exemptions. It will also be noted that in section 9 of the act sightseeing busses are not exempted and that said section as re-enacted makes more certain the intention of the Legislature to exempt from the provisions of the act only those motor vehicles for hire which are operated within the limits of incorporated cities. It was doubtless contemplated by the Legislature that many operators might operate both within and without incorporated cities and towns. This might be true as to many motor vehicles mentioned in section 9. If any of those motor vehicles should be operated for hire as a business and not incidentally on the public highways outside of incorporated cities, it would seem to be clear that they would be subject to the license tax. This conclusion is fortified by a consideration of the terms of section 4 of the act, which provides for a deduction from the license tax of all sums paid by any operator on account of county or municipal taxes or licenses. It is thus made plain that it was the intention to exact the license fee from those only who use the public highways outside of incorporated cities in the conduct of their business, and that as to those whose business is operating exclusively within such cities the license is not required, this on the theory that the latter are or may be called upon to respond to a license tax or other exaction imposed for like purposes by the municipality itself, and that as to those operating both within and without incorporated cities they should receive a credit in their state license tax for whatever amount they are required to pay as county and municipal licenses and taxes. There would seem to be nothing unfair or unjust in the license plan thus laid out by the statute. We are of the opinion that the exemptions and classifications provided for in section 9, when read in conjunction with the rest of the act, do not amount to arbitrary action or unlawful discrimination on the part of the Legislature.

[3] In connection with the return to the writ herein, a stipulation of facts was filed from which it appears that at the time of and for more than six months prior to the filing of the stipulation on December 24, 1925, there were and are numerous persons, firms, associations, and corporations operating motor vehicles on the public highways for hire who are exempted from the license tax imposed by the act in question. But it does not appear that those who were and are so operating and are so exempted do not fall within the classification of those who are lawfully exempted. It also appears in the stipulation that the type of motor vehicles used by the exempted classes is similar to the type used by licensed operators. This fact we deem immaterial. It is not the type of vehicle, but the peculiar nature of the business conducted upon and over the public highways, that justifies the classification of the statute for licensing purposes.

[4, 5] Again, it appears in the stipulation that numerous business concerns, such as lumber and building material dealers, use the public highways for the transportation of their merchandise and add the cost of cartage to the price of the material delivered. These facts might be sufficient upon which to separately classify such use for the purpose of regulation or license or both, but they would not necessarily compel their inclusion in the classification singled out by the statute of those engaged in the business of using the public highways for the transportation of persons or property for hire. In exercising its power to classify the Legislature has a wide discretion. The presumptions are in favor of the validity of the legislative determination, and it will not be overthrown unless it is palpably arbitrary. County of San Luis Obispo v. Murphy, 162 Cal. 588, 123 P. 808, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 712; 5 Cal. Jur. pp. 832, 833, and cases cited.

[6, 7] It also appears from said stipulation that "the usual transfer delivery zone" outside of incorporated cities referred to in section 9 of the act is traversed by public highways upon and over which certain exempted operators operate their motor vehicles for hire. If such operators be lawfully exempted, no complaint may, of course, be made. But if they belong to the class of operators who conduct their business within the limits of incorporated cities and who desire to engage in such business also in county territory adjacent to said cities, it would seem to be impossible for them to determine to what extent the public highways in the adjacent outside territory would be in the "usual transfer delivery zone." We fail to be cognizant of any standard of measurement by which an operator could foretell the extent of any such "zone" and be certain that he was not transgressing the law when he proceeded to conduct his business on the public highways therein. No reason has been suggested by the respondent for the inclusion of said clause in the statute. It is unquestionably void for vagueness. In re Peppers, 189 Cal. 682, 209 P. 896. But its invalidity cannot affect the remainder of the act when considered in its entirety. The clause is merely incidental to the main purposes of the act and is separable therefrom. In view of section 12 of the act it should be wholly disregarded in the enforcement of the statute. Hewitt v. Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 P. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750.

[8] It also appears from the stipulation that there are numerous persons, etc., operating upon and over said public highways and carrying United States mail and parcels post for hire under contracts with the United States government entered into prior to the first day of May, 1925. As we understand the petitioner's contention on this branch of the case, it is that if it be within the power of the Legislature to classify for purposes of legislation the revenues derived from United States mail and parcels post contracts, still the exemption provided for in section 9½ is invalid for the reason that it purports to exempt only the revenues from such contracts as were entered into prior to May 1, 1925, thus unlawfully discriminating, so it is claimed, against operators whose contracts were entered into after that date. It is assumed that the revenues from such contracts may be subjected to the license tax as an exaction by the state for the maintenance of the public highways. See Dickey v. Turnpike Co., 37 Ky. (7 Dana) 113; 31 Cyc. 975. If so, we think there is a reasonable basis for their separate classification for the purposes of legislation. It has been held that a mail contractor is not a common carrier but is rather a public agent of the United States employed in performing a governmental function. A. T. & S. F. R. Co. v. United States, 225 U. S. 640, 32 S. Ct. 702, 56 L. Ed. 1236; 31 Cyc. 999. When he acts in the dual capacity of a governmental agent and an ordinary operator for hire, that portion of his revenues which is derived from his mail contracts would seem also to be the proper subject of legislative classification. It was undoubtedly the intention to make the statute apply prospectively and thus to avoid interference with a public service under existing contracts. The Legislature may have considered that in any event the powers of the Postmaster General extend only to the authorization of mail carrying contracts for limited periods. R. S. 3966 [U. S. Comp. St. § 7459]. It may also have considered that in fixing May 1st, which was several days after the measure was finally adopted by both houses of the Legislature, as the dividing point of time, sufficient notice was thereby afforded to contractors carrying United States mail and parcels post and to prospective contractors to take into account the proposed license tax in entering into new contracts. Whether or not it would be legal notice we deem unimportant. It might have been more in accordance with precision in legislation to have fixed the dividing point at the effective date of the statute, but it may not be said that in designating May 1st any unlawful discrimination was thereby effected.

No additional facts set forth in said stipulation call for further remark. What was said in the Bacon Service Corporation Case, supra, as to the effect of section 12 of article 11 and other provisions of our Constitution in relation to the statute in question, sufficiently disposes of petitioner's contentions. When the statute is construed in the light of that case and of the foregoing discussion, we are satisfied that no unlawful exemptions are incorporated in the act, and when the fatally vague and indefinite clause in section 9 is stricken the statute is a complete expression of the legislative will as ascertained from the language thereof. As such it contravenes no provision of the state or federal Constitutions.

The many authorities cited by the petitioner have been noted. The Attorney General does not dispute the rules therein laid down, but only their applicability to the case in hand. We find in none of them, when carefully examined and well considered, anything inconsistent with the conclusions herein expressed.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

In re PARROTT'S ESTATE. (S. F. No. 11663.)

1. Taxation 🔑895(6).

Where comaker of joint and several note paid his one-half of debt before the one-half owed by deceased comaker was paid, discharged portion could not be treated as an unsatisfied obligation of deceased comaker in determining inheritance tax.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑241.

Allowance of full amount of indebtedness on joint and several note against estate of deceased maker did not absolve surviving maker from obligation, nor extinguish right of heirs to compel contribution.

3. Taxation 🔑895(6).

Within Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1913, p. 1066), a "debt" is one which has actual existence.

4. Taxation 🔑895(6).

Allowance of claim against estate of deceased for full amount of note of which deceased was comaker did not have conclusive effect of judgment, but was subject to attack in inheritance tax proceedings, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1636.

5. Taxation 🔑895(6).

In cases of doubtful validity of deduction in determining inheritance tax, question may be postponed until doubt is resolved.

6. Taxation 🔑864.

Only property existing at time of death is subject to tax, under Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1913, p. 1066), and right to the tax accrues then, but tax may be thereafter determined, and then relates back to time of death.

7. Statutes 🔑245—Interpretation of taxation act should not ignore legislative intention, or make its application impractical, unfair, or unreasonable (Civ. Code, §§ 4, 3542).

Interpretation of taxation act should not be with hostility, nor with intent to ignore legislative intention, nor make its application impractical, unfair, or unreasonable, in view of Civ. Code, § 3542, requiring interpretation of statute to be reasonable, and section 4, requiring interpretation of statute to be liberal to effect its objects and to promote justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Mary Emilie Parrott, deceased. From an order confirming the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, John Parrott, Jr., and another, as executor and executrix of said estate, appeal. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Dion R. Holm and A. W. Brouillet, both of San Francisco (Wesley E. Marten, Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento, of counsel), for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. Mary Emilie Parrott died March 1, 1922, a resident of the county of San Mateo, this state. The fair market value of her estate was appraised by the inheritance tax appraiser at $1,301,470.69. The sole question presented by this appeal is whether the appraiser should have made a deduction of $260,000, as evidenced by a joint and several promissory note made by her and her comaker from the market value of said estate, instead of a deduction of but one-half of said amount, to wit, $130,000, which deduction was allowed by him as a debt owing by her at the time of her demise. The appeal was taken from that portion of the order of the court confirming the inheritance tax appraiser's report allowing a deduction of but $130,000.

The case is submitted upon an agreed statement of facts. Decedent left a brother surviving her, Joseph A. Donohoe. Prior to her death she and her said brother made, executed, and delivered their joint and several promissory note secured by a mortgage upon real property owned by them in equal undivided interest to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, or order, in the principal sum of $340,000. At the date of decedent's death said promissory note of $340,000 had been drawn upon by decedent and her said brother, in equal amounts, to the extent of $260,000, which latter sum constituted the joint and several indebtedness of said decedent and her said brother, and was due and payable at the date of the death of the former. In due course thereafter, said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, mortgagee, filed its claim against the estate of said Mary Emilie Parrott, deceased, for the full amount owing on said note, to wit, $260,000. On September 20, 1922, the claim was allowed by the executor and executrix and subsequently was allowed and approved by the court. Thereafter the principal sum due on said note was increased to $287,000. The solvency of Donohoe at all the times herein mentioned is an admitted fact.

On January 9, 1925, pending the settlement of the estate of Mary Emilie Parrott, deceased, Joseph A. Donohoe, the comaker, paid individually to said Hibernia Savings & Loan Society one-half of the entire joint and several obligation of himself and decedent, which payment included $143,500 as principal, and $509.20 as interest, aggregating $144,009.20. On March 10, 1925, the heirs and successors in interest of decedent paid on account of the balance due on said joint and several transaction $130,932.75 and agreed to pay the balance of the principal and interest to said note holder and mortgagee and to hold said Joseph A. Donohoe harmless from any liability thereon.

[1, 2] The facts of the case speak in complete vindication of the trial court's action. It is the stipulated fact that decedent and her brother owned in equal undivided interests real property located at Market and Taylor streets, city and county of San Francisco, the value of which was $1,000,000. This valuation admittedly gave them as tenants in common an equity in excess of $600,000 over and above the principal sum of said note and mortgage. As owners of said real property they jointly and severally executed the note and mortgage and received $260,000 in equal shares for the use and benefit of each. Mary Emilie Parrott died March 1, 1922. About seven months thereafter the claim of the mortgagee for the full amount of principal and interest as evidenced by said note was presented to the estate and approved as provided by the probate law. On January 9, 1925, pending the administration of said estate, and at a time before the estate had paid any inheritance tax whatever, also before the appraiser had made his report in said matter, the comaker, Joseph A. Donohoe, jointly and severally liable with said Mary Emilie Parrott, paid said note holder and mortgagee $144,009.20, which sum was in full of his one-half liability on account of the principal sum and interest then due on said note and mortgage. Two months thereafter the heirs and successors in interest of decedent paid on account of themselves upon the principal then due $130,932.75, "and assumed and agreed to pay the balance of the principal and interest upon said note and mortgage, and to hold said Donohoe safe and harmless from any liability therefrom." Thus the mortgage lien upon the interest of said Donohoe and the heirs of Mary Emilie Parrott was discharged with the exception of an unpaid balance owing from said heirs to said mortgagee. It will be observed that Joseph A. Donohoe, whose solvency at all times mentioned in the proceedings was admitted, paid one-half of the entire joint and several indebtedness before the inheritance tax appraiser made his computation and report showing any deductible indebtedness from the value of the estate. By the payment of one-half of said indebtedness, Donohoe, of course, acknowledged his liability to that extent, and by the heirs agreeing to hold him harmless as to the unpaid balance they also acknowledged the existence of a mutual understanding, which may well be implied as having existed from the inception of the transaction, that Donohoe's indebtedness arising out of said transaction was not to be considered as an indebtedness of the estate, but that said indebtedness was to be borne in equal amounts by the makers of said note, their heirs, or successors in interest. Donohoe and Mrs. Parrott owned a transferable, inheritable interest in the real property mortgaged, and, Donohoe having paid the whole of his portion of the indebtedness before Mrs. Parrott's heirs paid any part of theirs, the discharged obligation of Donohoe could not be treated as an unsatisfied obligation of Mrs. Parrott, or of her heirs or successors. The formal presentation and allowance of the indebtedness against the Parrott estate did not absolve Donohoe from his obligation, nor did it extinguish the legal right of the heirs of said comaker to compel contribution by him. The remedy given by statute to a creditor to pursue the estate of the comaker of a joint and several promissory note for the full amount thereof does not destroy the right of the heirs of said comaker to enforce contribution by the other maker. Donohoe's interest in the real property was at no time subject to an inheritance tax, while the interest passed by the decedent to her heirs was liable for such tax. His portion of the obligation, though unextinguished at the time of the death of decedent, but thereafter paid, could not be shifted from himself to the Parrott estate for the purpose of furnishing a fictitious basis of a tax reduction computation in favor of said estate. The mortgage debt was a lien upon the real property of Joseph A. Donohoe and the estate of the decedent, tenants in common, and no suit could have been maintained against the executor and executrix of said estate, unless a claim was first presented to the representatives of said estate. The debt never lost its joint and several character, no matter which obligor paid it, and if, as in this case, the surviving obligor paid his portion of said indebtedness, such portion could not be regarded or considered as a subsisting debt of the other.

[3, 4] The procedural rules of probate law do not possess judicatory powers in matters to which manifestly they were not intended to apply. The Inheritance Tax Act (St. 1913, p. 1066) is quite convincing to the point that a debt of which the act takes notice is one which has actual existence, and it does not attempt to artificially create a debt where in fact none exists. The fact that the note, as between the payors and payee, possessed the potentialities of an enforceable demand against either one of the debtors, affected his or her estate only in the proportion that he or she was required to pay it. The amount that the estate was required to pay on said obligation was the amount of the estate's indebtedness. No greater demand than was paid by the estate was enforceable against it. The allowance of the claim did not have the conclusive force and effect of a judgment. It was subject to attack. Section 1636, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Loshe, 62 Cal. 413.

[5, 6] In cases of doubtful validity the question of deduction may be postponed until the doubt is resolved. Matter of Dimon, 82 App. Div. 107, 81 N. Y. S. 428. The act, which is very comprehensive, expressly recognizes the impracticability of determining the indebtedness of a decedent at the time of death, and provides in numerous sections for the refund of taxes erroneously paid, as well as the assessment of the tax in cases where deductions for debts have been erroneously made. It is true that only property which exists at the time of the decedent's death is subject to the tax and the right of the state to the tax accrues at the time of death, but this does not mean that the tax may not be thereafter determined, and when so determined it relates back to the time of death. No question of after accrued or acquired property is presented by this case; the question here being the amount of the allowance that should be made as a debt reduction.

[7] We think there is no room in this case for the play of the strict construction rule. The order appealed from is sustained by a fair interpretation of the act. Revenue or taxation acts are not to be approached with a spirit of hostility and with a purpose of ignoring the intention of the Legislature, even though it should clearly appear in the body of the act. The maxims of jurisprudence that "interpretation must be reasonable" (section 3542, Civ. Code) and that a statute is to be "liberally construed with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice" (section 4, Civ. Code) are generally applicable and must be given effect. The interpretation of tax statutes must in all cases be reasonable. Riley v. Havens, 193 Cal. 432, 225 P. 275. No construction should be given a statute which would make its application impracticable, unfair, or unreasonable. Watson v. Greely, 69 Cal. App. 643, 232 P. 475.

The order is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1926. Rehearing Denied July 30, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑878(3).

Where statute describing one offense contains element not contained in statute describing another offense, acquittal of count under one statute will not operate as acquittal of count under other.

2. Criminal law 🔑199.

Acquittal of higher offense necessarily involves acquittal of lesser offense included therein, and therefore accused cannot be tried for another higher offense involving same lesser offense and be convicted thereon.

3. Criminal law 🔑199.

Where two higher offenses embracing the same lesser offense are presented to jury in alternative counts, rule that acquittal as to one, operating as acquittal of lesser offense included therein, is bar to conviction of other, is not applicable, in view of Pen. Code, § 954.

4. Criminal law 🔑878(3)—Charges held not identical, and hence acquittal of one was not acquittal of other (Pen. Code, §§ 244, 245).

Count charging assault with caustic chemical under Pen. Code, § 244, held to state offense not completely identical with count under section 245, alleging that accused feloniously placed and threw corrosive acid and caustic chemical at another likely to produce great bodily injury, and hence acquittal under one count was not acquittal under other.

5. Indictment and information 🔑119.

Statement in second count of indictment, based upon Pen. Code, § 245, that it was statement of same offense charged in first count under section 244, might be disregarded as surplusage, where obvious meaning was that it was statement of same transaction.

6. Assault and battery 🔑48.

Violation of Pen. Code, § 244, denouncing assault with caustic chemical, does not require that great bodily harm be or may have been caused.

7. Assault and battery 🔑74.

Indictment under Pen. Code, § 245, for assault with means likely to produce great bodily harm, must aver facts necessary to show likelihood that great bodily harm would ensue.

8. Criminal law 🔑46—That mental and moral age of accused was that of child under 14 held not to affect responsibility for crime (Pen. Code, § 26, subd. 1).

That defendant's "mental and moral age" was under 14 did not affect her responsibility for crime under Pen. Code, § 26, subd. 1, as statute refers to physical age and not mental or moral age of accused.

9. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—In prosecution for assault with caustic chemical, where defense was accidental spilling of chemical, error, if any, in admitting testimony before grand jury relating to picking up bottle and cork held not prejudicial.

In prosecution for assault with caustic chemical, defended on ground that chemical was spilled accidentally upon injured person, error, if any, in admitting testimony of witness before grand jury, which was merely cumulative and related only to picking up bottle and cork, held not prejudicial.

10. Criminal law ⚷829(4)—Where theory of accidental spilling of chemical was covered, refusal of requested instruction as to accidental spilling while contemplating suicide held not error.

In prosecution for assault with caustic chemical, where defense that chemical was spilled on injured person accidentally was properly covered by instructions, refusal to give instruction to acquit if spilling occurred accidentally while accused was contemplating suicide held not error.

Seawell, J., and Waste, C. J., dissenting in part, but concurring in conclusion.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Grace Bernice Day was convicted of assault with a caustic chemical, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Max Lewis, of Los Angeles, and Anderson & Anderson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, J. The indictment contained two counts. The first count accused the defendant Grace Bernice Day of the crime of assault with a caustic chemical, a felony, committed as follows:

> "* * * on or about the 23d day of February, 1925, at and in the * * * county of Los Angeles, state of California, the said defendants, Grace Bernice Day and Carlyn Lundstrom, did willfully, unlawfully, maliciously, and feloniously place and throw upon the person of another, to wit, one Darby Day, the younger of that name, a human being, a certain corrosive acid and caustic chemical, to wit, nitric acid, with the felonious intent then and there and thereby to injure the flesh and disfigure the body and person of the said Darby Day."

Count 2 charged as follows:

> "For a further and separate cause of action, being a different statement of the same offense as that set forth in count 1 hereof, the said Grace Bernice Day and Carlyn Lundstrom did then and there willfully, unlawfully, violently, and feloniously place and throw a certain corrosive acid and caustic chemical, to wit, nitric acid, upon the head, body, and person of one Darby Day, the younger of that name, a human being, which said throwing and placing of said acid upon the person of the said Darby Day, as aforesaid, did then and there cause grievous and serious and permanent bodily injuries to the said Darby Day, and was then and there exerted against the said Darby Day by the said defendants by means likely to, and which did, produce great bodily injury to the said Darby Day."

The following verdicts were brought in by the jury:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendant Grace Bernice Day guilty of assault with a caustic chemical, a felony as charged in count No. 1. * * *"

And:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled action, find the defendant Grace Bernice Day not guilty as charged in count No. 2 of the indictment."

Carlyn Lundstrom was acquitted by the jury under both counts of the indictment. The defendant was sentenced to San Quentin for the term prescribed by law for the crime of assault with a caustic chemical.

The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict of guilty on the first count of the indictment. It was defendant's defense that she had purchased the nitric acid in question for the purpose of committing suicide; that while she and her husband were seated in an automobile in front of his home she uncorked the bottle preparatory to taking the acid; that her husband started the car abruptly, and by so doing caused the acid to be splashed both on himself and on her. It is admitted by the defendant that the bottle of nitric acid was in her hand at the time it was splashed or thrown upon her husband. The trial of the case therefore resolved itself into the question of whether the acid was accidentally splashed upon Darby Day or whether it was maliciously thrown upon him by his wife "with the intent to injure or disfigure the body and flesh" of said Darby Day. It will suffice to say that, in addition to the direct testimony of Darby Day, there was introduced in evidence testimony of circumstances attending and surrounding the occurrence tending to substantiate the theory of the prosecution that the acid was maliciously thrown. There is the outstanding and uncontradicted fact that, after the occurrence, the defendant immediately jumped into the waiting automobile driven by her sister, without stopping to see whether or not her husband had been seriously injured. This fact is scarcely compatible with the theory that the acid was accidentally thrown. There is also in evidence the fact that the defendant was familiar with the properties of veronal, and the fact that, if taken in large quantities, this drug would cause death. It is scarcely conceivable that the defendant would have selected nitric acid as a method of committing suicide when she had at her command the means of committing suicide in a much less painful manner.

[1] The claim is made by the defendant that, by the verdict of acquittal on count 2, she was acquitted of the offense charged in count 1. This claim is predicated upon the theory that there is such a complete identity of the offenses charged in the two counts of the indictment that an acquittal of one offense will operate as a bar to a conviction of the other offense.

It may be conceded that, if the two counts stated precisely the same offense, an acquittal upon one count would operate as an acquittal upon the other count. If, however, the statute describing one offense prescribes as an essential element the statement of a fact not prescribed by the statute describing the other offense, and if in the statement of the transaction in the different counts that fact is included in the statement of the transaction based upon the statute requiring it, and omitted in the statement of the transaction based upon the statute not requiring it, the verdict of acquittal upon one of the counts is not necessarily an acquittal upon the other. In such a situation the jury may well find that the fact required as an essential element of one of the offenses is not true, and therefore be required to render a verdict of acquittal upon that count, but, since that fact is not an essential element to constitute the other offense, be justified in rendering a verdict of guilty as to that count. It is not the great similarity in most of the facts constituting separate offenses, but the presence of a fact necessary in one offense and absent in another, that determines whether offenses are separate. Murphy v. United States (C. C. A.) 285 F. 801, 814; Gavieres v. United States, 220 U. S. 338, 342, 31 S. Ct. 421, 55 L. Ed. 489; Morey v. Commonwealth, 108 Mass. 433.

[2, 3] This is the test used to determine the validity of a plea of once in jeopardy interposed to a subsequent indictment after an acquittal or conviction upon one indictment. Of course, no plea of twice in jeopardy or former acquittal was or could have been made by the defendant in this action, inasmuch as she was tried but once. It should be noted, however, that all of the rules applicable to a plea of once in jeopardy do not have application to a determination of whether the offenses stated in different counts of an indictment are identical. Thus the rule, applicable to jeopardy, that an acquittal of a higher offense necessarily involves an acquittal of a lesser offense included therein, and that thereafter the defendant cannot be tried for another higher offense involving therein the same lesser offense, has no application to a situation where the two higher offenses are presented to the jury in alternative counts. People v. McDaniels, 137 Cal. 192, 69 P. 1006, 59 L. R. A. 578, 92 Am. St. Rep. 81; People v. Defoor, 100 Cal. 150, 34 P. 642. If an accused is acquitted after a trial upon an indictment containing but one count, the jury necessarily found that the elements composing a lessor offense included within the higher offense charged were absent, for otherwise it would have been their duty to convict the defendant of the lesser offense. However, if a defendant is acquitted upon one count of an indictment containing alternative counts, it does not follow that the jury found all of the elements essential to the offense stated in that count absent, but merely that they found absent the element or elements distinguishing the offense stated in that count from the offense stated in the alternative count.

Originally section 954 of the Penal Code did not permit the inclusion in one indictment or information of two or more different offenses, even if they were connected together in their commission and arose out of the same transaction. In 1915 it was amended to read as follows:

> "The indictment or information may charge two or more different offenses connected together in their commission, or different statements of the same offense, or two or more different offenses of the same class of crimes or offenses, under separate counts. * * *"

The evident purpose of this amendment was to widen the latitude permitted a prosecuting attorney in setting out the different offenses, which in his opinion the evidence before him at the time of drawing the indictment or information showed had been committed. To hold that, when two alternative counts are presented to the jury, an acquittal of a higher offense stated in one count necessarily involves an acquittal of the lesser offense included therein, and is a bar to the conviction of the higher offense set out in the alternative count, would practically nullify the beneficial object of the amendment. The true test as previously indicated is the presence of a fact necessary in one offense and absent in another.

[4] An application of this test to the pleadings here involved convinces us that the offenses are not completely identical and that the jury may well have acquitted the defendant of the crime charged in the second count, although at the same time finding her guilty of the crime charged in the first count.

[5] Despite the fact that the preamble to the second count states that this count is a statement of the same offense as that set out in count one, it is apparent that what was meant was that the second count was a statement of the same transaction. The statement may therefore be disregarded as mere surplusage. People v. Evanoff, 45 Cal. App. 108, 187 P. 54.

Clearly two separate and distinct offenses, described and designated by different Code sections, were attempted to be stated by the separate counts of the indictment. The two counts were obviously based upon separate sections of the Penal Code defining different offenses. In count 1 the defendant was charged with the crime of assault with a caustic chemical. In count 2 the crime is designated as assault by means and force likely to produce great bodily harm. Section 244 of the Penal Code, the basis of the first count, reads as follows:

"Every person who willfully and maliciously places or throws or causes to be placed or thrown, upon the person of another, any vitriol, corrosive acid, or caustic chemical of any nature, with the intent to injure the flesh or disfigure the body of such person, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years."

Section 245 of the Penal Code, the basis of the second count, reads as follows:

"Every person who commits an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, or in a county jail, not exceeding ten years, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both."

[6] An analysis of the two Code sections used as the basis for the two counts demonstrates that the elements requisite for a conviction under section 244 of the Penal Code are not identical with the elements required under section 245. Section 244 requires proof of the fact that the acid actually touched the person of another. No proof is required by section 245 that the means or force likely to produce great bodily injury was actually exerted against the person of another. Under section 244 the defendant could not be found guilty of the specific offense if the attempt to throw or place acid upon the person of another failed of fruition. Under section 245 the defendant would be guilty, although the assault was not actually consummated. By section 245 proof is required that the means or force used must be likely to produce great bodily injury. While it may oftentimes happen that the throwing of the acids described by section 244 of the Penal Code would have the result of producing great bodily injury, the fact that it does so, or even that it will have the properties of doing so, is not required by said section. The crime is complete if any quantity of acid so described, however small in quantity or however weak in strength and however incapable of producing great bodily harm, is thrown or placed upon the person of another, if done willfully and maliciously, with the intent to injure the flesh or to disfigure to the slightest extent the body of another. It is apparent, therefore, that the two crimes as designated and described by the two sections of the Penal Code are separate and distinct offenses, although they may well arise out of the same transaction.

[7] An examination of the statement of the offenses charged in the two counts discloses the fact that the differentiation made in the two offenses by the two Code sections has been made by the indictment in at least one respect, and this is sufficient to support the conclusion that the offenses are not identical. The prosecutor, in draughting the first count of the indictment, followed closely the language of section 244 of the Penal Code, and stated the offense in almost the identical language of the Code section. In the second count, in order to aver that the means and force was likely to produce great bodily harm, it was necessary, not only to allege that the means and force was likely to produce great bodily harm, but it was necessary to aver additional facts to substantiate this conclusion. The pleader did this by averring that, as a result of the means and force used, the complaining witness did suffer great bodily harm. Herein lies the distinction between the first and second count. To find the defendant guilty under the first count it was immaterial whether the victim did or did not suffer great bodily harm or whether the acid thrown had the property of causing great bodily harm. To find the defendant guilty under the second count it was necessary to find that the means and force used was likely to produce great bodily harm. In other words, if the jury believed that the acid thrown was not a means or force likely to produce great bodily harm, it was at liberty to acquit upon the second count and convict upon the first count. It is immaterial that the evidence may show that as a matter of fact the acid was means likely to produce great bodily harm, and that as a matter of fact the victim did suffer great bodily harm. The determination of this fact was for the jury. Carrignan v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 290 F. 189, 190.

[8] The court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial based upon affidavits filed after the trial of the case, to the effect generally that the mental and moral age of the defendant was that of a child under the age of 14 years. Section 26 of the Penal Code, subd. 1, is not susceptible of the constrained construction contended for by the defendant. Said section reads as follows:

"All persons are capable of committing crimes except those belonging to the following classes: 1. Children under the age of fourteen, in the absence of clear proof that at the time of committing the act charged against them, they knew its wrongfulness."

Said section clearly refers to the physical age of a child, and has no reference to the mental or moral age of an adult.

[9] The error, if any, in the permitting in evidence the testimony of Jesse Farr, who had died previous to the trial, taken before the grand jury, is not sufficient to warrant a reversal. His testimony, incorporated in the stenographic report of the proceedings before the grand jury, referred solely to the picking up of the bottle and cork, and was merely cumulative of evidence of other witnesses. Furthermore, defendant's defense was predicated solely upon the position that the acid was accidentally splashed upon her husband and not upon a denial that she had a bottle of nitric acid with her at the time and place charged. It cannot be said, therefore, that she was prejudiced by the introduction of this testimony.

[10] No error was committed by the trial court in refusing the instruction requested by the defendant that:

> "The court instructs the jury that suicide or an attempt to take one's life is not a crime in California. If you find that the defendant Bernice Day spilled the acid accidentally while endeavoring to open the bottle for the purpose of enabling her to take the acid to destroy herself, you shall acquit the defendant of the crime or offense charged in the indictment."

The real issue in the lower court was not whether the alleged acts as outlined in the indictment were done in an attempt to commit suicide, but whether they were accidentally done. If done accidentally, it was immaterial whether done pursuant to a plan to commit suicide or for any other reason. The instruction requested was therefore sufficiently covered by the following instruction given by the trial court:

> "The defendant Grace Bernice Day claims that the acid was spilled accidentally and that she had no intention of using it upon the person of her husband, Darby Day, Jr. If you find from the evidence that this is true, you must acquit the defendants, or if after due consideration of all the testimony you are not convinced of the guilt of the defendants beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, you must acquit them."

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; SHENK, J.; FINLAYSON, Justice pro tem.

CURTIS, J., deeming himself disqualified, does not participate in the foregoing.

SEAWELL, J. (concurring in conclusion but dissenting from a portion of majority opinion). I am in disagreement with the construction placed upon section 244, Penal Code, by the prevailing opinion, wherein it is said:

> "While it may oftentimes happen that the throwing of the acids described by section 244 of the Penal Code would have the result of producing great bodily injury, the fact that it does so, or even that it will have the properties of doing so, is not required by said section. The crime is complete if any quantity of acid so described, however small in quantity or however weak in strength and however incapable of producing great bodily harm, is thrown or placed upon the person of another, if done willfully and maliciously with the intent to injure the flesh or to disfigure to the slightest extent the body of another."

The section thus construed reads:

> "Sec. 244. Assaults with Caustic Chemicals. Every person who willfully and maliciously places or throws or causes to be placed or thrown, upon the person of another, any vitriol, corrosive acid, or caustic chemical of any nature, with the intent to injure the flesh or disfigure the body of such person, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years."

The purpose of said section is too evident to require discussion. It was clearly enacted to deter wicked and viciously disposed persons from injuring the flesh or disfiguring the body of a human being by the use of acids of any kind which contain caustic or corrosive properties sufficiently strong to accomplish the purpose of the person who throws them or causes them to be placed upon the body of another with the intent mentioned in said Code section. Caustic chemicals are thus defined by Webster's New International Dictionary:

> "1. Capable of destroying the texture of anything or eating away its substance by chemical action; burning; corrosive."

Vitriol and corrosive acids are known to possess properties similar to, if not identical with, those of caustic chemicals. The section is aimed at such chemicals as do harm to the human flesh, and is not directed against an adulteration, as the opinion holds, so weakened as to be utterly harmless. Society has suffered neither danger, damage, nor annoyance by the vicious throwing of harmless adulterations upon its citizens, but it has been outraged by the throwing of vitriols, corrosive acids, and caustic chemicals upon its citizens. Therefore we must conclude that the Legislature, by the enactment of section 244, was moved by a sense of legislative accomplishment, and was not wandering in a mere vacuity of purposelessness.

The crime consists in throwing upon the person of another any kind of vitriol, etc., that would ordinarily disfigure the flesh by burning by chemical action, and there is nothing either in its language nor in the reason for the legislation that can justify the inference that an adulteration containing any quantity of said acids, however infinitesimal, impotent, or harmless said adulteration may be, was intended to supply the ingredients of the crime. The throwing of "any vitriol, corrosive acid," etc., means vitriol and acids which contain the essential properties that characterize them as capable of doing the damage specifically mentioned in the statute.

It is an axiom of criminal law that a naked intent is not sufficient to constitute a criminal offense, however wicked the design of the accused may be.

To constitute the crime defined by said section 244, supra, there must be an accompanying overt act, intent, and the ability upon the part of the person accused to accomplish the act defined by statute. Had the appellant mistaken a vial of water for a vial of vitriol and thrown it upon the person intended to be injured, the crime described by said section 244 would not have been made out. Neither would it have been made out if the proof showed that a mere drop of vitriol, or any one of the other acids named in the statute, had been placed in a gallon of water and thus diluted to a degree that it was absolutely harmless to human flesh. If such had been the case, the ability to commit the offense was totally lacking, notwithstanding the evil intent.

Vitriol or caustic chemicals depend for their characterization upon the strength of the chief ingredients which enable them to fulfill their offices. When they lack such strength and are reduced to a state of harmlessness, they have lost their main characteristic.

The language of the opinion specifically referred to herein is not only obiter, in my opinion, but it is not a correct statement of the law. The latter reason has prompted my dissent from that portion of the opinion above reviewed.

I concur in the conclusion, however.

I concur: WASTE, C. J.

PEOPLE v. RICKARD. (Cr. 1369.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 21, 1926.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⚷236(11).

Evidence held to sustain conviction of illegal sale of intoxicating liquor.

2. Criminal law ⚷1037(1).

Assignment of error in misconduct of district attorney will be overruled, where transcript shows that point is trivial and no assignment of misconduct was made at the time.

3. Criminal law ⚷358—Where defendant claimed that he was on a hunting trip at time of alleged sale of liquor and until September 18th, excluding evidence that he stopped at a store on road to hunting grounds on September 18th held not error.

Where defendant, charged with illegally selling intoxicating liquor in afternoon of September 15th, claimed that he was on a hunting trip from the morning of September 15th until September 18th, sustaining objection to question whether defendant stopped and bought some groceries at store on road to hunting grounds on September 18th held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; L. D. Jennings, Judge.

Dr. Joseph Rickard was convicted of illegal sale of intoxicating liquor, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Staley and Ernest N. Clark, both of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. [1] The evidence shows that the intoxicating liquor alleged to have been sold by the defendant to J. B. Davis and Ralph Cooke was sold and delivered in the following manner: Cooke went to Rickard's ranch and gave him some money. Rickard then delivered to Cooke a gunnysack containing some article or package, which Cooke did not see. Cooke drove away with this package and delivered it to Fred Buck. Cooke did not look into the sack at all and did not see the contents. But the sack and its contents remained unchanged during all of the time while in Cooke's custody. Buck testified that the article received by him from Cooke at the stated time and place was a sack containing a gallon jug, which with its contents remained continuously and unchanged in his possession down to the time of the trial, except that a small amount of the contents had been taken out for analysis by a chemist. There was ample evidence that the jug contained whisky, and that the same was intoxicating liquor. Under appellant's claim that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, he specifies only that the witness Cooke did not see the contents of the sack or of the jug within the sack, and that there was a failure in the courtroom at the trial to identify the jug. It is sufficient to say in reply that the jug was identified, and that under the circumstances shown in the evidence it was not necessary that Cooke should have seen the contents of the sack.

[2] Appellant further complains that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct at the trial of this case. An examination of the parts of the transcript indicated by appellant's counsel shows that as applied to this record the point is trivial, and that no assignment of misconduct was made at the time.

[3] In Cooke's testimony, he fixed the time of his transaction with the defendant as being late in the afternoon of September 15, 1925. The defendant, on the other hand, testified that at about 10 o'clock that morning he left his ranch (where the sale was charged to have taken place), and did not return until the 18th. There were other witnesses in corroboration of this alibi. The only error assigned by appellant in addition to those above stated relates to the testimony of the witness Patton. Patton had a grocery store at a place on the road between defendant's ranch and the place to which defendant claims he went on his hunting trip. The court sustained an objection made by the district attorney to a question in which Patton was asked to say whether or not, on September 18th, defendant stopped at Patton's store and bought some groceries. The court sustained the objection on the ground that the evidence was not material in assisting to discover whether the offense charged was committed on the 15th day of September. It does seem

FERGUSON v. OILDALE MUT. WATER CO.

1. Appeal and error 🔑612(2).

Clerk may only certify judgment roll and notice of appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑653(1).

Trial court, and not appellate court, has authority to amend record itself, though appellate court may correct transcript to make it correspond to record.

3. Appeal and error 🔑659(4).

On suggestion of diminution of record, appellant cannot file orders of lower court not forming part of record on appeal, nor request supplemental transcript containing matters not made part of record.

4. Appeal and error 🔑649.

On application to trial court for authentication of items improperly included in clerk's transcript, respondent may object to inclusion in record before allowance thereof, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

5. Dedication 🔑19(2).

Subdivision of tract leaving streets throughout, and filing and recording map designating streets, with certificate attached stating reservation of streets to public purposes, held to amount to dedication.

6. Dedication 🔑16(1), 37—"Dedication" of land for public use consists of offer and acceptance, which latter may be either actual, or implied from user.

"Dedication" of property for public use consists of offer and acceptance, which latter may be actual as by formal acceptance by proper authorities, or implied as when used by public for length of time sufficient to show intent to accept.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dedication.]

7. Dedication 🔑53.

Where owner subdivides plat, street reserved for public use is merely subject to easement of public; ownership of soil being in owner of lots, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 831, 1112.

8. Dedication 🔑53.

Owner, subdividing tract into lots, with reservation of streets for public use, held not entitled to object to laying of water pipes in street, as ownership of soil had passed to purchasers of lots.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by Andrew Ferguson against the Oildale Mutual Water Company to enjoin excavating and laying water pipes through certain land. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich and J. Ogden Reavis, both of Bakersfield, for appellant.

W. A. McGinn, of Bakersfield (Claflin & Lambert, of Bakersfield, of counsel), for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant is a mutual water company. The plaintiff brought this action to obtain an injunction restraining the defendant from making excavations and laying water pipes through certain parcels of land alleged to belong to plaintiff. In addition to denying many allegations of the complaint, the answer alleges as a separate defense:

> "That on June 16, 1910, a map entitled 'Map of Wait's Subdivision' was filed in the office of the county recorder of Kern county by plaintiff; that the property set forth in plaintiff's amended complaint is particularly set forth and described in said map as reserved for public use for whatever public purpose they are intended; and said mentioned property * * * is set forth and designated on said map as streets and alleys respectively; that following the recordation of said map plaintiff made numerous conveyances of lots in said Wait's subdivision, in which conveyances reference was made to the said map; * * * that since June 16, 1910, the property described in plaintiff's amended complaint has been traveled over generally by the public, and is now being generally traveled over by the public; that on the 24th day of February, 1920, the board of supervisors of Kern county declared the property * * * to be public highways; that on the 16th day of May, 1921, the said board of supervisors of Kern county granted to defendant permission to lay water pipes in, along, and through the property."

The findings recited that the case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts and the court found that the plaintiff was not, at the times mentioned in the complaint, the owner of the parcels of land described therein, but that "said lots were and are public highways." Judgment was entered denying an injunction and awarding defendant its costs of suit. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment. The plaintiff filed with the clerk a notice stating that he had appealed from the judgment and requesting:

> "That a transcript of all the proceedings, records, and documents in said cause be made up and prepared, including the judgment roll, stipulation of facts, all exhibits, all rulings, instructions, statements, and minute orders of the court."

The clerk's transcript, certified by the clerk alone, is the only record brought up on appeal. It sets forth at length what purports to be the "stipulation of facts" upon which the cause was submitted to the trial court for decision.

[1-4] "It is competent for the clerk to certify only the judgment roll and the notice of appeal." Lake v. Harris (Cal. Sup.) 243 P. 417. Appellant suggests a diminution of the record and has applied for an order "permitting him to file a duplicate of those portions of the transcript now on file, to wit, stipulation as to the facts of the case, minute order of trial and submission, * * * accompanied by the certificate of the judge who tried the case that the same are correct." It does not appear that the trial judge has authenticated that portion of the record in the trial court now sought to be brought up or that appellant has taken any steps to procure an authentication thereof. "It is the court below, and not the appellate court, which has authority to amend the record itself, although the appellate court may correct the transcript in order to make it correspond to the record. Consequently an appellant cannot file, upon a suggestion of a diminution of the record, orders of the lower court which do not form any part of the record on the appeal, nor request a supplemental transcript containing matters which have not been made a part of the record." 2 Cal. Jur. 677; Espinosa v. Gould, 47 Cal. App. 316, 318, 190 P. 481. Upon application by appellant to the trial court for the authentication of items improperly included in the clerk's transcript, the respondent would have the right to object to the inclusion of any of such items in the record before the settlement and allowance thereof. Code Civ. Proc. § 953a; Lake v. Harris, supra. Waiving all defects in the record on this appeal, however, and giving full consideration to the agreed statement of facts, it clearly appears therefrom that plaintiff is not entitled to judgment.

[5] It appears from such agreed statement, in so far as material to the questions presented by this appeal, that the facts are as hereinafter stated. The plaintiff, being the owner of a certain tract of land, subdivided it into 68 lots, generally 50 by 100 feet in size, leaving convenient streets and alleys running through the tract. June 16, 1910, he filed and caused to be recorded in the office of the county recorder a map of such subdivision, showing the said lots, numbered from 1 to 68, and the said streets and alleys, designated as such on the map. Attached to the map was plaintiff's certificate stating that the map "particularly sets forth and describes all the parcels of land within said subdivision reserved for public use by their boundaries, courses, and extent for whatever public purpose they are intended, and also lots for sale by their numbers and dimensions." The plaintiff thereafter conveyed all but six of the lots to various persons. "All such conveyances have been made by reference to the said map." The streets designated "on said map have been at all times herein mentioned traveled over generally as highway by the public." May 16, 1921, the board of supervisors made an "order permitting the defendant herein to lay water mains in and along" said streets. Thereafter the defendant laid "pipes in and along" said streets "for the purpose of conducting water to its stockholders * * * and is now conducting water to its said stockholders of which there are nine in said * * * subdivision and intends to and will serve all people residing in said * * * subdivision who become members of the said defendant company." The plaintiff was, at all times mentioned, engaged, as a public utility, in the sale and distribution of water for domestic and irrigation purposes to various persons residing in the subdivision, and for that purpose he had laid water pipes in the streets thereof. The defendant's water pipes are located near the curbs on the opposite sides of the streets from the lots now owned by the plaintiff.

[6-8] It is clear that the plaintiff dedicated the streets in question to public use. A dedication consists of an offer and acceptance. "The acceptance may be actual or implied. It is actual when formal acceptance is made by the proper authorities, and implied when a use has been made of the property by the public for such a length of time as will evidence an intention to accept the dedication." Inyo County v. Given, 183 Cal. 415, 418, 191 P. 688, 690. "It is not necessary that the acceptance by the public be manifested by any direct action, ordinance, or declaration of the public authorities." Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 450, 181 P. 658, 660. It is not contended that the streets are not public highways, but that such highways are mere easements and that the title to the land over which they pass, subject to the easements, remains in the owner of the soil. This may be conceded. Porter v. City of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 515, 519, 189 P. 105. "An owner of land bounded by a road or street is presumed to own to the center of the way, but the contrary may be shown." Civ. Code, § 831. "A transfer of land, bounded by a highway, passes the title of the person whose estate is transferred to the soil of the highway in front to the center thereof, unless a different intent appears from the grant." Civ. Code, § 1112. As no different intent appears from the agreed statement of facts, it must be presumed that each conveyance made by the plaintiff transferred to the grantee "the soil of the highway in front to the center thereof." It follows that the plaintiff is not the owner of any of the lands in which the defendant maintains its water pipes, and therefore is not entitled to judgment.

It would serve no useful purpose to permit the appellant to file a supplemental transcript and his application therefor is denied.

BAIL v. GLANTZ. (Civ. 5391.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 17, 1926.)

1. Brokers 🔑53—Real estate broker is entitled to commissions if he set in motion events which without break in continuity proximately caused vendor and purchaser to agree, but not if he merely imparted information; "procuring or inducing cause."

Real estate broker is entitled to commissions if he was "procuring or inducing cause of sale," which means that he set in motion a chain of events, which, without break in continuity, caused vendor and purchaser to agree, and his efforts were proximate cause of agreement, but it is not enough that he contribute indirectly by imparting information tending to arouse interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Procuring Cause.]

2. Brokers 🔑54.

If, after broker initiates negotiations, seller takes completion of sale into his own hands, he is estopped to contend that broker has not produced purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy.

3. Appeal and error 🔑842(1), 1010(1).

Whether sale is primarily result of real estate broker's efforts is question of fact on which trial court's conclusions, sustained by substantial evidence, will not be disturbed.

4. Brokers 🔑86(4).

Evidence held to sustain finding that real estate broker was efficient and procuring cause of sale.

5. Brokers 🔑57(2).

Change by landowner in consummating sale in price or terms from those specified in broker's contract cannot impair right to commissions, and hence taking part payment in property rather than cash as specified did not defeat liability.

6. Brokers 🔑57(2).

Where landowner took charge of negotiations initiated by broker, and within time limited by broker's contract made binding agreement for disposal of land for other property and cash, when or whether transfers were consummated are immaterial to liability for commissions.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1).

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence as to value of real property is conclusive on appeal in suit for real estate broker's commissions.

8. Appeal and error 🔑1056(4).

In action for real estate broker's commissions, of all over specified sale price, exclusion of evidence of amount received from sale of property taken by owner as part payment held not harmful error, where trial court found market value of property on conflicting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by B. G. Bail against C. W. Glantz, to recover commissions claimed to be due on a sale of real property. From the judgment both plaintiff and defendant appeal. Affirmed.

Clarence A. De Lancey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Carl F. Wood, of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $1,000 claimed to be due as real estate commissions, and was given judgment for $500. Defendant has appealed upon the grounds that plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment for any amount and that the trial court erred in excluding a portion of defendant's evidence. Plaintiff, being dissatisfied with the amount of the judgment, has also appealed.

The written contract of agency between the parties, dated October 18, 1923, conferred upon plaintiff as agent, for a period of 15 days following the execution of the contract, the exclusive right to sell defendant's property, situate on the Trestle Glen road, Oakland, for the sum of $11,500, upon the following terms, to wit:

"All cash, or fifty-five hundred dollars ($5,500) cash; balance seven per cent. * * *"

Said contract further provided that:

"When the agents have produced a purchaser on the terms above set forth, or other terms acceptable to me, or if I deal either before or after the expiration of this contract with any person, to whose attention said property was brought through the efforts or services of the agents rendered hereunder during the life of this agreement, I will pay to said agents at their office in Oakland, California, a commission of all over the selling price above specified."

The trial court found:

"That plaintiff within said fifteen (15) day period produced a purchaser, to wit, one D. M. Stewart, on terms acceptable to defendant, and said property was brought to the attention of D. M. Stewart through the efforts and services of plaintiff, rendered by plaintiff during said fifteen (15) day period; that said defendant did sell said property to said D. M. Stewart on the 31st day of October, 1923, on terms acceptable to defendant at the price of twelve thousand ($12,000) dollars;" and that therefore plaintiff was entitled to a commission of $500.

The undisputed evidence shows that on October 31, 1923, and within the 15-day period fixed by the agency contract, defendant entered into a written agreement with Stewart, whereby defendant agreed to convey to Stewart the property mentioned in the agency contract subject to an incumbrance of $6,000, and Stewart agreed to pay to defendant the sum of $1,000 in cash and to convey to him property situate in the Alden tract, Alameda county. Soon after the date of the expiration of the agency contract, the transaction between defendant and Stewart was consummated in accordance with the terms of their agreement. The defendant contends that the findings above quoted are not supported by the evidence, in that there was no proof showing that plaintiff produced a purchaser, or that "said property was brought to the attention" of Stewart through plaintiff's efforts or services.

[1-3] Under a contract such as the one here considered, the rule is that the broker has earned his commission when it is shown that he was the efficient cause of the sale; and his rights are the same whether his activities constitute the origin or the ending of a continuous series of negotiations leading to the successful consummation of the sale. It is not enough that he contribute indirectly or incidentally to the sale by imparting information which tends to arouse interest, but it is sufficient if it be established that he set in motion a chain of events which without break in their continuity caused the buyer and seller to come to terms, that his efforts constituted the proximate cause of the meeting of the minds of the principals, and he will not be deprived of his commissions because the negotiations which are brought about and partially carried on by him are afterwards completed by the parties themselves or through some one else. Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 206 P. 653; Sargent v. Ullsperger, 54 Cal. App. 384, 201 P. 934. It is necessary for the broker to prove therefore that he was the efficient or procuring cause of the sale; in other words, it must appear that his efforts had to do with the meeting of the minds of the seller and buyer (Webster v. Parra [Cal. App.] 237 P. 804), but if, after he initiates the negotiations, the seller takes into his own hands the completion of the sale, the broker is so completely discharged from responsibility in the premises that the seller is estopped to contend against the broker's claims for commissions that the broker has not produced a purchaser who is ready, able, and willing to make the purchase. Constant v. Wallace, 62 Cal. App. 768, 217 P. 1081:

> "The expression 'procuring and inducing cause,' as used in the books, refers to the cause originating from a series of events that without break in their continuity results in the prime object of the employment of the agent." Roth v. Thomson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 180 P. 656, quoting approvingly the rule stated in Smith v. Preiss, 117 Minn. 392, 136 N. W. 7, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 820.

In any event the question of whether or not the sale is primarily the result of the broker's efforts is one of fact, and the trial court's conclusions thereon will not be disturbed on appeal if there be substantial evidence to sustain them. Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., supra.

[4] The testimony given by plaintiff was to the effect: That, after the execution of the agency contract, he advertised the property for sale, that he cleaned the premises, swept the house, mowed and watered the lawn, and made the place as attractive as possible for selling purposes. That on the afternoon of October 27, 1923, while he was upon the property showing it to prospective buyers, Stewart came in to inspect the same. That he pointed out to him the advantages of the property, including the workmanship, decorating, and materials, the fireproof roof, tiled bathroom, tiled sink, the breakfast room, and other attractive features. He also explained to him that the owner would install a furnace, an automatic water heater, and fence the back yard. He furthermore supplied Stewart with information as to the amount of the selling price, the terms of payment, and discussed with him the possibility of a trade. Plaintiff's testimony as to his interview with Stewart and the latter's inspection of the premises was corroborated generally by Stewart, although the latter disagreed to some extent in regard to the details of the information imparted to him by plaintiff. That same evening plaintiff informed defendant of Stewart's visit to the property, and, although at that time plaintiff did not know Stewart's name, told defendant of the interest this prospective buyer had taken in the property, but that he "did not come to anything definite before leaving." The next day Stewart, accompanied by his wife, returned to make further inspection of the property. When they arrived, plaintiff was temporarily absent, but defendant was there and engaged in a conversation with Stewart concerning a sale or trade of the property. Just as Stewart and his wife were leaving, plaintiff came upon the premises, and defendant asked him if he knew "that fellow," to which plaintiff replied, "Yes; that is the man that was here yesterday, or the day before, whichever it was, that I was telling you about, that had the little place to trade." Continuing the conversation, plaintiff and defendant discussed the location and value of the property Stewart had offered in trade, also defendant's intention to inspect Stewart's property and the probability of the consummation of the sale on the terms proposed by Stewart.

After defendant examined Stewart's property, another conversation took place between plaintiff and defendant, concerning the value of Stewart's property, in which defendant stated, in effect, in the presence of plaintiff's wife, that he was not having an easy task in making a trade with Stewart, whereupon plaintiff suggested that he would be glad to see what he could do with him. Defendant replied that he wanted plaintiff to "lay off of" Stewart, that he would "handle" him, and that the matter of plaintiff's commissions would be taken care of when the transaction was closed. On or about November 2d, defendant informed plaintiff that the agreement for the disposal of the property had been signed. Plaintiff expressed his pleasure, and added that he would put in his claim for commissions with the title company. Defendant told him, however, not to do so, because he did not want Stewart to know that he (defendant) was paying a commission; defendant further stating that plaintiff was entitled to a commission which he (defendant) would take care of "on the outside." About November 12th, after the conveyances between defendant and Stewart had been recorded, another conversation occurred between plaintiff and defendant, during which plaintiff demanded a settlement regarding his commissions. Defendant stated that, although he had intended to pay plaintiff about $300, he was unable to do so because of added expense in fixing up the trestle Glen property before Stewart would accept it. Defendant then asked plaintiff how much he expected. Plaintiff stated that he expected the commission called for by the contract, and defendant replied that in that event they could not settle at all, that, if plaintiff thought he could get that amount, to "go ahead." Thereupon plaintiff commenced this action.

It is our opinion that under the authorities hereinabove cited the evidence narrated was amply sufficient to warrant the trial court in concluding that plaintiff was the efficient and procuring cause of the sale of defendant's property, and therefore its findings to the effect that, within the limitation of time fixed by the contract, plaintiff produced a purchaser on terms acceptable to defendant, and that the property was brought to the attention of said purchaser through the effort and services of plaintiff, must be sustained.

[5, 6] Defendant further contends that there was no evidence of a sale of the property on October 31, 1923, claiming in this respect that the transaction between defendant and Stewart constituted an exchange of properties and not a sale, and moreover that the exchange was not consummated until after the limitation of time fixed by the agency contract; consequently plaintiff was not entitled to commissions. We think neither proposition is maintainable. Regarding the first one, a change made by the owner, when consummating the sale, in the price of the land or the terms of the sale from those specified in the broker's contract, cannot of itself affect or impair in any way the right of the broker to his commissions (Roth v. Thompson, supra); and, as to the latter proposition, the evidence shows that defendant, of his own accord, took charge of the negotiations with the proposed purchaser and within the period of time fixed by the agency contract entered into a binding agreement with him for the disposal of the same upon terms acceptable to defendant. It was immaterial, therefore, so far as plaintiff's commissions were concerned, when, if at all, the transfers of the properties were consummated. Wood & Tatum Co. v. Basler, 37 Cal. App. 381, 173 P. 1109; Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., supra; Twogood v. Monnette, 191 Cal. 103, 215 P. 542; Johnson v. Krier, 59 Cal. App. 330, 210 P. 966; Purcell v. Firth, 175 Cal. 746, 167 P. 379.

[7] Plaintiff and defendant both complain of the trial court's finding that the selling price of defendant's property was $12,000. It is evident, however, that defendant's acceptance of Stewart's real property in part payment of the purchase price for the property covered by the agency contract made it necessary for the trial court to determine the market value of Stewart's property at the time of the execution of the so-called exchange agreement of October 31, 1923, and much conflicting evidence was offered upon that subject. From all the facts and circumstances thus presented, the court concluded that defendant received for his property a value equivalent to a selling price of $12,000. In that state of the record the determination of the trial court is conclusive on appeal against both parties.

[8] The exclusion by the trial court of the evidence sought to be introduced by the defendant to show the net amount received by him from a subsequent sale of the Stewart property, if error, was not harmful. As above indicated, the material question for the trial court's determination was the market value of the Stewart property at the time defendant accepted it as part payment on the purchase price, and evidence of the subsequent selling price, if admissible at all to prove a prior market value, would have amounted to nothing more than another circumstance relating to an issue upon which a conflict of evidence already existed.

Finding no merit in either appeal, the judgment is affirmed. Neither side having prevailed on the appeal, and, the judgment being neither modified nor reversed, each side must bear his own costs of appeal.

1. Robbery 🔑20—Variance between indictment alleging robbery of personal property of certain person, and proof showing it belonged to such person's employer, held immaterial.

Variance between indictment alleging robbery of personal property of certain person, and proof showing it belonged to such person's employer, held immaterial, since charge of robbery may be sustained if property taken belonged to any person other than defendant.

2. Robbery 🔑17(5).

Under Pen. Code, § 956, erroneous allegation as to ownership of property is immaterial, if offense is otherwise described with sufficient certainty to identify act of robbery.

3. Criminal law 🔑1169(5)—Testimony of officer's conversation with defendant, regarding statement by latter's wife as to deposit of money with his mother, held not error as allowing wife to testify against him, where it was stricken (Pen. Code, § 1322, Code of Civ. Proc. § 1881).

Testimony of officer's conversation with defendant regarding statement by latter's wife as to his deposit of money with his mother, held not error as violating Pen. Code, § 1322, or Code of Civ. Proc., § 1881, by allowing wife to testify against defendant, where testimony was stricken and jury instructed to disregard it.

4. Criminal law 🔑407(1)—Admission of parents' statement as to defendant's deposit of money, allegedly obtained in robbery, with mother, held proper in showing his passive conduct in face of accusatory statement.

Admission of written statement by defendant's parents as to his deposit of money, alleged to have been obtained in robbery, with mother, which accompanied their return of money to officer and was subsequently shown to defendant, held proper as showing defendant's passive conduct in face of accusatory statement.

5. Criminal law 🔑1137(5)—Defendant, who failed to deny having given money allegedly obtained in robbery to mother, cannot complain of admission of statements as to delivery of such money to her.

Defendant, who while testifying did not deny having given money, allegedly obtained in robbery, to mother, but stated he was not sure of amount, cannot complain of admission of statements by wife and parents relative to delivery of such money to mother.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Franscisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

William R. Smith was convicted of first degree robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco (Austin Arnold, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. An appeal by defendant from a judgment of conviction of first degree robbery and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The sufficiency of the evidence upon which the conviction is based is not questioned, but appellant urges as grounds for reversal that there was a fatal variance between the allegations of the indictment and the proof in regard to the ownership of the property stolen from the victim of the robbery, and that the court erred in ruling upon the admissibility of certain evidence offered and received on behalf of the prosecution.

[1, 2] The indictment charged appellant with having robbed one Wilbur A. Johnson of the sum of $17,996, "the personal property of said Wilbur A. Johnson." The evidence proved that the money belonged to the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, a corporation, by whom Johnson was employed, but was in Johnson's possession at the time of the robbery, and that he was robbed of the same while on his way to deposit the money in the bank. The variance complained of was immaterial. It is sufficient to sustain a charge of robbery if the property feloniously and forcibly taken from the person of another belonged to any person other than the defendant; and under section 956 of the Penal Code an erroneous allegation as to ownership of the property is immaterial, if the offense is otherwise described with sufficient certainty to identify the act of robbery, the identity of the act of robbery being the same no matter upon whom the injury involved in the larceny which is included in the robbery might fall. People v. Anderson, 80 Cal. 205, 22 P. 139; People v. Nelson, 56 Cal. 77; People v. Clark, 106 Cal. 32, 39 P. 53.

The robbery occurred on the sidewalk on December 4, 1924, soon after Johnson had left the company's building on Sutter street and was proceeding toward the bank, accompanied by another employee of said company. Johnson was carrying the money, consisting of currency and silver, and also a parcel containing twenty-three $1,000 bonds, belonging to said company. He had gone only a short distance when he was robbed of the money and bonds by three men, two of whom brandished pistols, and, after striking Johnson on the head, felling him to the sidewalk, fled through an alley, scaled a wall, and entered an automobile, but in climbing the wall dropped the package containing the bonds. After entering the automobile, the robbers followed a circuitous route, and in their flight fired several shots at their pursuers. They finally abandoned their automobile and disappeared. The automobile, it was discovered, was owned by and registered in the name of appellant's wife, Mrs. R. Smith, 272 Faxon avenue, San Francisco. About two hours after the robbery, Mrs. Smith was summoned from her home to a neighbor's telephone, and, after holding a brief conversation over the phone, returned hurriedly to her home, stayed there a few minutes, departed, and did not return. Appellant and his wife were eventually traced to the residence of appellant's mother in Chicago, where they were arrested on December 27, 1924, and placed in the Chicago jail. While in jail there appellant made a full and complete confession, which was afterwards used against him at the trial. In that confession he related the details of the commission of the crime by himself and his two companions, the circumstances showing that it had been carefully planned, and the manner in which he and his wife had made their escape to Chicago. Afterwards, and during the trial, he attempted to repudiate the confession, claiming that the same was obtained through duress and as a result of physical violence inflicted upon him by members of the Chicago police department.

At the trial, Officer William McMahon of the San Francisco police department testified that, following the arrests, he went to Chicago and talked with Mrs. Smith while she was being detained in the Chicago jail. The purport of this conversation he was not allowed to reveal, but he further testified that soon afterwards he held a conversation with appellant regarding which the witness was interrogated as follows:

> "Q. Tell us what was said between you, and tell us who was present. A. There was just the defendant and I present; I asked him for an order to his mother for the $2,000 which I had gained information that he had given his mother.
> "Mr. Coghlan (Council for Appellant): I move that be stricken out as hearsay. * * *
> "The Court: The last portion may go out; information that he had gained from his mother (doubtless meaning his wife) that may go out, and you may proceed with your answer. A. And he refused to give me the order.
> "Q. Did you say anything to him about having any information of money lodged with his mother—deposited with his mother? A. I did.
> "Q. What did you tell him, and what did he say to you in answer? A. I told him that his wife told me * * * he had given his mother $2,000, and he said to me, 'If that dame told you that she's crazy.'"

Thereupon counsel for appellant, who had already objected to the witness relating any portion of the statement made by appellant's wife, moved to strike out the answer. After some discussion the court ruled that appellant's objection be sustained, counsel for the people remarking at the time: "Very well. Now then, that matter is stricken out then?" To which the court replied: "Yes, that may go out; the latter portion." The testimony given by Officer McMahon further shows that afterwards he obtained from appellant's mother $1,580 in cash and a written statement signed by her and her husband, reading as follows:

> "January 3, 1925.
> "The $1,580 that was turned over to William McMahon at 2849 North Racine avenue, Chicago, was left here at my home by my son William Schmidt (which was appellant's true name) about three weeks ago. At that time there was about $2,000 out of which at various times he took the difference."

The testimony of McMahon further shows that after appellant had been brought back to San Francisco he was asked if he had given any money to his mother or to anybody else in Chicago for safe-keeping, and he replied that he had not; that he was then asked, "Then if your mother says you did she is mistaken?" and he answered that she was; that he (McMahon) then exhibited to the appellant the $1,580 in cash and the written statement obtained by him from appellant's mother and father, and asked appellant how he accounted for them, to which he made no reply. The money and the written statement, after being properly identified, were offered and received in evidence over appellant's objection. Appellant became a witness in his own behalf, and testified, in substance, that he had not participated in the robbery, but was intimately acquainted with James F. Ryan, one of the three men charged with the offense, whom he knew to be an ex-convict, and who at the time of the trial was a fugitive from justice; that Ryan had borrowed Mrs. Smith's automobile on the morning of the robbery, and shortly after the noon hour, which was subsequent to the robbery, Ryan met appellant on the street by telephone appointment, and told him that the automobile had broken down and was to be found at a certain garage; that at the same time Ryan paid to him the sum of $2,500 in cash in liquidation of a gambling debt; that soon afterwards appellant learned of the robbery through the evening newspapers, and, having learned also that his wife's automobile had been used in the perpetration of the crime, became terrified, and with his wife left San Francisco that night for Los Angeles, later going to Chicago. He further testified that when he left San Francisco he had in his possession, besides the $2,500 paid to him by Ryan, the sum of $400. Upon cross-examination he was asked, "And you spent about $900 in Los Angeles for wearing apparel, which would reduce that amount to $2,000, is that right?" His response was, "I guess that is correct; yes." He was then asked, "Did you give to your mother $2,000?" and he answered, "Well, I don't remember the exact amount."

[3] Appellant contends that it was error for the trial court to permit McMahon to relate to the jury the conversation which took place with appellant regarding the statement made by appellant's wife as to the deposit of the money with appellant's mother; that it was in effect allowing appellant's wife to testify against him in violation of section 1322

of the Penal Code and subdivision 1 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The point is without merit. The record shows quite clearly that the testimony complained of was, on appellant's motion, stricken out, and that the jury was instructed at the conclusion of the evidence that it should disregard and discard every impression or idea suggested by questions as to which objections had been sustained, and that it should not consider evidence which had been excluded by the court. The words "the latter portion," which were included in the court's second ruling striking out the objectionable testimony, when fairly interpreted in light of the previous ruling of the court excluding the same testimony, could have referred to no other matter than the information imparted to McMahon by appellant's wife.

[4] Neither was it error, as appellant claims, to admit in evidence the written statement made by appellant's mother and father accompanying the return of the money. For the purpose of showing appellant's passive conduct in the face of an accusatory statement, it was necessary and proper for the prosecution to reveal the contents of the statement. People v. Ong Mon Foo, 182 Cal. 697, 189 P. 690; People v. Ayhens, 16 Cal. App. 618, 117 P. 789.

[5] Moreover, we believe that appellant is not in a position to complain of the admission in evidence of the statements made by his wife and by his mother and father regarding the delivery of the money to his mother, for the reason that, while testifying in his own behalf, in response to a direct question, he did not deny having given the money to his mother, but stated that he was not sure of the amount.

It is our opinion that the record is free from error. The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CLARKE. (Cr. 1318.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 9, 1926.)

1. Assault and battery ⚷92—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for assault with deadly weapon.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for assault with deadly weapon.

2. Assault and battery, ⚷56.

Prior threats to do bodily harm are not essential element of assault with a deadly weapon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Charles W. Clarke was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Perry, A. Q. Lomba, and Hugh K. Forsman, all of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, of San Francisco, for the People.

NOURSE, J. The defendant was convicted following a trial before a jury upon an information charging him with the crime of assault upon the person of Jack Elliott with a deadly weapon. He made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and from that order and from the judgment which followed the verdict he has appealed upon a typewritten record.

[1] The evidence is that on September 26, 1925, the defendant drove his automobile at a high rate of speed to the home of Elmer Davis in the city of Oakland at about 1 o'clock p. m. while the Davis family, including Jack Elliott, a son-in-law of Elmer Davis, were at their luncheon. The defendant left the motor of his car running and, after kicking in the front door, entered the house carrying a loaded shotgun. As he came toward the kitchen where the members of the family were gathered, they scattered to different parts of the house, leaving Elliott alone in the kitchen. As the defendant came through the hall door into the kitchen carrying the gun, he pointed it directly at Elliott, who, in attempting to escape, fell over a chair and into a pantry. As he did so the defendant demanded that he come out, but before anything else occurred two other members of the Davis family had seized the defendant from behind and taken the gun from his possession. The gun used by the defendant was an automatic shotgun loaded with No. 4 shot and having one shell in the chamber and three in the magazine with the safety off and the gun ready to shoot at the time it was taken from the defendant.

The only explanation of defendant's conduct is that he was the divorced husband of one of the daughters of Elmer Davis, and that he was incensed because he had been required to pay alimony to her, and that he was at the time looking for his former wife for the purpose of doing some injury to her, but that he did not threaten nor intend to assault the complaining witness Elliott.

The evidence which we have recited is all uncontroverted and amply sustains the verdict of guilty. In fact, it would have been impossible for the jury to have justly returned any other verdict. In support of the appeal the appellant insists that the verdict should be overturned because there was no evidence showing that the appellant made any threats against Elliott and because evidence was admitted prejudicial to the appellant relating to threats which he had made against members of the Davis family, and particularly against his former wife.

In relation to the second point, it appears that objections were made to inquiries directed to a witness covering alleged threats against the members of the Davis family and that when these objections were overruled the witness answered that he had not heard any such threats. Later in the course of the trial the same inquiry was directed to another witness under examination and all the testimony covering that subject-matter was received without any objection on the part of the appellant.

[2] As to the first point, the appellant insists that, as he did not have Elliott particularly in mind at the time he called at the house and had not previously made any threats against Elliott, the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. The answer is, of course, that prior threats to do bodily harm were not an element of the crime of assault with a deadly weapon. The evidence is without conflict that the appellant entered the room in a highly excited manner, pointed a loaded shotgun directly at Elliott, who tumbled into a pantry in his haste to escape the threat which the gun itself carried; that while lying upon the floor of the pantry the appellant ordered him to get out of there, but was stopped from taking any further action by other members of the family.

The whole record discloses without the slightest doubt that the appellant was fairly tried and fairly convicted.

Judgment and order affirmed.

1. Waters and water courses 🔑137.

Occasional suspension or interruption of use of water by placing obstructions, immediately removed by those claiming right of use, is not sufficient to break continuity of exclusive possession so as to toll statute.

2. Waters and water courses 🔑137.

Interruption of adverse use of water under claim of right must be open and upon claim of right, or so notorious as to constitute such claim, in order to toll statute.

3. Judgment 🔑600½.

Judgment in suit to determine water rights held not res judicata of rights claimed under adverse user subsequent to judgment.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑152(8).

In suit to quiet title to water, evidence held sufficient to show user adverse to plaintiff's claim.

5. Waters and water courses 🔑137.

One complying with essential elements of adverse user of water amounting to prescription for statutory period may acquire permanent right to use water.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑129.

Right to water by adverse user may be acquired as against claimant under prior appropriation, or as riparian owner, purchaser, or one claiming right by prescription itself, or by acquisition by any other method.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑129.

Right of appropriator of water may be lost in whole or in part by adverse possession and user by another amounting to prescription.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑137.

Where notorious, exclusive, and adverse use of water under claim of right has continued for statutory period for commencement of actions for recovery of real property, law will presume grant of right so held.

9. Waters and water courses 🔑129.

Private corporations holding water as public use, as well as public utility corporations holding title to property as public use, can lose water rights by prescription.

10. Adverse possession 🔑8(1).

Where public lands have been devoted to public use, person cannot obtain title thereto by prescription founded on adverse occupancy.

11. Waters and water courses 🔑142—Interest in running water is not equivalent to interest which may be acquired in lands.

Interest in water of stream is not equivalent to interest which may be acquired in lands, because running water cannot be subject of private ownership, right to its use only being subject to acquisition, with no property in corpus of water itself.

12. Waters and water courses 🔑151.

Interest in water of stream is dependent upon user, and may be lost upon cessation of use, in view of Civ. Code, § 1411.

13. Waters and water courses 🔑151.

Right of irrigation district to use waters of running stream may be lost upon cessation of use.

14. Waters and water courses 🔑151.

Right of public and each individual thereof to continue use of water which has been devoted to public use may be lost by abandonment.

15. Waters and water courses 🔑143.

Right in waters acquired by adverse user is limited to amount reasonably necessary for beneficial purpose for which it has been diverted, and no title can be acquired to excess.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Big Rock Mutual Water Company against the Valyermo Ranch Company and others to quiet title to water. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Shenk, J., dissenting.

William T. Kendrick and Victor H. Kendrick, both of Los Angeles, and Kibbey & Stoneman, for appellant.

John C. Packard, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

C. F. Holland, of Los Angeles, for respondent Lemon.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title to all the water of Big Rock creek, formerly known as Rio Del Lano, a natural nonnavigable stream situated in Los Angeles county. The stream has its source in the Sierra Madre mountains, and, flowing in a northerly direction to the plains below, known as Antelope valley, it passes what is designated in the record as "Sweet Tunnel." The complaint recites that plaintiff is the owner of all the waters of said stream which naturally flow by the head of said tunnel whenever the same does not exceed 2,000 standard miner's inches. Further allegations are to the effect that the defendants and each of them claim an estate or interest and a right to use some of the waters adverse to the plaintiff; that each of them is without any right whatever, as they have no interest in the water; that notwithstanding this fact defendants have entered upon the said stream and diverted large quantities of its water so belonging to plaintiff and appropriated it to their own use and deprived the plaintiff thereof. The prayer of the complaint is that each of them be required to set forth the nature of his claim so that all of the adverse interests of the various defendants may be determined by the action. Answers were duly filed on behalf of the defendants Valyermo Ranch Company, a corporation, Levi F. Noble, R. B. Pallett, and a separate answer was filed on behalf of J. Royal Lemon, successor in interest to one Bryon H. Kent, setting forth the respective interests of these defendants.

The Valyermo Ranch Company, by its answer, in substance alleges that its lands are riparian to the waters of the stream and within the watershed thereof, and that it has an interest in and a right to use said water. It denies that plaintiff was or ever has been entitled to the exclusive or any possession or use thereof as it flows past the said tunnel. It admits that it takes and for many years last past has taken water from said stream through pipe lines for distribution on its lands, and has been using the same to irrigate alfalfa and deciduous fruit trees in an economical way, and that the alfalfa and trees are wholly dependent upon the water so taken for their growth and cultivation; that it has, during the last five years, actually appropriated and taken through the said pipe lines from the point of its diversion at all times during the irrigating season, openly, notoriously, and adversely to all the world and adverse to plaintiff and its stockholders and their predecessors in interest, a minimum of 180 inches of water and as much more up to the capacity of said pipe lines as has been necessary to be applied to its irrigable lands and for the watering of its livestock and for its domestic uses; that the lands owned by it are of a porous character and require for their proper irrigation and for the proper advantages and cultivation of the trees and crops all of the said 180 standard miner's inches of water during the irrigation season, and all of the same have been used for beneficial purposes; that said rights are claimed by the company as the owner of lands riparian to said stream and by virtue of actual appropriation; that said company, as riparian proprietor of land adjacent to said stream, is entitled to take said minimum of 180 inches and upwards to the capacity of said pipe lines at its point of diversion from the waters of said stream, the same to be applied to the uses and purposes set forth. It is then alleged that it is the owner of a minimum of 180 inches of water during the irrigating season and up to a maximum of 225 standard miner's inches or the capacity of its pipe lines. Substantially the same allegations are pleaded on behalf of defendant Robert B. Pallett. On his behalf it is alleged that for more than five years last past he has been the owner and in the possession of certain described lands adjacent and riparian to the stream and within its watershed, all of which lands are up stream and above the lands belonging to plaintiff or its stockholders; that he is now and has been diverting for the period stated, during the summer or irrigating season, a minimum of 150 standard miner's inches of water through an open ditch for the purpose of cultivating fruit trees, cereals, alfalfa, and like crops grown upon his lands; and that his use has been made openly, notoriously, and adversely to all the world under a claim of right, and he prays that said 150 standard miner's inches be awarded him. These defendants then allege that, should they be deprived of the waters so held by them or any part thereof, they will suffer irreparable damage and injury not capable of being measured in terms of money. As a further and separate defense they allege that plaintiff and its stockholders and predecessors in interest have been guilty of laches in not asserting any claim adversely to defendants during many years, and particularly during the five years last past. Estoppel is also pleaded. The answer filed by Byron H. Kent and J. Royal Lemon alleges that Kent has disposed of all of his interest in any lands and all water rights appurtenant thereto, and which are affected by the action, to J. Royal Lemon. This defendant also denies any rights in plaintiff to the waters, and he alleges that for more than seven years prior to November, 1918, he has been the owner of certain described lands riparian to and within the watershed of said stream situated above plaintiff's land, and that all of said land is desert in character and worthless without irrigation; that for seven years prior to the commencement of this action he has been diverting waters from the stream at a certain point through a ditch having a capacity of 100 standard miner's inches for the purpose of irrigating his orchard and alfalfa fields; that he has diverted the water openly, notoriously, and adversely to plaintiff. Laches and estoppel are also pleaded by him as a separate defense. General relief is prayed for by all of these defendants. Defendant Noble simply claims an interest as a stockholder in Valyermo Ranch Company, and his interest in the waters have been acquired by that company.

The issues thus presented were tried without a jury, and judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, who appeared and answered. Under the judgment each was awarded a specific amount of water. The quantity allowed the Valyermo Ranch Company was 225 standard miner's inches, the defendant R. B. Pallett 170 inches, and J. Royal Lemon 100 miner's inches, and, in addition thereto, each of these defendants was found to be entitled to an additional indefinite amount of water for certain riparian lands described in the complaint, and the remainder of the flow was found to belong to plaintiff. A new trial was asked for, and pending the hearing of the motion the judge who tried the case resigned from office, and his successor heard the application. The motion was denied upon the ground that the time for passing upon the same was insufficient to permit of a proper examination of the voluminous record. The findings and judgment were, however, on motion of defendants, set aside and other findings were made, and another judgment based thereon was entered, and it is from this latter judgment that this appeal is taken.

It is the claim of appellant that the evidence is insufficient in law or in fact to show that plaintiff's title to the waters has in whole or in part been divested from it or its predecessor in interest either by appropriation or by prescription or by reason of the riparian rights of the defendants, except a portion thereof which had been decreed in a former action to belong to one Shoemaker, a predecessor in interest of lands now belonging to defendant Pallett.

[1, 2] So much of the same as is necessary for a discussion of the case shows in substance that in the year 1888 one Carter appropriated certain of the waters of Big Rock creek. Within 60 days after his notice was posted he commenced the construction of a ditch, and diverted water from the stream. The first amount of water taken was 1,250 miner's inches, which was later increased to 4,000. The water so taken was put to a beneficial use. The point of diversion was a short distance north of the tunnel above referred to, but in the year 1890 this point of diversion was changed and a new one made a little further south. On August 22, 1890, Carter conveyed all his rights thus acquired in the waters to the Big Rock irrigation district, which district thereafter took water from the stream and used the same for irrigating the lands within the district. The years from 1895 to 1903 were dry ones, and practically all of the owners of land within the district left the locality because of the drought. The irrigation officers of the district were among the number, their last meeting being held on June 5, 1900, and the district as such did not again function through its board of directors until some 14 years thereafter, when in the year 1914 a new board was appointed by the supervisors of Los Angeles county. The new directors took charge of the defunct district, and during the years 1916–17 employed two zanjeros, who attempted on a few occasions to divide the waters when available among such owners as had remained in the locality. The district continued to be thus pretentiously operated until it was finally abandoned on February 17, 1919, upon petition of a majority of owners of land within the same. At this time, whatever rights as still remained in the district became vested in plaintiff by virtue of a decree of the superior court of Los Angeles county and a commissioner's deed executed by order of said court pursuant to the decree. There is evidence to show that during the years of nonusage by plaintiff's predecessor in interest and prior thereto, the waters of the stream were continuously used by the various defendants openly, notoriously, and under a claim of right, and that they made costly improvements to properly divert the water, running into many thousands of dollars. The use of the waters so made by defendants was without interruption by any one except that the zanjeros employed by the new board of directors at the time the district attempted to again function on a few occasions interfered with the full flow of the waters by breaking and placing obstructions in the ditch, but they never notified any one that such interference was made under a claim of right. The obstructions were, in each instance, immediately removed by defendants, who continued in their use of the waters. Acts of this character do not constitute an interruption of an adverse use of water. An occasional suspension or interruption of such use will not break the continuity of exclusive possession. Interruption, in order to constitute a tolling of the statute, must be open, and either upon a claim of right or so notorious as to constitute such a claim. It must be of such a character as that required to initiate an adverse possession. A clandestine entry will not set the statute in motion, because the owner cannot, under such circumstances, be said to have acquiesced in the wrongful entry. Armstrong v. Payne, 188 Cal. 592, 206 P. 638; 2 Farnum on Waters, § 2; Corp. Jur. p. 96.

[3, 4] The evidence upon the question of adverse use of the waters by the various defendants is voluminous. It shows that, while their respective rights were acquired at different times, they all made a beneficial use of the amount of waters claimed by them adversely, and for a period of time sufficient to acquire a title by prescription and adverse possession. There is also evidence to show that the predecessors in interest of the Valyermo Ranch Company made a beneficial use of the waters about as early as plaintiff's predecessor, and that all of the defendants made such use openly, notoriously, and adversely to all the world after the irrigation district had ceased to function, in the manner and for the period stated. With reference to defendant Pallett, it appears that about two years after the irrigation district originally began to operate, it brought an action against one Shoemaker, Pallett's predecessor in interest, to determine the respective rights of the parties in the water of the stream, and that judgment was had determining these rights. It also appears, however, that after the year 1895, and during the period when the district had ceased to function as such, the judgment was no longer observed either by Shoemaker or Pallett, but, on the contrary, use of the water to the full extent of the ditch used by them was made adversely to the judgment, and such use was never questioned by any one until the commencement of this action. The judgment between the district and Shoemaker, therefore, cannot be held to be res adjudicata as to Pallett or affect any rights he or Shoemaker acquired subsequent to its rendition. There is, therefore no merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to show that the various defendants have made use of the waters adverse to plaintiff's claim herein.

[5-13] In general it may be said that a permanent right to the use of the water or a water right may be acquired in the Western states by one who has complied with the essential elements for the statutory period which constitute the adverse user of the water amounting to prescription. This right may be acquired as against one who formerly claimed the water by virtue of a prior appropriation, as a riparian owner, as a purchaser, or as against one who originally claimed the right to the water by prescription itself, or as against one who had acquired the right to the water by any other method. It follows that the rights of an appropriator may be lost in whole or in part by the adverse possession and the user of the water by another amounting to prescription. Where one has complied with all the essentials necessary, and has had the continued, open, notorious, exclusive, uninterrupted, and adverse use and enjoyment of the water under a claim of right for at least the period of time prescribed by the statute of the state where the right is claimed for the commencement of actions for recovery of real property, the law will presume a grant of the right so held and enjoyed. A private corporation holding water as a public use can thus lose its right by prescription, and the rule applies to public utility corporations holding title to property as a public use. A distinction is sought to be drawn by appellant between the ordinary public utility corporation and an irrigation district, it being claimed that as to the latter the property of the district is held by it in trust for the public and subject to the control of the state, and, this being so, it cannot be deprived of its right either by adverse possession, laches, estoppel, or abandonment. In support of this claimed distinction we are cited to numerous authorities to the effect that there can be no adverse holding of lands set apart or reserved to public use which will deprive the public of the right thereto or give title to the adverse claimant or create a title by virtue of the statute of limitations. These cases are extensively cited and reviewed in People v. Kerber, 152 Cal. 731, 93 P. 878, 125 Am. St. Rep. 93. There can be no question that where public lands have been devoted to a public use, persons cannot obtain title thereto by prescription founded on an adverse occupancy. This principle is indisputable and is not here disputed. It has no application, however, to the instant case. The title or interest that one may acquire in the waters of a stream is entirely different to that which may be acquired in lands. Running water, so long as it continues to flow in its natural course, is not and cannot be the subject of a private ownership. A right may be acquired to its use, but this right carries with it no specific property in the corpus of the water itself. One availing himself of the use of such waters has simply the right of usufruct as it passes down the bed of the stream, subject to a reasonable use and consumption for domestic and other purposes. This interest is dependent upon user, and it may be lost when the owner ceases to make avail of the same. Civ. Code, § 1411; Santa Paula Waterworks v. Peralta, 113 Cal. 38, 45 P. 168. This rule has been applied against a public service corporation, and there is no reason in principle why it should not equally apply against an irrigation district. Both are created to serve the public. Whatever differences may exist between them with reference to the method of their organization of their rights, duties, and liabilities, their purposes are the same. In the case of a public use the beneficiaries do not possess rights to the water which are in the ordinary sense private property. Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 82, 106 P. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213; Hildreth v. Montecito Creek W. Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 P. 395. Those holding possession thereof in trust for the beneficiaries cannot continue to hold it as a public use where they have discontinued to perform their public duty which such possession and control imposes. Fellows v. City of Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 52, 90 P. 137.

Our Supreme Court, in dealing with this subject, has said that there is no rule of law which prevents a person who owns land riparian to a stream above a place of diversion of water therefrom by some other person, even a public service corporation for public use, from taking water from the stream and acquiring title thereto by prescription as against such public use. That a public service corporation is no more exempt from this deprivation than any other owner of a water right, and any person, although not a riparian owner, may acquire a prescriptive right as against a public use below by taking water out of the stream which otherwise would run down to the channels of the public service corporation. San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Worswick, 187 Cal. 674, 203 P. 999.

[14] As is pointed out in Escondido Mutual Water Co. v. Escondido, 169 Cal. 772, 147 P. 1172, it is to be borne in mind that it is only the use of water which is a public use, and, while it is true that whenever any water has been so devoted to a public use the public and each individual thereof as a part of the public has a right to the continued use of that water, still the use impressed may be lost by abandonment. It would be a most mischievous perpetuity which would allow one who has made an appropriation of a stream to retain indefinitely as against other appropriators of the right to water therein while failing to apply the same to some useful or beneficial purpose. Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 127, 42 P. 453. Considering the imperative demand of the use of water, the purveyors of the use, whatever the character of their holding may be, must make avail of the waters or the interest will be lost. The rule applies to all persons alike. It is the use of the water merely to which they may acquire an interest and not to the water itself.

[15] The further claim is made that, assuming the defendants had acquired some water by prescription, they could only acquire the right to so much of the water as was "reasonably necessary" for the lands actually irrigated, and that the evidence shows the amount of waters awarded to them was unnecessary to properly irrigate their lands. There is no question that an acquired right in waters is limited to the amount that is reasonably necessary for the beneficial purpose for which it is diverted, and no title can be acquired to that part of a diversion which is excessive of such needs. In so far as the diversion exceeds such reasonably necessary amount it is contrary to the policy of the law, and is a taking without right and can confer no title no matter for how long continued, it being the policy of this state to require the highest and greatest possible benefit from the waters in the interest of agriculture and other useful and beneficial purposes. Cal. Pastoral, etc., Co. v. Madera Irr. Co., 167 Cal. 78, 138 P. 718.

Upon the subject of what amount was reasonably necessary for the use of the various defendants, there is a decided conflict in the evidence. It appears, however, that the lands in question are porous and gravelly and absorb water very rapidly, in consequence of which it is necessary to distribute large quantities over the surface of the ground so that the roots of the plants can be properly nourished. It also appears that by reason of the porous character of the soil a large percentage of the water makes its way by a subsurface flow back to the creek to the benefit of the lower owners.

There is ample evidence in the record to support the findings as to the amount of water reasonably necessary for the full enjoyment of the beneficial use made by defendants under their three classes of water rights which were put in issue under the pleadings.

Considering our conclusion upon this subject, the question of estoppel and laches raised by respondent becomes unimportant.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROBINSON v. GODFREY et al. (Civ. 4585.)

1. Husband and wife 🔑221.

That defendant was wife of another defendant held insufficient to warrant making her party, in action for partnership accounting.

2. Pleading 🔑52(2)—Actions for accounting between partners, and for fraud by stockholder against corporation officers, held improperly united, where not separately stated, and both did not affect all parties (Code Civ. Proc. § 427).

Causes of action for fraud by stockholder against corporation officers and for accounting between partners wherein corporation and wife of one of the defendants were named defendants without indicating propriety of their joinder held improperly united, under Code Civ. Proc. § 427, because not separately stated, and both actions did not affect all the parties.

3. Appeal and error 🔑901—Plaintiff, declining to amend after demurrer has been sustained, must show complaint was subject to none of specified objections.

A plaintiff, who has declined to amend his complaint after demurrer thereto has been generally sustained, must show, to succeed on appeal, that complaint was sufficient in its entirety and subject to none of the objections specified in the demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles county; John M. York, Judge.

Action for damages for fraud and for an accounting by J. W. Robinson against James J. Godfrey and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James M. Robinson and James E. Fenton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul M. Gregg, of San Luis Obispo, and Paul Vallee and Jerry H. Powell, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of defendants on the failure of plaintiff to amend his complaint after demurrer sustained thereto. The complaint as set forth in the record on appeal covers approximately 30 pages, and, while it is mechanically divided into 9 paragraphs, the story of the pleader consists in allegations more or less appropriate to several different causes of action without a proper or any attempt being made to separately state them. There are first set forth facts which, with the addition of certain other facts, might form the basis for a suit in equity on several different counts by plaintiff as a stockholder of a corporation against certain defendants for alleged fraud committed by them as officers in the management of the business of the corporation; secondly, purported causes of action in partnership accounting are attempted to be alleged as against defendant Godfrey only; and, thirdly, a similar cause of action as against defendant Godfrey and Warner. One of the named defendants is wholly disconnected from any of the obligations of the complaint, other than that such defendant is alleged to be the wife of one of the other defendants.

Each of defendants James J. Godfrey and Cecille Eyre Godfrey demurred separately to the complaint, but each of such demurrers is identical with the other as to the several objections to the complaint. In brief, they are that the complaint does not state a cause of action; that in several specified particulars there is a misjoinder of parties defendant, that in the manner designated in the demurrer several causes of action have been improperly united; that several causes of action are not separately stated; that in each of 14 specified particulars the complaint is uncertain; likewise unintelligible; likewise ambiguous; and that, as appears on the face of the complaint, the action is barred by each of the provisions of sections 337, 338, 339, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The complaint is notable with reference to the wealth of detail and evidentiary matter therein contained, but singularly lacking in allegations of ultimate fact. If (without so deciding) by some liberality of construction it may be conceded that, as to any of the several causes of action which are apparently attempted to be stated, the essential allegations are present, the remaining issues suggested by the demurrer require consideration. As to the objection to the complaint that it contains a misjoinder of parties, on an examination thereof it becomes apparent that, if the intention of the pleader was to confine his cause of action to an accounting between or among partners, the array of facts regarding the activities of the corporation defendant, or of the alleged fraud of defendant Godfrey, was at lest unnecessary; and the joinder in such action of the wife of one of the defendants, with no allegations in the complaint showing any pecuniary interest in her in the settlement of the controversy, was a pure gratuity. No ultimate fact is averred which would indicate the propriety of the joinder in the action for an accounting between or among partners of either the corporation defendant or the wife of one of the defendants. In the prayer of the complaint plaintiff asks for various forms of relief, including the following:

> "For all the relief to which this plaintiff may show himself entitled as an individual under said partnership agreement, and as a stockholder in the defendant's corporation, and for all the relief, both legal and equitable, to which this plaintiff may show himself entitled thereunder. * * *"

While it may be surmised that the "motif" of the pleader was accounting in a partnership, the injection into the complaint of such a vast quantity of matter regarding the alleged fraudulent acts of certain of the defendants as affecting the legal rights of the corporation, with consequent damage thereto, as well as the rights of plaintiff as a stockholder of such corporation, renders an accurate determination of the nature of the action somewhat difficult. If by some stretch of the rules of pleading the complaint be considered as legally stating a cause of action for fraud by a stockholder of a corporation against certain of its officers, with the addition to the complaint of certain allegations of ultimate fact, it is conceivable that the corporation would be a proper or even necessary party defendant. But by assuming that which was apparently intended, and which is indicated by the brief filed for appellant, to wit, that the complaint states both a cause of action for an accounting between or among partners and a cause of action for fraud by a stockholder of the corporation against certain of its managing officers, the question arises as to whether such causes of action have been properly united. The authority for such a joinder which is suggested by counsel herein is found in section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure by which, in substance, it is provided that a plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint where the plaintiff's claims arise "out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, and not included within one of the foregoing subdivisions of this section. The causes of action so united must all belong to one only of these classes, and must affect all the parties to the action, and not require different places of trial, and must be separately stated. * * *"

[2] While it is possible that a suit for an accounting, as well as one for fraud, is provided for by one or more of "the foregoing subdivisions" of section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the difficulty of joining such actions in the complaint herein is that the statute provides that in order to be so united they must "belong to one only of the classes" mentioned therein, and that they "must affect all the parties to the action, * * * and must be separately stated. * * *" It is clear that the complaint under consideration fails to qualify at least as to two of such requirements, in that the two actions do not "affect all the parties to the action"; nor are such suits separately stated—each of which objections, as heretofore noted, being one of the grounds of demurrer interposed by the defendants herein.

In addition to the foregoing reasons which justified the ruling of the judge of the lower court in sustaining the demurrer to the complaint, the pleading is vulnerable on each of several of the 14 objections specified in the demurrer for its uncertainty, which in the main include the problem of whether the action is one for an accounting, or one for fraud; and if for an accounting, what conditions which were properly averable as ultimate facts were present both at the time of the formation of the partnership and at the time of the commencement of the action, and as to the latter, particularly with reference to the alleged unsettled accounts of the partnership.

[3] It appearing that the complaint was objectionable upon each of several grounds stated in the demurrer, and such demurrer having been generally sustained, with leave to amend the complaint being granted, it became and was the duty of plaintiff either to amend the complaint in such manner as would correct the defects pointed out in the demurrer, or to stand upon his original pleading. Having adopted the latter course, in order that the appeal from the judgment succeed, it must be shown by appellant that the complaint was sufficient in its entirety and properly subject to none of the objections thereto as specified in the demurrer. In the case of Aalwyn v. Cobe, 168 Cal. 165, 173, 142 P. 79, 83, it is said:

"A plaintiff, who has declined to amend his complaint, after a demurrer sustained, which is both general and special, must stand upon his pleading as against both grounds of demurrer."

The same point is decided in Martinovich v. Wooley, 128 Cal. 144, 60 P. 760, in which the language of the syllabus is practically identical with the ruling in the Aalwyn Case. See, also, Du Bois v. Padgham, 18 Cal. App. 298, 123 P. 207; Lapique v. Monroe, 19 Cal. App. 253, 125 P. 760.

It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

McHARG v. PICKFORD et al. (Civ. 5571.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹882(6).

Where case was tried as though all allegations of complaint had been put in issue by answer, plaintiff offering evidence in support of such allegations is estopped to assert that they are admitted by answer.

2. Appeal and error ⟹931(3).

Though findings are objectionable as insufficient, appellate court must indulge in every presumption in favor of judgment and assume that, if additional findings had been made, they would favor prevailing party on conflicting evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action for an accounting by William A. Prince against T. H. Pickford and another, in which John R. McHarg, as executor of the last will and testament of William A. Prince, deceased, was substituted as party plaintiff. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McComb & Hall, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John Henderson Pelletier and John C. Kleber, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action for an accounting of an alleged partnership business. After the trial of the action, the plaintiff died, and the executor of his last will and testament has been substituted in the record in his place and stead. The original plaintiff, after alleging that he and the defendants were partners in the business of buying and selling real property in Los Angeles, Cal., described certain parcels of land and alleged that they were purchased by the partnership after the last accounting between the parties. These parcels are designated as A, B, and C. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendants have filed actions against the plaintiff with reference to the first two parcels, to recover plaintiff's pro rata share of amounts paid by defendants in discharging mortgages; that the defendants received and accepted on behalf of and for the benefit of said partnership a deed to parcel C, and, thereafter, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, sold said parcel to third parties and received therefor a sum in excess of its cost to the said partnership, and have failed and refused to render an account of said transaction to plaintiff.

Plaintiff alleges that an accounting is necessary between the parties, and prays that the court so order, and that the partnership be dissolved.

The defendants by their several answers clearly were attempting to deny each and every allegation of the complaint. Their attempts violated the rules of logic and of pleading, the answer containing numerous negatives pregnant and denials in the conjunctive. At the trial, plaintiff relied upon this, insisting that the substantial allegations of the complaint had been admitted. The trial court allowed an amended answer to be filed, over the protest of the plaintiff but, even after attention had been focused upon the fallacies of their pleadings, defendants filed amended answers which only partially corrected the errors of the original answers.

While realizing that there is small excuse indeed for these fundamental and repeated breaches of well-settled rules, nevertheless we are disposed to consider cases on their merits and to avoid, if possible, reversing judgments upon technicalities. That course is open to us here, we think, because the defendants made no further objection to the pleadings, but tried the case as though all the allegations of the complaint had been put in issue by the answers. Evidence in support of such allegations was introduced by plaintiff, and evidence in opposition thereto was introduced by defendants without objection.

The trial court found that the parties were never copartners and that they never, as a partnership, purchased any property in the city and county of Los Angeles, Cal., or elsewhere, and that defendants never received a deed to any property for and on behalf of or for the benefit of plaintiff and defendants.

[1] Appellant now contends that the allegations of the complaint are admitted by the answers, which objection, we think, he is estopped to assert here, for the reasons above stated. White v. San Rafael, etc., R. R. Co., 50 Cal. 417; Tevis v. Hicks, 41 Cal. 123; Smith v. Penny, 44 Cal. 161; Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 P. 186. The case relied upon by appellant upon this phase of the case (Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 221, 26 P. 80) is clearly differentiable from the authorities cited and from the case at bar. The important distinction is mentioned in the case itself in the following language:

> "In the judgment roll of the case at bar there is no bill of exceptions, nor anything to show that any evidence was introduced tending to prove a subsequent or other contract than that alleged in the complaint and not denied in the answer, or tending to show, contrary to the admission of the pleadings, that the deed of January 25, 1889, from plaintiff to defendant, correctly recited the full consideration for the conveyance."

[2] Appellant further contends that the findings are insufficient, in that they do not find upon the ultimate facts set forth in the complaint, but are, in effect, conclusions of law. The findings are subject to the objection made to them, and it is certainly desirable to have them more definite upon each and every matter in issue between the parties. However, we must indulge in every presumption in favor of the judgment, and assume that, if additional findings had been made, they would have been in favor of the defendants upon the conflicting evidence which appears in the record. Smith v. Penny, supra.

Appellant also contends that, even though the evidence shows no partnership, the plaintiff is entitled to relief if the evidence shows a joint venture, and that specific findings should have been made upon facts which would determine the existence of this status. It is urged that the finding that no partnership existed is not inconsistent with the existence of a joint venture. As we have said, the findings should have been more specific, but it is clear from an examination of the transcript that the court could not have found as it did and reached the conclusion evidenced by its judgment unless it accepted the evidence of the defendants as true and rejected the testimony of the plaintiff as to his interest in parcel C described in the complaint. According to the evidence of defendants, plaintiff had no interest whatsoever in the property in question at the time it was sold. According to all the testimony in the record, he had never invested any money at all in it. His claim is merely that defendant Vardaman paid for a two-thirds interest in the property and agreed to "carry" plaintiff for a half interest in said two-thirds interest. The testimony offered by the defendants is to the effect that, when the property was purchased, plaintiff was given the privilege of buying a one-third interest in it, as he had done in other transactions, but that plaintiff did not care for unimproved property and never invested any money in it, and that it was finally understood that he had no interest in this venture, but that it would be financed and owned by the defendants alone.

It becomes apparent, therefore, that, in order to reach its findings and conclusion, the court must have accepted the defendants' account of the matter, and such account is equally inconsistent with a joint venture in which plaintiff had a share as it is with the theory of a copartnership.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF STOCKTON v. ELLINGWOOD et al. (Civ. 3016.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 22, 1926.)

1. Statutes 🔑85(4)—Statute allowing either party in civil action to move for change of venue, where county or city is plaintiff, but denying plaintiff such right where county or city is defendant, held not unconstitutional as local or special law (Code Civ. Proc. § 394, as amended by St. 1921, p. 573; Const. art. 4, § 25).

Code Civ. Proc. § 394, as amended by St. 1921, p. 573, allowing either party in civil action to move for change of venue, where county or city is plaintiff, but denying plaintiff such right where county or city is defendant, held not to violate Const. art. 4, § 25, relative to special laws, since there is reasonable basis for distinction between the two classes of cases.

2. Evidence 🔑5(2).

It is common knowledge that public opinion has been aroused in opposition to undertakings by which municipalities have acquired land in counties other than those in which situated for obtaining water supplies and developing electric power.

3. Constitutional law 🔑48.

It must be presumed that Legislature, in enacting Code Civ. Proc. § 394, as amended by St. 1921, p. 573, determined that justice required that place of trial be changed to neutral county, where county or city was plaintiff.

4. Venue 🔑68.

Burden is on those opposing change of venue to show that both convenience of witnesses and ends of justice would be promoted by denying change, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3.

5. Venue 🔑68—Disqualification of county as place for trial, under statute relative to actions in which county or town is party, cannot be overcome by proof of impartiality or convenience alone (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 170, 602, and section 394, as amended by St. 1921, p. 573).

Disqualification of county as place for trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 394, as amended by St. 1921, p. 573, relative to cases in which county or town is party, like implied bias of juror under section 602, or disqualification of judge under section 170, cannot be overcome by proof of impartiality or convenience, since it is based on legislative determination that there is reason to believe that plaintiff cannot have impartial trial in county where action is commenced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action of eminent domain to condemn land for a reservoir site by the City of Stockton against William Ellingwood and others. From an order granting a change of venue, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, of Stockton, F. J. Solinsky, of San Francisco, and Joe Huberty, of San Andreas, for appellants.

J. LeRoy Johnson and Thomas S. Louttit, both of Stockton, for respondent.

Jess E. Stephens, W. B. Mathews, and Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, all of Los Angeles, and John J. O'Toole and Robert M. Searls, both of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

FINCH, P. J. This is one of more than twenty proceedings in eminent domain commenced in the superior court of Calaveras county by the plaintiff, situated in San Joaquin county, to condemn lands in Calaveras county for a reservoir site. On motion of the plaintiff, the court transferred the proceeding to the adjoining county of Amador for trial. The defendants other than Macnider have appealed from the order of transfer.

There is no dispute as to the facts. At the hearing the defendants moved the court, upon affidavit, to deny plaintiff's motion, and to retain the proceeding for trial "in the superior court of Calaveras county for the convenience of witnesses that will be called herein and to promote the ends of justice." The facts stated in the affidavit were not denied. The transfer was made pursuant to the provisions of section 394 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides:

> "An action or proceeding against a county, or city and county, may be commenced and tried in such county, or city and county, unless such action or proceeding is brought by a county, or city and county, in which case it may be tried in any county, or city and county, not a party thereto. Whenever an action or proceeding is brought by a county, city and county, or city, against a resident of another county, city and county, or city, or a corporation doing business in the latter, the action or proceeding must be, on motion of either party (the said defendant), transferred for trial to a county, or city and county, other than the plaintiff, if the plaintiff is a county, or city and county, and other than that in which the plaintiff is situated, if the plaintiff is a city, and other than that in which the defendant resides or is doing business or is situated. Whenever an action or proceeding is brought against a county, city and county, or city, in any county, or city and county, other than the defendant, if the defendant is a county, or city and county, or, if the defendant is a city, other than that in which the defendant is situated, the action or proceeding must be, on motion of the said defendant, transferred for trial to a county, or city and county, other than that in which the plaintiff, or any of the plaintiffs, resides, or is doing business, or is situated, and other than the plaintiff county, or city and county, or county in which such plaintiff city is situated, and other than the defendant county, or city and county, or county in which such defendant city is situated."

[1] Appellants contend that section 394 is violative of the provisions of article 4, § 25, of the Constitution, reading as follows:

> "The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * Third—Regulating the practice of courts of justice. Fourth—Providing for changing the venue in civil or criminal actions."

In Mono Power Co. v. Los Angeles, 33 Cal. App. 675, 677, 166 P. 387, section 394 as it then stood was held to be constitutional. Subsequent to that decision, the section was amended by substituting the words which are italicized in the foregoing quotation for the words therein placed in parenthesis. Stats. 1921, p. 573. Appellants argue that this change renders the section unconstitutional, in that, as amended, it allows "either party in civil actions where the county, city, or city and county is plaintiff to move to change the place of trial; but * * * when the city or city and county or county is a party defendant, only the defendant has a right to move to change the place of trial and the plaintiff in such civil actions is denied the right." In Gridley v. Fellows, 166 Cal. 765, 768, 138 P. 355, 356, in considering the constitutionality of an amendment to section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure providing for the trial of "an action for injury to person, or property, or for death from wrongful act, or negligence, in the county where the injury occurs, or the injury causing death occurs, or in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action," it is said:

> "The provision of the amendment of section 395 in question, it is true, applies only to specified classes of cases. But it applies alike in every part of the state to all actions embraced in the classes described. Consequently it is not a local law. It cannot be deemed a special law forbidden by the Constitution if it is addressed to a class or classes based on some natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction or difference, reasonable and substantial, between these actions and others not included and sufficient in some reasonable degree to account for or justify the making of the different rule. * * * The presumption is in favor of the legislative action. The court cannot decide that the classification is unjustifiable in reason, unless it can see that the presumption is overcome because no reason exists. The Code itself, in sections 392 and 393, enacted long before the adoption of the present Constitution, made special provisions for the place of trial of actions to recover real property, actions for injuries thereto, actions for partition thereof, actions to foreclose liens thereon, actions to recover penalties or forfeitures, and actions against a public officer. It has never been supposed that these special regulations are unconstitutional discriminations, or that they would be special laws within the constitutional inhibition, if enacted after the adoption of the Constitution of 1879."

[2, 3] It is a part of the current history of the state that a number of municipalities have acquired valuable and, in some instances, extensive areas of land in counties other than those in which such municipalities are situated for the purposes of obtaining adequate water supplies and developing electric power. It is a matter of common knowledge that public opinion in such counties has been aroused at times in hostile opposition to such undertakings. Whether such opposition has been justified or not is beside the question. It must be presumed in favor of the constitutionality of the section that the Legislature determined, upon sufficient investigation, that in a case such as this, in order to avoid any local bias which would probably affect the verdict of a jury, justice requires that the place of trial be changed to a neutral county. It cannot be held that there is no reasonable and substantial basis for such legislative determination or that a like bias would probably exist against an individual plaintiff in an action commenced by him in a county other than that of his residence against a municipality situated therein or against the county itself. As a rule, there is no general public opinion at all respecting the merits of an action brought by an individual against a county or a municipality therein. There being a reasonable basis of distinction between the two classes of cases, the provision for a change of venue in the one class and not in the other cannot be deemed a special law within the constitutional inhibition.

[4, 5] Appellants contend that the court erred in denying their counter motion to retain the case for trial in Calaveras county on the ground of convenience of witnesses. The burden was upon appellants to show, in support of their motion, that both "the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted" by granting their motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 397, subd. 3. They showed merely that the convenience of witnesses would be so promoted. The disqualification of a county under the provisions of section 394, like the implied bias of a juror as defined by section 602, or the disqualification of a judge under the provisions of section 170, cannot be removed or overcome by proof of impartiality or convenience. Section 394 is based upon the legislative determination that there is reason to believe that the plaintiff in an action such as this cannot have an impartial trial in the county in which the action is commenced. If an impartial trial cannot be had therein, it cannot be said that "the ends of justice would be promoted" by retaining the action therein for trial. The convenience of witnesses must yield to the ends of justice.

The order is affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SATTAN et al. (Civ. 5228.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑196—Evidence held to support finding that pipe for public water supply was located in manner most compatible with greatest public good and least private injury.

Evidence, in action to condemn right of way for pipe line for public water supply, held to support finding that pipe had been located in manner most compatible with greatest public good and least private injury.

2. Evidence 🔑571(7).

Testimony of experts held to sustain finding as to value of land condemned for pipe line for public water supply.

3. Eminent domain 🔑205—Evidence held to sustain finding as to damage to land not taken for public pipe line.

Evidence held to sustain finding as to damage caused to land not taken in action to condemn right of way for pipe line for public water supply, even if true test is effect of severance on sale value of land not taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action of eminent domain by the City and County of San Francisco against Andrew Stephen Sattan and others to condemn a right of way for a pipe line for public water supply. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appealed. Affirmed.

John J. Jones, of San José, for appellants.

George Lull, City Atty., and Robert M. Searls, Sp. Counsel, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the defendants from a judgment entered upon a verdict of a jury in an action brought by the plaintiff to condemn a strip of land in which to locate a pipe line needed in connection with the public water supply.

It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that the aqueduct has been planned and located in the manner that will be most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury; and also that the evidence is insufficient to support the two findings based upon the verdict of the jury as to the value of the parcel of land sought to be condemned and as to the damage caused to the remainder of the tract by reason of the severance. The former amount was fixed by the jury at $4,500 and the latter at $1,000.

[1] Appellants set forth in their brief all the evidence in the record in opposition to the findings made, and the respondent replies by setting out abundant evidence to support the findings under attack. No useful purpose would be served by reviewing it all in this opinion. The construction engineer for the Hetch Hetchy water project explained the necessity of locating the pipe in the manner set forth in the complaint. This was substantiated by the testimony of the first assistant engineer in the same water project, who explained the reasons for such location and also stated that tests had been made in an effort to relocate the pipe line and thus meet the protests and conform to the requests of the defendants, but that these tests had disclosed the undesirability of changing the route.

[2] Upon the issue as to the value of the land the finding of the court is sustained by the testimony not only of real estate dealers in the vicinity, but also of the inheritance tax appraiser and deputy assessor for the county and the agricultural manager for the Spring Valley Water Company, whose business included the management of a very large acreage in that vicinity and other localities.

[3] As to the last question raised, relating to severance damage, the finding of the court is also abundantly sustained by the record. Appellants contend that the true test is the effect of the severance upon the sale value of the balance of the tract. If that be so, the testimony of the witnesses Tuchsen and McGarvey, testifying for the plaintiff, may be said to refer to that point of view and they estimated the depreciation caused by the severance at the figure named in the finding of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

BURKS v. STEARNS. (Civ. 3078.)

1. Automobiles 🔑168(6).

Under Motor Vehicle Act 1919, § 22, subd. (a), evidence that automobile driver approached blind intersection at speed of from 18 to 24 miles per hour, and collided with car reaching intersection first, held to warrant recovery.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1).

Appellate court is concluded by findings of trial court on question of fact supported by sufficient testimony.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1170(7).

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, ruling of trial court on testimony, if error, does not warrant reversal when nonprejudicial, in view of other testimony supporting judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action by F. L. R. Burks against O. W. Stearns. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, for appellant.

Chester O. Hansen, of Fresno, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to recover damages for injuries to his automobile arising from a collision with an automobile owned by the defendant. The defendant interposed a cross-complaint for damages suffered to his automobile. The court awarded judgment for the defendant in the sum of $37 and the plaintiff appeals. The collision involved in this case occurred at a street intersection, and at the time of the collision the Motor Vehicle Act of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 191) was in full force and effect. Section 22, subd. (a), of the Motor Vehicle Act, then provided:

> "That no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle or other vehicle on any public highway at a greater rate of speed than fifteen miles an hour in approaching any steam, electric or other railway crossing at grade, or in approaching or traversing an intersecting highway, or crossing or intersection of highways, or in approaching or going around corners or curves in the highway, when in any of the foregoing cases the operator's or driver's view of the road or railway traffic is obstructed."

The collision between the respective automobiles occurred on the 14th day of December, 1921, at the intersection of Elm avenue and Jensen avenue in the county of Fresno. At the time of the accident the automobile owned by the plaintiff was being driven on Elm avenue in a southerly direction, and the defendant's automobile was being driven on Jensen avenue in a westerly direction.

[1, 2] On the part of the appellant it is claimed that the intersection was not what is called a "blind intersection." On the part of the respondent testimony was introduced that there was a line of trees on the northeast corner of the intersection of Jensen and Elm avenues which obstructed the view of approaching drivers. The plaintiff testified that he was traveling between 18 and 24 miles an hour. The driver of the plaintiff's car testified that he was driving between 20 and 25 miles an hour. There was also testimony to the effect that as the defendant came into the intersection he was driving at a very low rate of speed, and, after entering the intersection, increased his speed somewhat. The defendant also testified that as he entered the intersection the plaintiff's car was not in sight. The law relating to the right of automobiles entering intersections in force at the time of the collision in this case was as follows:

> "Excepting where controlled by such traffic ordinances or regulations as are permitted under this act the operator of a vehicle shall yield the right of way at the intersection of their paths to a vehicle approaching from the right unless such vehicle approaching from the right is further from the point of intersection of their paths than such first named vehicle."

Under the testimony, the court in this case was justified in coming to the conclusion that the defendant had the right of way; that the defendant was nearer the intersection when approaching than was the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding. The fact that the plaintiff was driving at a higher rate of speed than the defendant did not affect the respective rights of the parties or give the plaintiff the right of way over the defendant. This case involves simply a question of fact as to which one of the parties had the right of way at the intersection, and, there being sufficient testimony to support the findings of the trial court, we are concluded by such findings.

[3] Error is also urged on account of the admission in testimony of the statement made by the plaintiff's chauffeur immediately after the accident. We need not consider this matter, because, under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, the ruling of the court in this particular, if admitted to be error, would not warrant a reversal, because the testimony to which we have referred shows the error nonprejudicial, and amply supports the conclusion of the trial court that the plaintiff was responsible for the collision. The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1926. Rehearing Denied June 28, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 26, 1926.)

1. Evidence 🔑10(2), 25(2).

Courts take judicial notice of incorporation of cities and of boundaries thereof, in view of St. 1923, p. 103, § 3.

2. Evidence 🔑48.

Doctrine of judicial notice is applicable to proceedings before boards and special tribunals.

3. Waters and water courses 🔑190—Application to appropriate water for municipal purposes is sufficient, without particularly describing boundaries of cities to be served.

Application for permit to appropriate water for municipal purposes, not setting forth location of cities to be served, gives water commission full information as to place of intended use of water within boundaries of incorporated cities named, as if such boundaries had been particularly described.

4. Waters and water courses 🔑190.

Term "adjacent territory," used in application to appropriate water for cities, refers to territory built up outside of, but immediately adjacent to, cities named.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Adjacent.]

5. Waters and water courses 🔑133.

Under Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012), § 1a, as added by St. 1923, p. 161, hearing may be held and permit granted to appropriate water, though application therefor is defective.

6. Waters and water courses 🔑133.

Under Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) §§ 1a, 1d, as added by St. 1923, pp. 161, 163, and sections 7, 16, application to appropriate water may be granted in part, and denied in part.

7. Waters and water courses 🔑190—Hearing on application to appropriate water for cities and adjacent territory cannot be denied because application is insufficient as to part of places of intended use (Water Commission Act [St. 1913, p. 1012] § 17).

Hearing on application for permit to appropriate water for use of cities named and adjacent territory, not being defective in describing incorporated cities to be served, cannot be denied because application is insufficient as to part of places of intended use, in view of Water Commission Act, § 17, permitting use of water only to extent allowed.

8. Waters and water courses 🔑190—Application to appropriate water for municipal purposes need not set forth conduits for conveying water from point of sale to places of intended use (Water Commission Act St. 1913, p. 1012] §§ 1a, 1d, as added by St. 1923, pp. 161, 163, and sections 7, 16).

Application for permit to appropriate water for municipal purposes, under Water Commission Act, §§ 1a, 1d, as added by St. 1923, pp. 161, 163 and sections 7, 16, setting forth proposed pipe line from point of diversion to point where plaintiff proposed to sell water to be conveyed by purchasers to places of use, held not defective in failing to set forth conduits to places of intended use; it being presumed that Water Commission Act, § 16, requiring application to locate proposed works, relates to work to be constructed by applicant, and not by purchasers from him.

9. Mandamus 🔑3(8).

Mandamus is proper remedy to compel water commission to hear and act on application to appropriate water; remedy under Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012) § 1b, as added by St. 1923, p. 162, not being adequate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Mandamus by Geary Rich to compel W. F. McClure, Director of Public Works of the State of California, substituted as party defendant in place of A. B. Fletcher, Director of Public Works, and another, to hear and act on application for permit to appropriate water. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Shenk and Curtis, JJ., dissenting.

Spencer Burroughs, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Edward F. Treadwell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an appeal from the judgment herein, requiring the defendants to "proceed to hear and act upon" the plaintiff's "application for a permit to appropriate" 10 second feet of the water in Lindsay slough, a tributary of the Sacramento river, for municipal purposes. The complaint sets out the application in full, including a map, which accompanied and was made a part of the application. The parts of the application material to the questions raised by the appeal are as follows:

> "The use to which the water is to be applied is for municipal purposes. * * * The pipe line to be 24 miles in length, terminating in the existing water supply of Vallejo near Cordelia, in the S. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of Sec. 12, Tp. 4 north, R. 3 west M. D. M. * * * For sale at Cordelia to supply the cities of Vallejo, Benicia, Suisun, Fairfield, and adjacent territory in the county of Solano, having a present population of 25,559. * * * The maps filed herewith only show the pipe line extending to Cordelia, as that is the extent to which applicant intends to construct it, and at that point he will wholesale the water to such of the communities mentioned with which he may be able to negotiate favorable contracts. The applicant has no intention of himself entering into the business of selling water as a public utility, but intends to carry the same to Cordelia, and then sell the same at wholesale, and that is the place of use so far as applicant is concerned."

The map which accompanied the application showed the locations of Lindsay slough, a proposed reservoir adjacent thereto, a proposed pipe line from the reservoir to the point designated in the application near Cordelia, and the cities of Fairfield and Suisun, but did not show the locations of the cities of Benicia and Vallejo, or of the "adjacent territory" referred to in the application, or of any conduit from Cordelia to either of those cities. The answer alleges that the application was rejected and a hearing thereon refused, on the ground that:

> The applicant did not "file a map showing thereon the place or places where it was intended to use the water, and further showing thereon the location of the conduits leading from Cordelia and the pipe line to Cordelia through which the water might be supplied to the place or places of use."

Judgment on the pleadings was entered in favor of the plaintiff, directing:

"That a peremptory writ of mandate issue out of this court, directed to the said defendants, and commanding them to forthwith proceed to hear and act upon the said application."

Appellants fairly summarize the material facts as follows:

> "Respondent filed an application * * * for a permit to appropriate unappropriated waters * * * for municipal purposes. * * * It was for the purpose of supplying the cities of Vallejo, Benicia, Suisun, and Fairfield and adjacent territory in the county of Solano. * * * The map filed with said application showed the pipe line to Cordelia, but did not show either Vallejo or Benicia, or the territory adjacent to Vallejo, Benicia, Suisun, or Fairfield, which it was proposed to serve. The division of water rights held said application defective, in that it did not set forth the intended place of use and the conduits leading thereto, and called upon the applicant to give the names of the cities in the application, * * * and to then sketch upon a map the approximate boundaries of the area or areas within which the water was to be applied to use, and to locate therein the cities which were to be supplied, and also to sketch approximate locations of main conduits from Cordelia through which water might be supplied to these cities and adjacent areas. * * * This the respondent refused and failed to do. * * * Thereupon the division of water rights rejected and canceled said application."

Section 1a of the Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1012, as added by St. 1923, p. 161), provides:

> "The state water commission shall have authority to grant, or to refuse to grant a permit and to reject any application, after hearing; provided, however, that no hearing shall be necessary in order to issue a permit upon an unprotested application or in order to reject a defective application after notice as provided in section 17 of this act, unless the state water commission elects to hold a hearing."

Section 1d, added by St. 1923, p. 163, provides that:

> "The application must be accompanied by such maps, drawings and other data as may be required by the state water commission."

Section 7 provides:

> "For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the state water commission is authorized to pass such necessary rules and regulations as it may from time to time deem advisable."

Section 16 provides, among other requirements:

> "Every application for a permit to appropriate water shall set forth * * * the location and description of the proposed headworks, ditch, canal and other works, * * * and the place where it is intended to use the water."

The rules and regulations adopted by the commission contain the following:

> "Regulation 3. * * * (e) The place of use must be established with reasonable certainty. * * *
> "Regulation 4. * * * If municipal use is intended then the name of the municipality to be served should be given providing it is incorporated, and if it is not incorporated then the area to be served may be described in some other suitable manner. * * *
> "Regulation 5. Maps in duplicate must be filed in connection with each application, showing * * * the location of the point or points of diversion and the reservoirs and places of use, together with the location of the main conduit and intersecting streams, conduits, and pipe lines."

[1, 2] Vallejo, Benicia, Suisun, and Fairfield are all incorporated cities. Courts take judicial notice of the incorporation of cities and of the boundaries thereof. 10 Cal. Jur. 710; Municipal Corporation Bill, § 3, Stats. 1923, p. 103. Courts take judicial notice of the incorporation of a city "without proof, and even without averment." City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 256, 27 P. 604, 608. The doctrine of judicial notice is applicable to proceedings before boards and special tribunals. Anderson v. Board of Dental Examiners, 27 Cal. App. 336, 339, 149 P. 1006; Benton v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. App.) 240 P. 1021, 1023.

[3, 4] The plaintiff's application, therefore, gave the defendants as full information relative to the place of intended use of the water within the boundaries of the incorporated cities named as if such boundaries had been particularly described, and the only uncertainty in the application relates to the use of the water in the "adjacent territory." Since the water is to be used for municipal purposes, it may be inferred that the term "adjacent territory" refers to built-up territory outside of, but immediately adjacent to, the respective incorporated cities named in the application.

[5-7] Under the liberal provisions of section 1a of the Water Commission Act, a hearing may be held and a permit granted, even though the application therefor be defective. Also the application may be granted in part and denied in part. Section 17 of the act provides:

> "The approval of any application shall give the right to take and use water only to the extent and for the purpose allowed in said approval."

There is no defect in the description of the place of intended use, in so far as the incorporated cities themselves are concerned, and the use of water therein is doubtless the principal use for which the appropriation is sought. No more reason appears for denying plaintiff a hearing, on the mere ground that his application is insufficient as to a part of the places of intended use, than there would be for sustaining a general demurrer because one of several causes of action alleged in a complaint is defectively stated.

[8] Appellants contend that the application should have set forth proposed conduits for conveying the water from Cordelia to the places of intended use. The application sets forth the proposed pipe line from the point of diversion to Cordelia, at which place the plaintiff proposes to sell the water, the purchasers to convey it thence to their respective places of use. It is to be presumed that the provisions of section 16 of the act, requiring an application to set forth "the location and description of the proposed headworks, ditch, canal and other works," relate to the work which the applicant proposes to construct, not to works to be constructed and used by purchasers of the water, and over which the applicant will have no control. For obvious reasons, the places of intended use must be stated, whether that use is to be made by the applicant or by those to whom he may sell the water; but such reasons do not apply to the location and description of the conduits for the conveyance of the water from the place of sale and delivery to the places of use.

[9] Appellants urge that plaintiff was not entitled to a writ of mandate, because he had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy under the provisions of section 1b of the act as added by St. 1923, p. 162. That section provides that:

> Any interested party "may within thirty days after issuance of a permit or an order refusing to issue a permit and rejecting an application bring an action in the superior court. * * * Said action shall be for a review of the order of the state water commission. Said court shall review all correspondence, maps, data and other records on file with the state water commission which pertain to said application and all evidence taken before said commission and take such additional evidence as it may require or as may be submitted by the parties in interest or the state water commission and shall then render judgment affirming, reversing, or modifying the action of the state water commission."

Respondent contends that such provisions of section 1b are unconstitutional on various grounds, but the contention need not be considered, because the section, if valid, clearly contemplates such an action only after a hearing before the commission, and not in a case where a hearing has been denied. The remedy provided by section 1b would not be adequate in a case such as this. Careaga v. Fernald, 66 Cal. 351, 353, 5 P. 615. Mandamus is the proper remedy. Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Commission, 187 Cal. 533, 202 P. 874.

The judgment is affirmed.

Judgment ⚷252(1)—Transfer to plaintiff of personal property appurtenant to garage, in action on agreement for transfer of garage, which expressly provided for accounting as to personal property, held reversible error.

Transfer to plaintiff of all personal property appurtenant to garage, in action on agreement for transfer of garage, which expressly provided for accounting as to personal property, held reversible error, though defendants did not demand accounting in pleading, where they were led to believe throughout trial that accounting would be had.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by F. E. Pearson against Roy L. Juarez and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Joseph L. Taaffe and Leon Samuels, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. J. Dunne and James Walter Scott, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued the defendants upon a written contract, pleading it in hæc verba, and prayed for the recovery of the sum of $6,000 alleged to be due under the terms of the contract, and for other or additional relief in the premises as may be according to law. The defendants answered specifically, pleading fraud and misrepresentation on the part of the plaintiff in the procurement of the contract, and mistake in the execution of the contract, and by way of cross-complaint demanded a cancellation thereof as well as damages for the alleged fraud. At the trial evidence was offered in support of the allegations of the cross-complaint, whereupon the trial court, upon motion of plaintiff, granted a nonsuit against the defendants thereon. At the same time the trial court entered its order in the minutes that an interlocutory decree be granted in favor of the plaintiff as prayed. Thereafter findings of fact and conclusions of law were prepared and filed by the trial court wherein the court with particular care found against the defendants upon all the allegations of their cross-complaint, and found in favor of the plaintiff upon the allegations of his complaint, and then concluded that the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment in the sum of $6,000 specified in the contract, and that the defendant should convey to the plaintiff the Pearson garage, "together with the appurtenances thereof, including book accounts, bills receivable, stock, supplies, equipment, and all other personal property therein contained." Judgment followed accordingly for the plaintiff, from which the defendants have appealed upon a typewritten record.

A brief statement of the facts of the case will be sufficient. The three parties were owners in equal proportions of all the shares of stock of a corporation which operated three public garages in the city and county of San Francisco—the Pearson garage, the United States garage and the Pearson annex. On February 25, 1920, the three parties entered into a written agreement, wherein it was stipulated that upon the payment of $6,000 by the appellants to the respondent, he would transfer to appellants all his interest in the United States garage and the Pearson annex, and that at the same time the appellants would transfer to the respondent all their interest in the Pearson garage. Though no provision was made for the disposition of the shares of stock of the corporation, it seems to have been in the contemplation of the parties that they were really acting as partners in a joint adventure, and that they did not regard the corporation as anything more than a name under which they could conveniently conduct their business. It is conceded that by the terms of the agreement the respondent was to take all the interest in the Pearson garage owned or claimed by the two appellants as well as any interest which the corporation may have had therein, and that the same interest in the other two garages was to be transferred to the appellants. The fourth stipulation of the agreement is the one which is of importance to the decision, and we quote it in full:

> "All other matters of difference among said parties, including book accounts, stock, supplies, individual over-drafts or indebtedness, and other matters, shall be equitably adjusted among said parties, according to the facts as they may appear; and to that end, an expert accountant may be employed, at the expense of all of said parties, in equal shares, to state an account or accounts among said parties, so that their respective rights and obligations may satisfactorily appear; said adjustment to be made to March 15, 1920."

It is vigorously insisted by the appellants that by the terms of this agreement an equitable adjustment of all the book accounts, stock, supplies, and other personal property connected with, or situated in, the three garages was to be made in accordance with the respective interests of each party as indicated by his ownership in the corporation. It is also argued that, inasmuch as the trial court. throughout the course of the hearing, refused to hear evidence offered by the appellants covering these outstanding accounts, supplies, and other personal property upon the ground that such evidence was admissible only for the purpose of an accounting, and that such accounting would be ordered at the termination of the hearing, the appellants were therefore prejudicially injured by the entry of the judgment, final in form, which denied them an accounting, and awarded the respondent a recovery far beyond the terms of the contract. It is further argued that by the terms of the judgment the respondent was awarded all the outstanding book accounts, bills receivable, stock, supplies, equipment, and all other personal property connected with the Pearson garage without any evidence whatever to show the value thereof or the value of the book accounts and other personal property connected with the United States garage and the Pearson annex, which were ordered transferred to the appellants, and that by this judgment the court made for the parties a contract which was never within their contemplation at the time of the execution of the written agreement of February 25, 1920.

In support of their argument the appellants cite numerous passages from the reporter's transcript showing that from the beginning to the end of the trial all the parties and the trial court took the position that all matters of accounting were to be submitted to a referee at the termination of the hearing before the trial court, and that at that time an interlocutory decree only would be entered, and a referee would then be appointed. It is also pointed out that all the parties conceded that they were the owners in equal shares of all the property of the corporation which, of course, included the book accounts, bills receivable, and other personal property located in each of the garages which the corporation was conducting. When, therefore, the trial court, without evidence, and without a hearing, ordered the appellants to transfer to the respondent all interest in all book accounts, stock, and other personal property appurtenant to or contained in the Pearson garage, it denied to the appellants their right to an accounting of these respective interests. The respondent's only effort to sustain this proceeding is that the appellants did not in their pleading demand an accounting, but merely prayed that the contract be canceled, and that they have judgment for damages against the respondent upon their cross-complaint. The obvious answer to this is that the contract upon which the suit is based expressly provided for an accounting, and that it was not necessary, therefore, that the appellants demand an accounting in their pleading, but they were justified in relying upon a performance of the contract. It should also be noted in this connection that throughout the complaint it is alleged that the respondent had demanded a performance of the contract in all its terms, including the equitable adjustment of all the differences between the parties as required by the agreement, which relates, of course, to the provisions of paragraph 4 of the agreement above quoted. Thus from the filing of the complaint to the completion of the trial the appellants were led to believe that an accounting would be had. Inasmuch as the undisputed evidence showed that the respondent had collected outstanding accounts belonging to the corporation in a sum over $12,000, for which he had failed to account to the corporation or to the appellants, the prejudice to the appellants in the entry of the final judgment without an accounting is apparent. It is not necessary to consider any of the other errors assigned by appellants.

1. Appeal and error ⚷846(6).

Where findings in lessor's action in unlawful detainer for subletting premises contrary to lease did not affirmatively show that subletting was for more than one year, any question as to requirement that sublease for more than one year be in writing is not presented on appeal.

Breach of covenant against assignment and subletting in lease will terminate lease, though general rule is that such covenant should be strictly construed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by Ernest C. Amling and wife against C. T. Bryan and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed in part, affirmed in part.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank M. Smith and Henry M. Wilks, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. As shown by the findings of fact herein, it appears that plaintiffs leased certain real property to defendant Bryan; that the lease contained a provision against its assignment or the subletting of the leased premises without the written consent of the lessor being first obtained; that, notwithstanding such provision, and without first obtaining such written consent of the lessor, the lessee executed and delivered an assignment of the lease; also that he sublet the property—all of which conduct on the part of the lessee precipitated an action in unlawful detainer on the part of plaintiffs against the defendants Saxton and Bryan. The trial of the action resulted in a judgment for possession and damages in favor of plaintiffs, and defendants appeal therefrom.

[1] Appellants contend that, in order that any assignment of the lease should be violative of the provisions thereof to which reference has been had, such assignment must have been in writing. That objection, however good in the abstract, is completely disposed of by the finding of fact by the trial court, based upon sufficient evidence, that such assignment was made for a valuable consideration, that it was in writing, and that it was delivered to the assignees thereof.

Appellants also feel aggrieved because of the finding by the trial court that, contrary to the provisions of the lease, the lessee sublet the leased premises without first having obtained the written consent of the lessor so to do, and insist that a sublease for a longer period than one year would necessarily have to be in writing. The finding by the court with reference to such subletting in that regard simply was that, on a designated date, for a fixed consideration per month, the lessee sublet the premises described in the lease to a certain person, and thereupon delivered possession of said premises to him, etc. The term of the sublease is not mentioned in the findings other than that it may be inferred therefrom that it was a month-to-month tenancy. Because it does not affirmatively appear that there was a subletting of the premises for a period longer than one year, it becomes manifest that the point to which appellants refer does not arise in the case.

[2] Appellants also cite authorities and argue to the effect that covenants in a lease against assignment and subletting should be strictly construed. While the general rule is in accordance with such contention, as is clearly stated in one of the cases cited by appellants, it "does not mean that courts must resort to scholastic subtleties to save tenants from the consequences of their deliberate breach of their covenants." DeAngeles v.

Cotta, 62 Cal. App. 691, 217 P. 821. If such a covenant is contained within a lease, and by a preponderance of the evidence it appears in that regard that the lease has been breached, a finding by the trial court to that effect must result in a conclusion of law that the lease has been terminated, with a consequent judgment thereon decreeing a forfeiture.

[3] It is also claimed by appellants that, by acceptance of rent by the lessor from the person to whom the lessee had sublet the premises, the lessor waived a forfeiture, and that by "conduct and conversation the plaintiffs are estopped to declare a forfeiture."

The answer of the defendants to plaintiffs' complaint contained no such defense or defenses; nor is the attention of this court directed to any finding of fact upon which either of such defenses could rest. There was, however, evidence introduced on the trial of the case which would justify findings which would be entirely opposed to facts necessary to support either a defense of waiver or a defense of estoppel. It is a rule that all intendments are in favor of the judgment rendered by the trial court, from which it follows that it must be assumed that, had any finding been made by the trial court with reference to either of the defenses which are now for the first time interposed, such finding would have been against defendants' contentions. It therefore becomes impracticable to consider the evidence which it is suggested by appellants would authorize (although not require) the conclusion for which they contend.

[4, 5] It is next contended that in any event no judgment could stand as against Helen E. Saxton, one of the defendants in the case. The findings of the trial court show that, after notices to quit possession had been served on the subtenant and the defendant Saxton, the subtenant abandoned the possession of the premises, whereupon the defendant Saxton tore down the notice to quit which had been posted on the premises and assumed and continued in possession thereof for a period of about one month thereafter, at which time she in turn abandoned the premises. The court further found:

> "* * * That it is not true that the defendant Helen E. Saxton occupied and possessed the said premises from February 6, 1925, to March 3, 1925, as the representative and agent of said defendant C. T. Bryan and under and by virtue of said power of attorney, but on the contrary said defendant Helen E. Saxton occupied and possessed the premises during said period as assignee of the interests and title therein of defendant C. T. Bryan, and for her own use and benefit. * * *"

It thus appearing that defendant Saxton was wrongfully in possession of the premises "as assignee of the interests and title" of the original lessee, and that on her own account she remained in such possession for a considerable period after the three days' notice to quit had been served upon her, it is apparent that her liability for damages of which appellants complain ensued as a matter of course.

As the judgment is drawn, it runs not only against defendant Saxton, but also against defendant Bryan, the original lessee. In view of the finding of the trial court to which reference has just been had, and the fact that, after service of notice to quit possession defendant Saxton did not occupy the premises "as the representative and agent of said defendant C. T. Bryan, * * * but on the contrary said defendant Helen E. Saxton occupied and possessed the premises * * * for her own use and benefit," it follows that that part of the judgment which awards damages to plaintiffs as against defendant Bryan in the sum of $450 on account of the unlawful detention by him of said premises, must be reversed. Otherwise the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Iva E. Hamilton against J. M. French and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. D. Van Nostran, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them in an action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of the fraud and misrepresentations of the defendants.

The defendant J. M. French is engaged in the real estate business in Los Angeles, Cal., as a duly licensed real estate broker, doing business under the fictitious name of J. M. French Company. The defendant F. H. Russell is a real estate salesman, working in the office of J. M. French Company, and the defendant Weta G. Glassell was one of the clients of this office, and formerly owned certain land in San Diego county about which the misrepresentations are alleged to have been made.

At the time the misrepresentations are alleged to have been made plaintiff was the owner of a certain house and lot in the city of Los Angeles, Cal., which she had listed with the J. M. French Company for sale or exchange at a valuation of $7,500, with the understanding, however, that she would be interested in any offers for the property which would secure her $6,100, the amount it had cost her.

Plaintiff alleged that on or about May 1, 1922, the defendants represented to her that a certain described 40 acres of land in San Diego county owned by defendant Glassell was of the market value of $2,500; that it was composed of black, silt loam, was accessible for farming purposes, and could be readily irrigated from a nearby stream. It is alleged that these representations were made to plaintiff for the purpose of persuading her to exchange her Los Angeles property for the 40 acres in San Diego county at a valuation of $2,500; that she was inexperienced in the value of real estate, and had no knowledge or information concerning the San Diego land or the market value thereof; that she relied upon said representations of defendants, believing them to be true, and, relying wholly thereon, was induced to exchange her Los Angeles property for the San Diego property and a $4,000 note, the purchaser of the Los Angeles property to assume a $1,000 mortgage thereon. Plaintiff further alleges that said representations of the defendants were false and fraudulent; that defendants did not believe them to be true, and made them to plaintiff with the intention of deceiving her and inducing her to exchange the Los Angeles property as aforesaid, and but for said representations plaintiff would not have made the exchange.

Plaintiff further alleged that after the exchange she learned that said representations made by defendants were false and fraudulent; that said San Diego county land was not, and is not, worth more than $50; that it is not good for agricultural purposes; and that it is a rocky mountain side, entirely unfit for farming purposes, and not susceptible of irrigation; and that plaintiff has been damaged by reason of said misrepresentations in the sum of $2,450.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,075, together with interest, from which judgment the defendants appeal.

[1] It is contended that the finding that the representations as alleged were made by the defendants is not sustained by the evidence, for the reason that it appears that the representations were actually made by the defendant Russell only. While it is true that Weta G. Glassell and J. M. French did not personally make the false representations to plaintiff, it is beyond dispute that J. M. French Company was acting as agent for defendant Glassell in the exchange of her land, and that defendant Russell was the individual representing J. M. French Company in the transaction. The principals are charged with the fraud of their agent committed on their behalf and in their interest during the course of the employment, of which fraud they accepted the benefits. The defendant J. M. French is not only charged with responsibility for the acts of his agent by virtue of this relationship, but the record discloses that he expressly stated to plaintiff, upon her inquiry, that Mr. Russell was entirely responsible, and was truthful and honest in all his dealings, and that he (French) would trust him more than anybody he knew, and that plaintiff might depend upon anything he said; that the "deal" was a good one for her, and that there was no reason for her to worry about it.

It appears that the objection to this finding is without merit. The transcript evidences the making of the representations repeatedly and urgently by Russell and that he was acting as the agent for the other defendants, and made the representations in the course of his employment; that the plaintiff was entirely inexperienced in business, a widow with small resources, and a family of children to raise, who relied absolutely upon defendants, and told them so, over and over again, pleading with them not to take advantage of her in a transaction which involved all her scanty resources; that the defendants, being fully aware of these facts, and observing her almost childish reliance upon their judgment and honesty, made numerous representations with absolutely no basis of fact, and urged them upon the plaintiff repeatedly until she made the exchange of the property.

[2] Appellants also urge that the record contains no findings that the plaintiff relied upon the representations; that defendants made them with intent to induce plaintiff to rely upon them; that plaintiff relied solely upon them; that plaintiff acted with prudence in relying upon the representations; that plaintiff was damaged.

[3] It is entirely clear from the evidence and from the findings made that plaintiff relied upon the representations made to her by defendants. While it is not so stated specifically in the findings, they do recite that she was induced to make the exchange by reason of said false representations.

Necessary inferences from findings to support a judgment may be drawn upon appeal. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 217 P. 750. With reference to the points made by appellants as to the absence of the other findings mentioned, the recent case last cited is also an answer. Therein it was said:

> "From the facts found, and from the judgment ordered, it is evident, in the light of the entire record, that if more complete findings had been made they would have been adverse to the contentions of the appellant. If that be so, the failure to find further is not a ground for the reversal of the judgment."

[4] It may also be said that with reference to a finding on damages, while the arithmetical calculations have not been made in the findings, all the facts and figures are found which enter into the determination of the amount of damages. It is found that plaintiff's property was reasonably worth $6,100, and was subject to a mortgage of $1,000; that she received in exchange therefor a note for $4,000, and the San Diego land, which was worth not to exceed $50. This would make her damage at least the sum of $1,050. It is also found that plaintiff paid defendants a commission of $375 for acting as her agent in this transaction, which was estimated upon a valuation of $7,500 for her property. The balance of the judgment, $25, was doubtless to cover her refund upon this item, and it would seem that, if any discrepancy occurred in estimating this amount, it is in favor of appellants.

There are no errors in the record calling for a reversal of the judgment, which appears to have done justice between the parties.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1).

Judgment based on conflicting testimony must be accepted as conclusive on appeal.

2. Landlord and tenant 🔑326(1)—Crop contract held to contemplate payment on basis of total sum paid for 1922 crop, not part payment thereof, plus balance paid for 1921 crop, during 1922.

Contract to farm land for 35 per cent. of gross proceeds of raisins grown thereon in 1922, figured on basis of what raisin company paid growers during such year, held to contemplate compensation according to total sum paid for 1922 crop, not partial payment or advance on purchase price thereof, plus balance paid for 1921 crop, during 1922.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1172(1)—Plaintiffs not having proved right to sum awarded, judgment must be reversed in part, though defendant insisted on interpretation entitling them to less than sum to which entitled.

Where plaintiffs did not prove right to full sum awarded them under court's erroneous interpretation of crop contract, judgment must be reversed in part and cause remanded, though defendant insisted on interpretation entitling them to less than sum to which entitled.

4. Costs 🔑241—Costs on appeal will be apportioned equally, where about equal portions of testimony supporting judgment reversing in part and affirming in part are brought up.

Where about equal portions of testimony showing that judgment should be reversed in part and that it should be affirmed in part are brought up, costs on appeal, except that of printing briefs, will be apportioned equally on such disposition being made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Action by Steve Zahos and another against E. F. Loescher. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded in part, and affirmed in part.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, for appellant.
Theodore M. Stuart and E. L. Kellas, both of Fresno, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiffs had judgment for the sum of $5,940.93, balance found due by the court for and on account of a certain cropping contract entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant. From this judgment the defendant appeals. From the record it appears that the defendant owned a vineyard and orchard consisting of about 160 acres, in the county of Fresno, state of California; that the plaintiffs were farm laborers and workers accustomed to work in vineyards, and had worked in that capacity prior to December, 1921; that on or about December 1, 1921, the parties entered into a contract whereby the plaintiffs were to enter upon the premises referred to, take care of, cultivate, and gather all fruits and crops produced upon said premises, perform certain specified labor mentioned in the contract, and receive for their services 35 per cent. of the gross proceeds of the crops raised upon said premises. The controversy in this case arises over the different interpretations sought to be given by the respective parties to the contract entered into between them. After specifying the work to be performed, the contract then takes up the subject of compensation, and is couched in the following language:

> "The party of the first part (being the defendant in this case) agrees to pay to the parties of the second part (plaintiffs in this case) a sum of money equal to an amount of thirty-five per cent. (35%) of the gross proceeds of the crops of raisins grown or produced on the above described premises during the year 1922. Such proceeds are to be figured upon the basis of what the California Associated Raisin Company pay their growers for such varieties of raisins during said year, and thirty-five per cent. (35%) of the gross proceeds of all other crops, including rootings and wood grown or produced on the above described premises during the same year, but in any event settlement is to be made not later than December 1, 1922."

The fact that the California Associated Raisin Company did not fully pay the purchase price of the 1922 crop of raisins during the year 1922, but only made an advance payment on account of said crop in a sum ranging from 3½ to 4½ cents per pound and final payment some time during the following year, time not given nor amount being testified to, gives rise to the controversy over the interpretation of the contract. The plaintiffs, in their complaint, set forth "that by the terms of said agreement, defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiffs a sum of money equal to thirty-five per cent. (35%) of the gross proceeds of all crops produced on said premises during said year of 1922," which, of course, is a correct deduction based upon the contract entered into between the parties. The basis fixed in the contract, however, of determining the value of the gross proceeds is not alleged in the complaint of plaintiffs. The defendant, in view of the fact that the California Associated Raisin Company had only made a partial payment on account of the 1922 contract, after quoting the portion of the contract setting forth that the plaintiffs were to be compensated in a sum equal to 35 per cent. of the gross proceeds of the crop produced on the premises during the year 1922, set forth that "such proceeds are to be figured upon the basis of what the California Associated Raisin Company pay to their growers for such varieties of raisins during said year, and thirty-five per cent. (35%) of the gross proceeds of all other crops, including rootings and wood grown or produced on the above-described premises during the same year; that said sum shall be accepted by the second parties (plaintiffs herein) as and for full compensation for all work and labor performed and materials furnished by them under this agreement," and in this connection it is alleged "that there was grown and produced on said premises during said year 1922 the following varieties of grapes, to-wit: Thompson Seedless, Sultanas, and Malagas; that the California Associated Raisin Company during said year 1922 paid 4¼ cents per pound for extra standard Thompson Seedless raisins, and 4 cents per pound for standard Thompson Seedless raisins, and 4 cents per pound for Sultana raisins, and 3½ cents per pound for substandard Thompson Seedless raisins," which would lead to the inference that that is all the California Associated Raisin Company paid growers for such varieties of raisins raised during the year 1922. As set forth in its answer, the allegations only state about one-half the facts. If the amount paid by the California Associated Raisin Company during the year 1922, considered as a calendar year, is to be deemed the measure by which the compensation owing to the plaintiffs is to be determined, then there should have been set forth the additional truth that the California Associated Raisin Company had also during the same year paid almost an equal amount to growers of said varieties of raisins, even though such payment was made as a final settlement for the 1921 crop. In other words, the defendant, by his pleadings, shows that if the calendar year is to be considered only, one payment made by the California Associated Raisin Company has been alleged, whereas, two payments were made.

The allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint lead to the conclusion that the interpretation of the contract, as first entertained, was that whatever was paid by the association for the 1922 crop was to be the standard by which compensation agreed to be paid the plaintiffs should be measured, but that, by some means or other, the court, in considering the words, "or in any event settlement is to be made not later than December 1, 1922," led to the adoption of the standard of measuring compensation to be awarded the plaintiff by the sum paid by the California Associated Raisin Company during the calendar year 1922, irrespective of whether the payment was made upon the lap-over of the 1921 crop, or the advance payment on the 1922 crop, and considered such payments as the amount paid by the California Associated Raisin Company during the year 1922.

The defendant also sets out certain credits and offsets, and the court found that the defendant was entitled to credits in the sum of $5,656.88, but did not award defendant anything upon his cross-complaint.

Adopting the final payment made by the California Associated Raisin Company on the 1921 crop during the year 1921, and also the advance or first payment on the 1922 crop made by the California Associated Raisin Company, as the basis of figuring the compensation due the plaintiffs, the court found the plaintiffs entitled to $11,597.81 and the defendant entitled to credits in the sum before mentioned of $5,656.88, and awarded plaintiffs judgment for the balance.

sists that the court erred in its interpretation of the contract referred to and also in denying the defendant judgment upon his cross-complaint. Upon the cross-complaint it is sufficient to say that the testimony is conflicting, and, being based on a conflict of testimony, nothing else appearing, must be accepted as conclusive on appeal. What the California Associated Raisin Company paid raisin growers for the 1922 crop does not appear in the record. It does appear, however, that the defendant received the gross sum of $28,908.91 for and on account of the crop and all matters included within the terms of the contract entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant and to the gross proceeds of which the plaintiffs are entitled to a sum of money equaling 35 per cent. If the California Associated Raisin Company paid a like price to the growers of raisins of the kind and variety produced upon the lands belonging to the defendant, then and in that case the figures adopted by the court in going back to the payment on the 1921 crop give to the plaintiffs the sum of $1,479.70 in excess of what they should have been awarded. We come now to the contract itself. We think the following excerpt from the argument of the appellant correctly states the situation:

> "Referring to the situation of the parties when contract was made in December, 1921, defendant owned a valuable vineyard, and plaintiffs desired the opportunity of farming the same, to receive their pay out of 35 per cent. of the proceeds of the crop. Not desiring to take 35 per cent. of what the defendant sold his crops for, because the California Associated Raisin Company paid a big price for the 1921 crop, plaintiffs wanted to be paid according to what the said association paid for the 1922 crop.
> "Q. Well, with relation to this phase of the subject, what, if anything, was said about the raisin association, or the property being put in the association? A. Mr. Kellas wrote that clause in the contract regarding settlement, and the reason it was put in the contract was this: That the previous years, that the boys had worked on another ranch, and the crop was sold for less money than what the raisin association paid the growers, plaintiffs wanted to be paid according to what said association paid for the 1922 crop."

The testimony quoted in the argument of the appellant is the testimony of the defendant himself, which shows that all parties had in mind the total sum that should be paid for the year 1922 crop by the California Associated Raisin Company, and not simply a partial payment or an advance on account of a part of the purchase price of that crop. This testimony clearly shows that none of the parties was contemplating that the standard of compensation should be only one-half the purchase price, irrespective of when defendant should pay it. It also appears from the record that the words: "In any event settlement is to be made not later than December 1, 1922," was inserted in the handwriting of the defendant. These words have nothing to do with the standard by which the compensation is to be measured. It is simply a date of settlement. The error in fixing the date of settlement at a time prior to the date upon which the prices paid by the California Associated Raisin Company could be ascertained cannot be allowed to cut the agreed compensation in two, or to admit the interpretation that a part payment on the purchase price of a preceding crop may be used in adding to the compensation. By way of illustration, it appears that there was introduced as an exhibit a copy of the contract used by the California Associated Raisin Company, a reference to which shows that the raisins grown by the members were to be delivered not later than December 1st of each year, and that within six days after receipt of the raisins an additional payment was to be made therefor and final payment during the following year as the same may be determined, after deducting expenses from receipts, etc. The contract also provides that the crop year should be deemed to be from September 1st of one year to August 31st of the succeeding year. This again enforces the conclusion that the parties had in mind the compensation to be paid according to the prices paid for the 1922 crop, and that the desire of the parties to have settlement made by December 1st has nothing to do with the interpretation that should be given to the contract.

[3, 4] While the defendant has insisted upon an interpretation of the contract which would award to the plaintiffs only a little over one-half of the sum to which the record shows they were entitled, it nevertheless is true that the plaintiffs have not proven that they were entitled to much over one-half the sum awarded them, and that the court should have sustained the defendant's objection to the testimony relating to the prices paid by the association on account of the 1921 crop. As to all other matters, we find no error justifying reversal. It follows from what has been said that the judgment must be reversed, in so far as the value fixed upon the several varieties of raisins is concerned, on the ground that the findings in relation to said raisins are not supported by the evidence, and the cause remanded to the trial court to ascertain and determine the value of the crop of raisins raised upon said premises measured by the prices paid by the California Associated Raisin Company for the 1922 crop, irrespective of the date of payment made therefor, and award the plaintiffs said sum; in all other respects the judgment is affirmed, and, it further appearing from an examination of the transcript in this case that the portion of the testimony brought up necessary to show that the judgment should be reversed in part and that the portion brought up necessary to show that the judgment should be affirmed in part are about equal, it is further ordered that the costs on appeal, outside of the cost of printing briefs, shall be apportioned equally to the parties herein, and that the parties shall pay the costs of the preparing and printing respectively of their own briefs.

George W. Homan and A. G. Reily, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jarrott & Jarrott, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an action for divorce, based upon the alleged grounds of extreme cruelty and willful neglect. The extreme cruelty alleged in plaintiff's complaint was of the class known as mental cruelty. The plaintiff alleged in her complaint that the defendant had been guilty of inflicting extreme cruelty on the plaintiff at many times, by conduct of a cruel and inhuman nature, and that it consisted largely of inflicting grievous mental suffering on the plaintiff, and then alleges certain specific instances wherein it is stated that the conduct of the defendant was detrimental to the health of the plaintiff and that of the minor child of the plaintiff and defendant. She alleges that these specific acts impaired their health to such an extent that life for the plaintiff with the defendant was "insupportable and impossible."

[1-3] Plaintiff's appeal is based upon the assumption—an assumption contrary to law—that this court is authorized to pass upon the merits of findings of fact which have resulted from the trial court's consideration of conflicting evidence. Counsel for appellant limit their contention to the proposition that the evidence "was of such a nature as to justify the court in finding for the plaintiff instead of for the defendant." They do not contend, and upon the record it is clear that they could not successfully contend, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings as made. Some of the principal charges made by the plaintiff in her testimony were denied by the defendant in the testimony given by him. Assuming, as we must, that the court was justified in believing the testimony of the defendant, the established facts are insufficient to warrant a divorce upon either one of the alleged causes of action. The court having the parties before it, having heard the evidence and having thus decided the matter, this court will not interfere with its judgment.

JOHNSTON v. JONES, Sheriff. (Civ. 3012.)

1. Sheriffs and constables 🔑87.

Sheriff, after making return on writ, has no further duty to perform relative to garnishment.

2. Mandamus 🔑73(1)—Mandamus will not issue against sheriff to release garnishment on personalty not within his possession (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 671, 1085).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, authorizing mandamus to compel action enjoined by law on officers, mandamus will not issue against sheriff to release garnishment on personalty not in his possession, though garnishment, under section 671, ceases on filing of stay bond, since no action on part of sheriff can add anything to effect of garnishment.

3. Mandamus 🔑73(1)—Mandamus will issue against sheriff to release attachment on realty dissolved by execution of stay bond in principal action (Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 1, and sections 560, 671; Pol. Code, § 4157).

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 1, and section 560, relating to attachment on realty, mandamus will issue against sheriff to release of record an attachment dissolved under section 671 by execution of stay bond in principal action, as required of sheriff by Pol. Code, § 4157.

4. Mandamus 🔑73(1)—Court has no power to direct sheriff to release garnishment in an independent suit in mandamus, even though it would have such power in attachment suit on filing of stay bond.

Though court may have inherent power in attachment suit on filing of stay bond to direct sheriff to release garnishment, it does not follow that court has such power in independent suit in mandamus to compel release of garnishment.

5. Mandamus ⟹176—Court cannot dissolve attachment in mandamus suit to which plaintiff in attachment suit is not a party.

In mandamus to compel sheriff to release of record an attachment, to which plaintiff in attachment suit is not a party, court is without power to dissolve or discharge attachment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Mandamus by Catherine M. Johnston to compel Ellis W. Jones, Sheriff of County of Sacramento, to dismiss attachments and garnishments. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed in part, and in part reversed.

See, also, 239 P. 862.

Ralph H. Lewis and Berkeley B. Blake, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action for a writ of mandamus to compel the defendant "to dismiss the attachments and garnishments" issued and levied in an action against plaintiff for the recovery of money. The defendant sheriff executed the writ of attachment in that action "by garnisheeing money" which this plaintiff had on deposit in a certain bank "and also levied said writ of attachment upon real property" belonging to her. Judgment was thereafter entered in said action against this plaintiff as prayed for in the complaint therein. Plaintiff herein appealed from the judgment and filed a good and sufficient undertaking, approved by the judge of the trial court, staying execution pending appeal, and the appeal is still pending. This plaintiff, after the filing and approval of such undertaking, requested the defendant "to release the attachments and garnishments * * * issued in said matter," but the defendant refused. The trial court entered judgment herein in favor of the plaintiff and issued a peremptory writ of mandamus requiring the defendant to release such "attachments or garnishments." The defendant has appealed on the judgment roll alone.

[1, 2] Section 671 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a judgment "lien continues for five years unless the enforcement of the judgment be stayed on appeal by the execution of a sufficient undertaking as provided in this code, in which case the lien of the judgment and any lien by virtue of an attachment that has been issued and levied in the action ceases." In Brun v. Evans (Cal. Sup.) 241 P. 86, it is held that an attachment lien upon real estate ceases upon the filing of a stay bond on appeal. Whether the term "lien," as used in section 671, may be applied to the effect of a garnishment has not been decided. Somewhat similar questions were discussed in Nordstrom v. Corona City Water Co., 155 Cal. 206, 212, 100 P. 242, 132 Am. St. Rep. 81, and Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 111 Cal. 386, 393, 43 P. 1111. It is unnecessary, however, to decide that question because the sheriff, after making his return, had no further duty to perform relative to such garnishment. The writ of mandamus "may be issued * * * to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. No law has been cited which enjoins a sheriff to release a garnishment. If, under the provisions of section 671, the garnishment in this case ceased upon the filing of the stay bond, no action on the part of the sheriff could add anything to the effect thereof, and information that such undertaking had been filed and approved was as readily ascertainable by the bank as by the sheriff. Had the sheriff held possession of personal property capable of manual delivery, a different question would be presented.

[3] In case of attachment of real property the Legislature has wisely provided a different procedure. In the attachment of real property there must be filed "with the recorder of the county a copy of the writ, together with a description of the property attached and a notice that it is attached." Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 1. Until such attachment is released of record the attachment stands as a cloud upon the title of such real estate. Section 560 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "An attachment as to any real property may be released by a writing signed by the plaintiff, or his attorney, or the officer who levied the writ."

This section doubtless has reference to a release of record in a proper case. Section 4157 of the Political Code provides:

> "The sheriff must: * * * (7) Release on the record all attachments of real property, when the attachment placed in his hand has been released or discharged."

In Clark v. Superior Court, 37 Cal. App. 732, 174 P. 681, a writ of mandate was issued requiring the sheriff therein mentioned to release of record a writ of attachment which had been dissolved by a judgment in favor of the defendant in the attachment suit. Under the authority of that case, it is the duty of defendant sheriff to release of record the attachment of the real estate referred to herein.

[4] No authority appearing in support of the judgment requiring the defendant to release the garnishment, that part of the judgment must be reversed. Even if it were conceded that in the attachment suit the court had inherent power, upon the filing of the stay bond, to direct the sheriff, as an officer of the court, to release the garnishment, it would not follow that in an independent suit in mandamus the court has such power. In the one case the sheriff's duty would arise out of the order of the court, but in the other the duty must be one specially enjoined by law.

[5] The judgment also provides:

> "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said attachments or garnishments * * * and any lien created by same are discharged and released by the filing of said undertaking on appeal staying execution in said matter."

It is clear that in a suit for a writ of mandate to compel the sheriff to release of record an attachment, to which proceeding the plaintiff in the attachment suit is not a party, the court is without power to dissolve or discharge the attachment.

In so far as the judgment requires the defendant, in effect, to "release on the record" the attachment of real property, as provided in section 4157 of the Political Code, it is affirmed. In other respects the judgment is reversed, appellant to recover costs of appeal.

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(1).

Action for malpractice of physician is based on tort, and not upon contract of employment.

2. Limitation of actions 🔑55(3)—Action for malpractice of physician must be brought within one year of negligent act causing injury; time not being extended by continuance of physician's employment (Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 340, subd. 3, action for malpractice of physician must be brought within one year of negligent act causing injury, and time for bringing action cannot be extended on theory that contract of employment continued to within one year of action, and that negligence of physician continued under such contract in failing to correct original mistakes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; C. J. Luttrell, Judge,

Action by Joseph Wetzel against Charles I. Pius for damages for malpractice. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for appellant.

James M. Allen, of Yreka, and Hartley F. Peart and Charles V. Barfield, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHIELDS, Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages against a physician and surgeon for malpractice in negligently setting the femur bone in plaintiff's leg.

In his complaint plaintiff charges that on or about the 17th day of May, 1922, he broke this bone in his right leg and, relying upon the skill of defendant, employed him to attend to the injury and to give him such care and treatment as was usual and necessary in such cases to effect a cure. Continuing plaintiff charges that defendant so negligently and unskillfully conducted himself in attempting to set the leg that the ends of said femur bone were allowed to overlap, and were not properly joined together, through which plaintiff's leg became deformed, and became, and remained, permanently shortened.

The complaint was filed August 16, 1923. A demurrer to this complaint was sustained, apparently upon the ground that the cause of action alleged was barred by subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure. An amended complaint was thereupon filed, in which the injury to plaintiff and his employment of defendant "to attend to his said injury and give him such care and treatment as was usual and necessary to effect a cure" was alleged as in the first complaint. It was then further alleged that the employment so begun was continued until February, 1923. The amended complaint then repeated the allegation of the original complaint as to the negligent and unskillful setting of the bone by which the ends of the bone were not joined together, but were overlapped; the amended complaint adding that the bones were negligently permitted to so remain until they became knit together in that position.

The amended complaint finally alleged that the defendant should, in the exercise of ordinary care, have reset the bones in plaintiff's leg, but that, in neglect of his duty, during the time he was treating plaintiff for his said injury, he took no steps whatever to reset the bones, but negligently refused to do so, whereby the injury occurred, and the leg became deformed and permanently shortened.

A demurrer was filed to this complaint upon the grounds chiefly, that the complaint was uncertain, in that it did not state the date upon which the femur bone was first improperly set, and that the cause of action alleged was barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure. This demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and from the judgment for defendant thereupon entered this appeal was taken. The demurrer to the original complaint was, beyond question, correctly sustained. The injury alleged occurred much more than a year before the complaint was filed and the action stated was clearly barred by subdivision 3, § 340, Code of Civil Procedure.

To obviate this objection, the amended complaint alleged a contract of employment extending from the time of the accident and the setting of the bone and continuing until within one year of the filing of the complaint. It was alleged that the contract provided for the setting of the bone and caring for the injury until a cure had been effected. The theory of the amended complaint is that there was a breach of this contract in the failure of the defendant to reset the bone during the term of his employment, and after it became apparent that the injury seemed to require such a remedy. In his amended complaint plaintiff bases his action upon this contract. He states his contention in these words:

> "Our contention is that, plaintiff being entitled to ordinary care and skill during treatment though an operation was improper, if during treatment a condition developed that a physician should with ordinary professional care and skill have discovered and remedied, neglect to do so is actionable, and, if such neglect continued * * * during all the time plaintiff was under * * * treatment, an action may be brought at any time within one year from the time of the patient's discharge for neglect of such duty."

[1, 2] This contention is mistaken. Actions of this character are not based upon the contract of employment; they sound in tort, and are classed as actions ex delicto. In discussing a similar contention, our Supreme Court said:

> "The contract of employment has nothing whatever to do with the liability except to create a duty on the part of the employer, a duty not expressed in the contract, and for the violation of which the contract of employment furnishes no rule or standard for the estimation of damages; nor is the action grounded upon the contract, but upon the duty springing from the relation created by it, viz., that of employer and employee, and under the old system of pleading was always classed as an action ex delicto." Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316, 55 P. 1000; Marty v. Somers, 35 Cal. App. 182, 169 P. 411; Basler v. Sacramento, etc., Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 33, 134 P. 993.

The pleadings in the case of Krebenios v. Lindauer, 175 Cal. 431, 166 P. 17, were substantially as in the case under consideration. Plaintiff in his original complaint, as in this case, charged an ordinary action ex delicto. In an amended complaint he charged a violation of a contract of employment, and sought damages, as here, for a violation of the contract. The court disposed of this contention with terseness and vigor, saying that "the action is clearly one in tort and not in breach of contract." No departure from this rule has ever crept into the California cases. In a recent case, after reviewing the earlier decisions, the rule is decisively reaffirmed in these words:

> "Notwithstanding the conflict of authority from other jurisdictions, we are satisfied that it has become the settled rule in California that actions for injuries caused by the negligent acts of another or his agent must be commenced within the period of one year from the date of the alleged injury, and that the fact that the parties stand in contractual relation to each other does not operate to change the rule or extend the time for the commencement of such actions." Harding v. Liberty Hospital Corp., 177 Cal. 520, 171 P. 98.

This, of course, does not mean that if some new and different act of negligence should occur during the course of an employment, it could not be made the bias of a separate and independent action. The rule above stated is based upon the theory that, where an act of negligence, as in this case the improper setting of the femur bone, causes damage, the cause of action is complete, and cannot be split up. The original injury remains the sole cause of action, and subsequent acts which merely aggravate the damage already done, or later developments which frequently add new elements of damage, merely attach themselves to the original cause of action, and do not of themselves become independent causes of action, nor do they revive the cause of action for the original injury, if the same has become barred. Furgason v. Bellaire, 197 Iowa, 277, 197 N. W. 13; Coady v. Reins, 1 Mont. 424.

The demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is, therefore, affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Evans F. Gordon was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur L. Veitch and Stanley E. Tweedy, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Edwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was charged by information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county with the crime of murder, in that he did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously, and with malice aforethought, kill one Joseph E. De Hart, on or about the 7th day of June, 1925. The jury returned a verdict of murder in the second degree. A motion for new trial was presented, which was denied, and this is an appeal from the ruling last mentioned and from the judgment.

It appears that, on the night of the occurrence in controversy, Gordon, with his wife and child, drove to the De Hart residence on Adams street, in the city of Los Angeles, for the purpose of attempting to collect the value of a window which the defendant claimed to have been broken in his store by the young son of Mrs. De Hart. Gordon went to the house and knocked, a man appeared at the door, Gordon stated his business, and Mrs. De Hart then appeared. The evidence is squarely contradictory as to the cause and manner of the ensuing tragedy. Evidence offered by the people tended to show that Gordon shot De Hart and killed him inside the house, as a result of an argument, but without provocation, and that De Hart was not armed. The defense was that De Hart was shot by Gordon in self-defense. The latter testified that, while talking with Mrs. De Hart concerning his mission, a man stepped near the door, but remained back of Mrs. De Hart; that the man began to curse him, and finally drove him from the house; that as the defendant left he saw that the man had a revolver; that Mrs. De Hart threw up her arm as though to take hold of the man with her, and said, "Oh, my God! Don't kill this man! Don't shoot this man!" and told him that Gordon was all right; that the man came outside, and the defendant, seeing his own life, as he believed, in danger, produced a revolver which he carried for self-protection because he had considerable money on his person, and fired, intending to shoot the man in the shoulder; that Mrs. De Hart then cried, "You shot my husband; you killed my husband," whereupon, after some excited controversy and confusion, the evidence of which is not material to the questions here presented, Gordon returned home, where he left his weapon and later surrendered at the police station.

The prosecution contended that the defendant was inside the house at the time of the shooting, and that it was he who did the cursing, and that Mrs. De Hart had begged the defendant not to shoot "this man,"—her husband.

The first point advanced by appellant involves five requested instructions, each of which it is contended the trial court erroneously refused to give.

[1] By the first it was stated that the jury would have no right to disregard the testimony of the defendant, on the ground alone that he was charged with a crime; that the law presumes a defendant in a criminal case to be innocent until proven guilty; that he may testify in his own behalf, and his testimony should be fairly and impartially considered, together with all the other evidence in the case, and, if from all the other evidence the jury entertains a reasonable doubt, he should be acquitted; that the defendant is presumed to speak the truth, and, unless such presumption be destroyed by other evidence in the case, the jury must find that he did speak the truth.

A perusal of the instructions given reveals that all of the rules and principles of law embodied in the foregoing requested instruction were given in others, with the single exception of the statement that the defendant was entitled to testify in his own behalf. In this case the defendant occupied the witness stand on three occasions and testified at great length. It cannot therefore be said that he was denied such right, or that the jury could possibly infer from the fact that he did so that he exercised a privilege to which he was not lawfully entitled. The failure to advise the jury that the defendant had a right to be a witness could not, under these circumstances, have prejudiced his case.

[2] The four remaining requested instructions which the trial court declined to give were offered for the purpose of charging the jury that, should they find that the possession of a revolver by the defendant at the time of the shooting comported with certain habits, practices, and conditions to which he had testified, such possession on the date of the alleged offense should not be deemed indicative of malice toward the deceased; that the jury should consider any explanatory evidence of such possession upon a theory which would admit of the defendant's innocence; that one had a legal right to take life in self-defense; and that until proven to the contrary the character for traits of peace and quietude of a defendant on trial for crime must be presumed to be good.

[3] So far as any of these instructions embodied correct statements of the law as applicable to this case, they were fully covered by instructions given. It is unnecessary to incumber this opinion with a more extensive detail of the instructions refused, or to quote at length the many that were given. The jury were definitely and clearly instructed upon every principle of law pertaining to the case which any refused instruction properly suggested. Those which did not properly state the principles contended for were correctly refused. People v. Davis, 135 Cal. 162, 67 P. 59; People v. Doane, 77 Cal. 560, 20 P. 84; People v. Wagner, 29 Cal. App. 363, 155 P. 649. As to the instructions already given, it is a familiar rule that they need not be repeated in the same or different language. People v. Bringhurst, 192 Cal. 748, 221 P. 897; People v. Wolfgang, 192 Cal. 754, 221 P. 907; People v. Loomis, 170 Cal. 347, 149 P. 581; People v. Feld, 149 Cal. 464, 86 P. 1100.

[4, 5] It is strongly urged that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct, in that during his argument to the jury he is said to have brought forth new witnesses and introduced evidence. It is not necessary to consider this matter in detail, since no objection was made by counsel for defendant at the time, although ample opportunity was afforded. The alleged objectionable conduct of the district attorney extended over a considerable period of time, and counsel for the defendant seems to have had no thought of objecting until when, after a recess, he assigned the argument as misconduct. Another decisive reason why, if error was committed, it is not possible to urge it now, is that his counsel expressly waived such objection, as will appear from the following. Defendant's counsel made his first objection upon this assignment of error by saying:

> "The defendant being in court, and the jury present, I desire to reserve an exception to all that portion of the argument of the district attorney beginning at the point where he invited the jury to attend upon his argument while he was engaged with some variety of demonstration on People's Exhibit, the number of which I do not know. * * *
> "The Court: The district attorney was simply following the lead set by the attorney for the defendant.
> "Mr. Veitch: I realize that, your honor. And so far as he followed it I have no objection."

It thus appears that the defendant is precluded from urging any objection to the conduct of the district attorney in this behalf in so far as it coincides with the example which the trial court indicated had been set by counsel for the defendant. But the transcript does not contain a report of the argument of defendant's counsel; hence this court cannot say to what extent his conduct was exempt from objection under the waiver above mentioned.

It is also claimed that during the trial a member of the jury indicated the existence in her mind of an opinion adverse to the theory of self-defense as advanced and relied upon by the defendant. While a witness was on the stand one of the jurors asked a number of questions. A careful examination of that portion of the transcript discloses nothing which in our opinion indicates that the juror had formed an opinion upon the subject. The net result of the juror's questions was that in response to them the witness indicated that he had not seen a gun upon the occasion of the shooting, but only a gun handle, and that he did not know to whom the object belonged.

[6] Other alleged misconduct of the district attorney is not of such character as to be prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. A witness for the defendant who had related what he heard some one else say was asked questions upon cross-examination suggesting that the person whose statements were repeated was not regarded by those who knew him as reliable. Objection to such questions was properly sustained. Other points of this character do not require consideration.

[7, 8] It is suggested that there was serious misconduct on the part of a member of the jury. An affidavit of one Campbell is to the effect that during the trial of the case the affiant saw Mrs. Elizabeth F. Ruland, one of the jurors, lay her hand upon the shoulder of Mrs. De Hart, widow of the victim of the homicide, and heard the former say, "Never mind; we will fix him." This is denied in an affidavit of Mrs. De Hart. An affidavit was filed by Mrs. Ruland, in which she states that she was informed that another juror, Mrs. De Winstanley, held a conversation with Mrs. De Hart during the trial. Such an affidavit is insufficient, as it has been held that affidavits upon information and belief are not competent evidence to support charges of misconduct. People v. Chin Non, 146 Cal. 561, 566, 80 P. 681. In another affidavit made by the wife of the defendant, it is averred that the affiant saw a juror, whom she was informed and believed was Mrs. Ruland, place her hand upon Mrs. De Hart's shoulder and say something. It was said by counsel for defendant in the argument on motion for new trial, and is repeated in the brief, that the person intended to be referred to by Mr. Campbell was not Mrs. Ruland, but Mrs. De Winstanley. We need hardly say that an affidavit solemnly made and regularly filed in court cannot be altered by the mere declaration of counsel that the affiant intended to say something entirely different than the statement contained in the affidavit. We cannot say upon this state of facts that the trial court erred in denying the motion for new trial upon this ground.

JONES v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5310.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃607(1)—Filing of notice of appeal by defendant from judgment conclusively establishes actual knowledge of its rendition.

Actual knowledge by defendant of rendition of judgment is conclusively established by his filing notice of appeal therefrom.

2. Appeal and error ⊂⊃607(1)—Appearing in open court, calling attention to notice of motion for leave to file request for transcript, and expressing readiness to proceed, held not sufficient application within six months (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 473, 1003).

Defendant's counsel's appearance in open court after filing but not serving motion for order allowing him to file request for transcript under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, and calling attention to notice and stating that he was ready to proceed, held not to comply with requirements of such section requiring application to be made within six months, in view of section 1003.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃607(1)—Defendant seeking order to file request for transcript must move for particular relief desired as indicated in his notice of motion (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Defendant seeking relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, from consequences of delayed request for transcript, must move for particular relief desired by orally requesting court to take action indicated in notice of motion.

4. Prohibition ⊂⊃3(2).

Prohibition to prevent judge from settling and certifying reporter's transcript of proceedings is only adequate remedy available, where court grants application not made in time, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for leave to request transcript, as order is not appealable.

Application for writ of prohibition by G. H. Jones to be directed to the Superior Court of San Diego County, Hon. W. P. Cary, Judge thereof, and another. Writ granted.

Herbert C. Kelly, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Sloane & Sloane, of San Diego, and A. G. Reily, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Among others, the respondent W. J. Bryant was made a defendant in a suit brought by petitioner in the superior court of San Diego county; later a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. This was on the 16th day of April, 1925, and it was entered on the following day. On the 27th day of May, 1925, Bryant filed a notice of appeal and request for transcript of proceedings with the county clerk. On October 13, 1925, he, through his counsel, filed a notice stating that on the 19th day of October he would move the court for an order allowing him to file a request for transcript of the proceedings and an order directing the clerk to forward said transcript to the Supreme Court. The notice indicated that the motion would be for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure because of mistake, etc., in making a request for transcript more than 10 days after notice of the entry of judgment, and stated that it would be based on two affidavits which were filed with the notice of motion. Bryant's counsel appeared in court at the time designated, called attention to his notice and affidavits, and announced his readiness to present the motion. At that time counsel for petitioner was not present; there was no showing in the record then, and is none now, that he had been served with notice that the motion would be made, and the court requested that counsel for Bryant procure the attendance of counsel on the other side, and stated that when this was done the matter would be taken up. It appears that on the 2d day of December another notice similar to that last mentioned was filed, and on December 21, 1925, pursuant thereto, counsel for petitioner and for respondent Bryant were in court. Thereupon the latter made the motion noticed to be made at that time. No entry was made by the clerk of any proceeding on the 19th of October, but on the 21st day of December the court made the following order, nunc pro tunc:

> "Nunc pro tunc minute entry as of Monday, October 19, 1925, at 10 o'clock a. m. thereof.
> "This being the time heretofore noticed for the hearing of the defendant W. J. Bryant's motion for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, comes now the defendant W. J. Bryant herein by counsel A. G. Reily, Esq., and announced that he was ready to present said motion. The plaintiff not appearing and it appearing that counsel for said plaintiff had heretofore notified the court that he desired that no proceedings be had in said cause in his absence, said hearing is continued by the court until such date as may be agreed upon by and between respective counsel herein."

Also, on the 21st day of December, an additional affidavit was filed in support of the motion for relief. Over objections by petitioner the court granted the application, and this court has been asked to prohibit the superior court from settling and certifying the reporter's transcript of proceedings.

[1] There is some dispute as to whether or not respondent Bryant was, prior to October 14, 1925, served with notice that judgment had been rendered. That he had actual knowledge of the rendition of the judgment is conclusively established by the fact that he filed a notice of appeal therefrom on the 27th day of May, 1925. Fiske v. Gosbey, 168 Cal. 334, 143 P. 611.

[2] It is clear that if respondent Bryant's motion was first made on the 21st of December it was too late, for before that time more than six months had elapsed since his notice that judgment had been rendered. Therefore the jurisdiction of the trial court to grant the relief sought hangs primarily upon the legal effect of what transpired on the 19th day of October. If counsel then made a motion, he was in time; if he did not, he was too late. Regarding the matter most strongly with a view to upholding the action of the trial court, all that can be said is that after having filed, but not having served, the motion for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, counsel for respondent Bryant appeared in open court, called attention to his notice and the affidavit in support of it, and stated that he was ready to proceed. We have no hesitation in saying that this does not measure up to the requirement that application for relief must be made as specified in said section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. To make an application is to make a motion. Code Civ. Proc. § 1003. To appear in court and announce one's readiness to make a motion is not the making of the motion any more than would be the service of notice that one will make a motion. That the latter procedure is insufficient is well established. Herrlich v. McDonald, 80 Cal. 472, 22 P. 299; Thomas v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 629, 92 P. 739; Wheelock v. Superior Court, 67 Cal. App. 601, 227 P. 931; In re Morehouse, 176 Cal. 634, 169 P. 365.

[3] The only provision of law under which respondent Bryant might proceed is explicit in its requirement that one who would avail himself of its aid shall not merely direct the court's attention to his presence in court in the proceeding in which he is interested, but shall move for the particular relief desired, that is, orally request that the court take action as indicated in his notice. People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645; Spencer v. Branham, 109 Cal. 336, 41 P. 1095. There is nothing to the contrary in Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 703, 109 P. 91, to which our attention is directed. It is sufficient to distinguish that case from the instant proceeding to quote from the opinion the following:

> "On September 21, 1909, while the court was in session, McMahan appeared and formally moved the court to set aside the order of partial distribution, stating at length the grounds of the motion and filing affidavits in support thereof."

[4] Respondent Bryant is in error in the contention that petitioner's only remedy is by appeal; that an order of the character before us for review is not appealable has been held in a number of cases, among them Kramm v. Stockton Elec. R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 737, 136 P. 523; Id., 22 Cal. App. 761, 136 P. 534; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 69 P. 497.

Relief has been granted on the theory that it was sanctioned by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but in excess of the trial court's jurisdiction. Prohibition is the only adequate remedy available for the injured party. Entertaining these views, we do not deem it necessary or profitable to consider other grounds alleged by the petitioner as justification for the issuance of the writ.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of prohibition issue as prayed.

DOWD v. RUSSELL. (Civ. 3094.)

1. Replevin ⚷72.

Evidence held insufficient to support judgment for plaintiff in claim and delivery for automobile.

2. Replevin ⚷8(1).

In claim and delivery, plaintiff can recover only on strength of his own title.

3. Fraudulent conveyances ⚷133.

Transfer by bill of sale without delivery or change of possession is void as against subsequent purchasers, under Civ. Code, § 3440.

4. Automobiles ⚷19—One securing transfer of automobile from former owner on affidavit of lost registration certificate held not innocent purchaser (Motor Vehicle Act [St. 1919, p. 198]).

One securing transfer of automobile, under Motor Vehicle Act, on affidavit of lost registration certificate, which had been dead for three years (St. 1919, p. 198), without consideration or delivery, from one he knew had sold and delivered car to another before latter's promise to transfer it to him as security, was not innocent purchaser.

5. Automobiles ⚿19.

One receiving transfer of automobile with knowledge of prior sale thereof by transferor cannot recover it, after delivery to buyer and transferor's receipt and retention of full sale price, on ground that transferor failed to make statement of transfer to buyer on back of registration certificate as required by St. 1919, p. 200.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; John F. Pullen, Judge.

Action by Mervyn R. Dowd against George Russell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dowd & Reagh, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. S. Daly, William S. Howe, and Donald McKisick, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action in claim and delivery to recover an automobile in defendant's possession and alleged in the complaint to belong to the plaintiff. The defendant answered, denying that the plaintiff was the owner of the automobile, and alleging that the defendant was the owner thereof. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed. The facts are undisputed.

The plaintiff is an attorney at law, and for several years prior to August 15, 1923, he had been attorney for R. L. Breck, and the latter was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $155 for professional services. About the middle of August, 1923, Breck purchased the automobile involved herein from Josephine Lindeberg, the owner thereof. August 25, 1923, "Breck agreed to transfer the automobile to the plaintiff Dowd to secure the indebtedness of $155." No transfer of the machine to Dowd was ever executed by Breck. Breck "drove the said automobile to Truckee, where he used it as a stage between Truckee and Reno from August until December, 1923, without obtaining a new license to operate the machine." December 11, 1923, Breck sold and delivered the automobile to J. H. Batcher and Eugene W. Hunt, and gave them a bill of sale thereof. January 27, 1925, Batcher and Hunt sold and delivered the automobile to John Dickson. February 9, 1925, Dickson "for a good and valuable consideration sold and delivered said automobile to the defendant George Russell. Mr. Russell made no investigation of the condition of the title other than to ask J. S. Daly, who is and was attorney for Dickson if the title was all right, and Mr. Daly informed him that it was. Mr. Russell took a bill of sale from Mr. Dickson covering the purchase, but made no effort to secure a transfer thereof in accordance with the terms of the Motor Vehicle Act. Although appellant, Dowd, secured a promise from Breck in August, 1923, that Breck would cause said automobile to be transferred to Dowd, the car never did come into Dowd's possession until after the commencement of this action. Plaintiff did not ascertain that Josephine Lindeberg was the original owner of the car until October 19, 1924, but, on ascertaining this fact, * * * plaintiff, Dowd. secured a transfer of said automobile to him from Josephine Lindeberg, not on the original certificate, but upon an affidavit that the original was lost, and on the 24th day of December, 1924, filed this transfer in the office of the motor vehicle department." It does not appear whether or not the original certificate was in fact lost. March 6, 1925, "at Dowd's request, his client Breck made an affidavit that the said automobile had not been operated since 1921." Dowd believed that this affidavit stated the truth. "Upon the strength of the affidavit made by Breck, Dowd obtained a registration certificate from the motor vehicle department on the 6th day of March, 1925. This certificate, however, was not signed by Dowd until the date of the trial on or about the 29th day of April, 1925." Plaintiff at no time paid any money whatsoever for the obtaining of certificate or bill of sale from Josephine Lindeberg. It does not appear that the automobile was operated after the transfer from Breck to Batcher and Hunt on the 11th day of December, 1923, and it does not appear that any certificate of registration was issued by the Motor Vehicle Department to any person after the year 1921 until March of 1925."

[1-5] It is clear that the evidence is insufficient to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff. He must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title. Breck did not even attempt to transfer title to the plaintiff. If Breck's promise to transfer the automobile to plaintiff be given the effect of a bill of sale, the attempted transfer would be void as against subsequent purchasers, because there was no delivery or change of possession. Civ. Code, § 3440; Davenport v. Alexander, 53 Cal. App. 688, 690, 200 P. 771; Babson v. Salisbury, 46 Cal. App. 521, 523, 189 P. 702. Plaintiff acquired no title from Josephine Lindeberg, because she had none to convey. He is in no sense an innocent purchaser from her. At the time he attempted to acquire a paper title from her he knew that she had sold and delivered the automobile to Breck, because more than a year prior to that time Breck had promised to transfer it to the plaintiff as security. Independent of plaintiff's actual knowledge of such sale, the circumstances surrounding his transaction with Josephine Lindeberg were such as to put him upon inquiry. The paper transfer was based upon an alleged lost certificate of registration which had been dead for three years (Stats. 1919, p. 198), and there was neither consideration for such transfer nor delivery of the automobile. Plaintiff is in no better position than Josephine Lindeberg would be if she were suing to recover the machine. When she sold the automobile to Breck it became her duty to join with him "in a statement of said transfer indorsed upon the reverse side of the certificate of registration of said motor vehicle" for the purpose of filing the same with the motor vehicle department. Stats. 1919, p. 200. After she had sold and delivered the automobile to Breck and had received and was retaining the full selling price thereof, she could not recover the machine upon the ground that she had failed to make the statement required of her by the law. Boles v. Stiles, 188 Cal. 304, 306, 204 P. 848. Since plaintiff received the attempted transfer from Josephine Lindeberg with knowledge of the prior sale made by her and under the circumstances stated, there is no merit in his claim of ownership.

BAKER v. CARSTENBROOK. (Civ. 2928.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 24, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 22, 1926.)

1. Fraud ⟹31—Defrauded purchaser may rescind or sue for damages.

One induced to purchase by fraudulent representations may rescind contract and sue at law for consideration parted with, sue in equity to rescind and have full relief therein, or retain what he received and sue at law for damages sustained.

2. Fraud ⟹31—Vendee under executory contract can pay purchase price, retain possession, and recover damages for false representations.

Vendee under executory contract may pay or offer to pay full purchase price, retain possession, and accept such title as seller can give, and recover damages for breach of contract or false representations.

3. Fraud ⟹34.

To sue for damages for deceit, vendee need not rescind contract, restore possession, or return anything received thereunder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Frank E. Baker against Harry J. Carstenbrook. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Ebert and W. P. Rich, both of Marysville, for appellant.

Arthur M. Bundy, of Marysville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action for fraud and deceit in the sale of real estate. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendant appeals.

The record shows that on or about the 28th day of April, 1922, the appellant purported to convey and transfer to the plaintiff by a grant, bargain, and sale deed a certain tract of land situate, lying, and being in the city of Marysville, county of Yuba, state of California, described as follows: The east one-half of block No. 14 of range letter "K" of the said city of Marysville, as the lots, blocks, and ranges are laid down, numbered and designated upon the official recorded map of the said city of Marysville; that the appellant had at that time a certain tract of land inclosed by a fence which the defendant falsely represented to the plaintiff was the land described in the deed, the complaint further alleging that at the time of making such statements and representations the defendant knew the same to be false and that the false statements were made for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to consummate the deal and enter into the possession of the premises inclosed by the fence hereinbefore referred to; that the defendant at that date was in possession of the premises inclosed by the fence. It further appears from the complaint and also from the transcript that the defendant was not the owner of a considerable portion of the premises inclosed by the fence and that the plaintiff, relying upon the representations made by the defendant as to his ownership, made improvements upon that part of the premises inclosed by the fence aforesaid which did not belong to the defendant and the title to which the defendant could not and did not transfer to the plaintiff by the deed herein referred to. It further appears from the testimony and the findings of the court that the plaintiff made improvements upon the premises altogether of a value of $653 and that the reasonable value of the land which the defendant purported to convey to the plaintiff and which he did not convey was of the value of $100. As a conclusion of law it was determined that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant by reason of the facts referred to in the sum of $753.

[1] Only one point is urged as a reason for reversing the judgment of the trial court, to wit, that the action was prosecuted without first surrendering the premises to the defendant or any attempt made by the plaintiff to place the defendant in statu quo before proceeding to file the complaint herein. The appellant cites a number of cases to the effect that before a purchaser can rescind a contract to purchase, as a condition precedent to bringing the action to recover the purchase money or damages, the plaintiff must place the vendor in statu quo or offer to restore possession of everything of value received by him. We do not need to examine the cases cited by appellant supporting the rule just stated. The law as stated by the appellant is absolutely correct, where an action is brought to rescind, but when the action is not brought to rescind the authorities cited have no application. As stated in 39 Cyc. 1997:

> "One who has been induced by fraudulent representations to become the purchaser of property has, upon the discovery of the fraud, three remedies open to him, either of which he may elect: He may rescind the contract absolutely and sue in an action at law to recover the consideration parted with upon the fraudulent contract; he may bring an action in equity to rescind the contract and in that action have full relief; lastly, he may retain what he has received and bring an action at law to recover the damages sustained."

[2] The authorities are also uniform to the effect that under an executory contract a vendee cannot retain both the land and the purchase price, yet that he may pay the full purchase price or offer to do so, retain possession, and accept such title as the seller can give him and rely upon the vendor's personal responsibility to recover whatever damages he may have sustained by reason of the vendor's breach of contract or false representations. These cases are fully considered in the case of Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 42, 11 P. 489; Hickman v. Johnson, 36 Cal. App. 342, 178 P. 145; Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 P. 729. In the principal case, Hines v. Brode, supra, the court considering the remedies available to a plaintiff under such circumstances where a vendee has completely paid the purchase price, states his remedy, as followed in the case at bar:

> "In such a case also the vendee would have his action for damages for the deceit. The alternative to a vendee under such circumstances, and the only other course which he may follow, is that founded upon an affirmance of the contract. Here the vendee is obliged to accept the burden of the contract with its benefits, according to its terms, with the right to a recovery for the fraud based upon the fact that the benefits which he receives are not those which, under the representations of the vendor, he was entitled to receive. This last presents the usual situation in actions of this nature under executed contracts."

[3] An action for damages is based upon an affirmance of the contract and it is not necessary that the vendee in order to maintain such an action should rescind the contract, restore the possession, or return anything which he may have received under the contract. His remedy, as we have stated, where the purchase price has been paid and the vendee has complied with all the terms of the contract, if he so elects, is to bring an action such as is presented here for damages on account of the deceit. In 39 Cyc. 2088, the law is thus stated:

> "An action for damages is based upon and in affirmance of the contract, and it is not necessary that the purchaser, in order to maintain such action, should rescind the contract, restore possession of the premises, return anything that he may have received under the contract, or otherwise place the vendor in statu quo or offer to do so; although the fact that the vendor has not been placed in statu quo may affect the measure of damages."

See, also, 27 R. C. L. 631; Shaw v. Wilkins, 8 Humph. (Tenn.) 647, 49 Am. Dec. 692; Guinn v. Ames, 36 Tex. Civ. App. 613, 83 S. W. 232. Other cases might be cited, but as the rule stated in Cyc. appears to be unquestioned, we deem it unnecessary to cite further authorities. The testimony in this case clearly shows that the defendant did not have title to the particular premises upon which the plaintiff placed the improvements referred to. And also that the defendant knowingly misrepresented to the plaintiff that he had title thereto and the findings of the court that the defendant knowingly and intentionally deceived the plaintiff for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to purchase the premises is sufficiently sustained by the testimony set forth in the record. The appeal herein is apparently based upon a misconception of the law that the rule as to the restoration or offer to restore the premises, where the action is simply for damages on account of the deceit, is the same as in an action for rescission.

It follows that nothing of merit upon this appeal is presented for our consideration.

The judgment of the trial court is therefore affirmed.

3. Brokers ⟹57(2)—Broker, failing to procure exchange according to terms agreed on, held not entitled to commission, where owner effected deal on less favorable terms with party introduced by broker.

Broker, failing to procure exchange of property on terms specified in agreement employing him, held not entitled to commission when owner accepted from party introduced by broker terms less favorable than those which broker had agreed to procure.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by G. S. Backman against the Guadalupe Realty Company for money due on a contract of employment as real estate broker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Esmond Schapiro, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment for plaintiff for $5,000 and interest, upon a written contract of employment as a real estate broker. There are three brokers equally interested in the recovery, Hooper, Wilson, and Schapiro & Co. The plaintiff is an assignee for the purpose of bringing the action. Although Hooper is the person who negotiated the contract and whose name appears alone therein, it was understood at the time by both parties thereto that the other two brokers, Wilson and Schapiro & Co., were equally interested with Hooper.

The transaction out of which the controversy grew was an exchange of real property. The defendants owned an apartment house in San Francisco; the other party to the proposed exchange, O'Rourke, a farm in Colusa county. O'Rourke had been introduced to the city property by the broker Wilson on November 8, 1922. Wilson offered this property to O'Rourke, with incumbrances totaling $75,000, for his ranch, free and clear of incumbrances. The following day O'Rourke called at the office of Schapiro & Co., another real estate broker with whom this apartment house had also been listed for sale. This firm also showed O'Rourke the apartment house, and succeeded in getting him to sign an offer, open for ten days, by which he was to exchange his ranch for the apartment house, subject to an incumbrance of $50,000. This offer was promptly rejected by the defendant.

It so happened that O'Rourke had an intimate friend in San Francisco, Abe Cohen, who was under contract with the defendant to lease its said apartment house. O'Rourke met his friend Cohen, and told him about the apartment house, and Cohen took him to the office of the defendant on the evening of November 9th, and introduced him to the vice president of the defendant company, Mrs. Bories. Before this meeting, however, the defendant had been informed by Wilson of O'Rourke's interest in the apartment house, and had rejected his offer therefor made through Schapiro & Co., so it was not unprepared for his reception. However, after this conference, O'Rourke returned to his home in Colusa without anything having been accomplished in the transaction. Schapiro & Co. did not know who was the owner of the apartment house when they offered it to Mr. O'Rourke. It had recently been sold through Edward J. Hooper, and they went to him for information. He drew up a contract by which he was to act as agent in the transaction and receive a commission of $3,000, which contract was signed by the defendant.

By a supplemental agreement among the three brokers, they agreed to share the commission "irrespective of who closes the deal," but that agreement does not concern us here, because there is no dispute about it or its effect. The agreement for the payment of a commission, which is the contract upon which recovery was had, is the all-important consideration in this case, and we set it forth in full:

"Exchange Agreement.

"This agreement witnesseth: That the undersigned ———, owner of the following firstly described property situate, lying and being in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit:

"Lot and improvements situate on the westerly line of Leavenworth street 54.6 feet south of Ellis street, south 83 feet by uniform depth of 56.6 feet to a rear street, and known as No 345 Leavenworth street, subject to a first bank mortgage of $50,000 bearing interest at the rate of 6% per annum and deed of trust for $25,000, for a period of five (5) years, with interest at the rate of 8% per annum, payable in monthly installments of not less than $250 per month; and subject, also to a lease for ten (10) years at a monthly rental of $1,000, also assignment of rents, which we agree to exchange for the following secondly described property owned by ———, situate in county of Colusa, state of California, and bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit: [Here follows a description of the Colusa property.]

"Terms: We hereby agree to exchange the above-described property No. 345 Leavenworth street, San Francisco, Cal., subject to the above-mentioned incumbrances, for the above-described Colusa county property, free and clear of all incumbrances except levies and obligations incurred in the irrigation district in which the 160 acres are included. And the undersigned hereby authorize Edward J. Hooper to act as our agent in negotiating an exchange, and agree that, if he shall secure an acceptance of the above proposition to exchange the above-described property on the above terms, we will within 15 days furnish title insurance or abstract of title certified to date and a grant, bargain and sale deed conveying title to the property first above described; and will allow 15 days for the furnishing of title insurance or abstract of title certified to date and a grant, bargain and sale deed conveying title to the above secondly described property.

"And it is further agreed with the said agent that when he has secured an acceptance in writing of the above proposition that we will then pay to said agent at his office in San Francisco, the sum of three thousand dollars ($3,000) on demand for services rendered; and it is understood that said agent may also act as agent for the owner of the above secondly described property, from whom he may also receive a commission."

The foregoing is followed by provisions which do not concern us upon appeal. The portion of the contract relating to the payment of commissions was modified on the same date by the following agreement:

> "In relation to the proposed exchange of the O'Rourke property situate in the county of Colusa, California, and the Guadalupe Realty Company's property No. 345 Leavenworth street, San Francisco, Cal., we hereby agree to pay to Edward J. Hooper the sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars on demand, for services rendered, in the event that the O'Rourkes do not pay him a commission in this proposed exchange. The Guadalupe Realty Company is to receive credit for any commission obtained from the O'Rourke end of the transaction.
> "The foregoing is subject to the exchange being consummated."

Both of these instruments were signed by the vice president of the Guadalupe Realty Company on its behalf.

A representative of Schapiro & Co. went to Colusa to try to interest Mr. O'Rourke further in the transaction, but without success.

[1] At this point in the narrative there is a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not the brokers abandoned the contract of employment. We should be inclined to say that they did were we trying the facts, but, since there is some evidence which creates a conflict upon that issue, and the trial court has found against the defendant, we must accept that finding, and assume that the brokers were still intent upon fulfilling their contract.

Nothing happened, however, to offer the brokers any encouragement for about a week, when O'Rourke again consulted with his friend Cohen about the matter. Cohen then reopened negotiations with the defendant, directly, upon a different basis. On November 19, 1921, the defendant agreed with Cohen that it would make the exchange of the properties, the ranch to be free and clear of incumbrances, and the apartment house subject to a first mortgage of $50,000, and a second deed of trust for $15,000, and Mr. O'Rourke to pay $2,500 cash upon the completion of the transaction, and $1,000 at the signing of the agreement. The exchange was finally consummated, after negotiations between the principals, by O'Rourke giving his ranch, free of incumbrances, and a diamond ring valued at $1,000, and receiving the apartment house subject to $66,000 in incumbrances, but free from the burden of a lease which it was to carry under the defendant's original offer, under which lease defendant would have received a bonus of $7,500; also linoleums, stair carpets, etc.

[2, 3] It thus appears that by the transaction as finally consummated the defendant received several thousand dollars less than the amount called for under the commission contract.

The question is presented: Under the peculiar terms of the contract in this case for the payment of a commission (under which the plaintiff must recover, if at all), when the principal negotiated and concluded an exchange upon substantially different and less favorable terms than those stated therein, may the plaintiff recover because of the fact that, he, originally, brought the parties together? We think that to answer that question in the affirmative would be to conclude that contracts of this type were not governed by the fundamental rules of contract law. Here we have an express contract, obligating the defendant upon certain terms and conditions, specifying them with certainty, and reiterating that the commission is to be paid if the broker shall secure an acceptance of the above proposition to exchange the property on the above terms. The general rule is that an agent performs his part of such a contract when he produces a purchaser able, ready, and willing to buy upon the terms specified by the owner. Upon a general contract of employment, certainly, the owner may make concessions to a purchaser without loss of the commission to the broker, but there is a distinction, in fact recognized by the authorities, between a general and special contract of employment in a matter of this kind. It appears that, where the broker has undertaken a special task by his contract of employment, and fails to perform it, the fact of having first introduced the buyer and seller will not entitle him to recover. The case of Naylor v. Ashton, 20 Cal. App. 544, 130 P. 181, is directly in point. It is therein stated:

> "In denying the petition for a rehearing we deem it proper to again call attention to the fact that the only employment of the broker evidenced by the writing relied on was to procure an acceptance of the specific offer made by defendant, which the broker never succeeded in doing, either within the ten days allowed for such acceptance or at all. The broker was not employed generally to effect a sale or exchange of defendant's property, but only to procure an acceptance by Mrs. Thompson of the offer to exchange and sell contained in the writing signed by defendant."

The case of Holland v. Flash, 20 Cal. App. 686, 130 P. 32, involves a legal question similar to the one before us. It was there said:

> "We do not construe this agreement as one generally employing or authorizing plaintiff's assignors to act as agents to negotiate or sell this property, or to do any act or thing connected with its negotiation or sale, other than to procure if possible the Atwood exchange upon the terms specified. Failing in that regard, the contract by its terms was at an end, and did not cover or purport to cover any agreement with reference to subsequent deals, sales, or exchanges."

The case of Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 P. 254, also contains the following pertinent language:

> "Here, however, the defendant's agreement was not simply to pay a commission to the brokers upon their making a sale or exchange of the property. Her agreement was to pay one thousand eight hundred and fifty dollars for their services in securing the particular agreement which was secured. * * * She agreed to pay a commission for securing a specific agreement. Such agreement having been secured, she was liable under the precise terms of her contract."

Our conclusion upon this important phase of the case makes it unnecessary to consider the other objections raised by the appellant, as the matter we have discussed herein is conclusive against the plaintiff's right of recovery under the facts of this case.

The judgment is reversed.

COUSIN v. MASON et ux. (Civ. 3042.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 21, 1926.)

1. Work and labor 🔑24(1)—Evidence that services were rendered as cook was immaterial variance in action for value of services as keeper under denial of liability for any kind of services (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470, 471).

Evidence, in action for value of services as keeper of resort, that services were rendered as cook, was not material variance, where defendants denied plaintiff was entitled to compensation for any kind of services, since, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470, 471, a variance is immaterial unless adverse party has been misled.

2. Work and labor 🔑28(1).

Evidence, in action for reasonable value of services rendered as keeper of resort, held sufficient to sustain judgment for plaintiff.

3. Pleading 🔑430(2)—Objection to variance between pleading and proof can only be raised by objection to testimony or by motion for a nonsuit.

Advantage of variance betwen allegations of complaint and proof tendered can be taken only by objection to admission of testimony or by motion for a nonsuit.

4. Appeal and error 🔑197(1)—Variance between pleading and proof not taken advantage of in trial court is deemed waived on appeal.

Variance between pleading and proof cannot be raised for first time on appeal, since unless advantage is taken of it in trial court it is deemed waived.

5. Work and labor 🔑27(3)—Evidence of agreement to pay stipulated sum for services held admissible in action to recover reasonable value thereof.

In action for reasonable value of services rendered as keepr of resort, evidence of agreement to pay stipulated sum held admissible to show reasonable value of services rendered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action to recover reasonable value of services by M. Cousin against W. S. Mason and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Benjamin C. Jones, of Lakeport, for appellants.

H. E. Witherspoon, of Upper Lake, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment for the sum of $475 upon a complaint, the charging part of which is in the following words:

> "That plaintiff rendered services to defendants at their request as keeper and manager of the property commonly known as the 'Brown Mansion,' located in the county of Lake, state of California, from November 1, 1923, to June 13, 1924.
> "That said services were reasonably worth $525."

From this judgment the defendants appeal.

The answer of the defendants denied the allegations of the complaint and alleged that during a portion of the year 1923, the plaintiff was employed as a cook at a salary or wage of $150 per month and that all of said salary or wages had been paid. The grounds relied on upon this appeal are that there is no evidence to support the finding that the plaintiff rendered services as alleged in the complaint, and also that there is a fatal variance between the allegations of the complaint and the testimony introduced at the trial. The testimony of the plaintiff was to the effect that he was for a short period of time during the summer season employed as a cook for a salary of $150 per month; that at the close of the summer season he had a talk with the defendants, in which it was agreed that the plaintiff was to remain upon the premises and care for the place. The plaintiff's testimony in this particular is as follows:

> "You remember this is the year 1923 that you spoke of, so as to keep the years straight. As I understand your statement you remained and worked for Mr. and Mrs. Mason during the months of September, October, November, December, of 1923, and January, February, March, April, May, up until June 14, 1924? A. Yes, sir. * * * During the months of July and August I get $150 a month.
> "The Court: After that how much did you get? A. After that I talk to Mrs. Mason, I say, 'I go,' she said 'No, Granpa, you stay here,' I say: 'Mrs. Mason, if you want me to stay you have to pay me. I agree to stay with you for $75 a month, if you want me to, and anything outside I charge you $5 a month more.' She said, 'We like to have a good man like you to care for the house, we have to go to Denver, maybe we have to go Monday, we have to have somebody watch the house,' and I agreed to stay there.

"The Court: For how much? A. $75 a month and $5 to do any kind of work outside."

It further appears from the testimony that the plaintiff had received in payment for the alleged services the sum of $50. The testimony of the defendants was to the effect that the plaintiff was simply allowed to remain at the premises during the period of time in question without any compensation; it being the time when there was little or no business conducted at the summer resort.

The court found that the services were worth the sum mentioned and awarded judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The testimony of the defendants is further to the effect that whatever services the plaintiff rendered were as a cook and not as a keeper of the Brown Mansion and hence a fatal variance between the allegations and the proof.

[1-5] Our attention is called to sections 469, 470, and 471, Code of Civil Procedure, and it is argued that the variance in this case is material; that no application was made to amend the pleadings, and therefore that no judgment based upon the findings can be sustained. Under section 469, Code of Civil Procedure, no variance between the allegations and the proof can be deemed material unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice. It does not appear from the record that the defendants in this case have been misled. Their defense was that the plaintiff remained upon the premises simply by their permission without any agreement as to compensation for any services of any kind whatsoever to be rendered by him. Whether such services were rendered as keeper or as cook would make no difference to the defense set up by the appellants, because they were insisting that the plaintiff was not entitled to compensation for any kind of services, whether he acted as cook or as keeper of the place. If believed by the trial court, there is sufficient testimony in the record to entitle the plaintiff to the judgment awarded him. We do not need to consider the question of whether there was or was not a variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof tendered by the plaintiff to support the same for the simple reason that the objection urged by the appellant upon appeal was not called to the attention of the trial court, either by an objection to the admission of testimony or a motion for a nonsuit on the ground of variance. It is well settled that if a defendant desires to take advantage of a variance, it must be done either by objecting to the admission of the testimony or by motion for a nonsuit, and when such action has not been taken in the trial court, the objection is deemed waived and cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. In Cushing v. Pires, 124 Cal. 663, 57 P. 572, the court held as follows (we quote from the syllabus):

> "Where the findings and judgment are supported by the evidence, and it appears that the case was decided correctly upon the merits, objections to a defective complaint, and to a variance between the complaint and the proof, not urged in the court below, and which might have been obviated by an amendment of the complaint, are waived, and cannot be urged upon appeal for the first time."

See, also, Mercantile Trust Co. v. Doe, 26 Cal. App. 246, 146 P. 692, wherein the court announced this same rule. In Elmore v. Elmore, 114 Cal. 516, 46 P. 458, the manner in which advantage may be taken of a variance between the pleading and the proof is set forth as we have stated herein, to wit, either by an objection to the admission of the testimony or by motion for a nonsuit. In 21 Cal. Jur. 276, the text-writer states the rule in the following language:

> "As a general rule, a variance between pleadings and proofs which might have been obviated by amendment is deemed waived, unless properly objected to at the trial."

And in note No. 7, appended thereto, a long list of cases is cited supporting the rule. While the plaintiff counted upon the reasonable value of the services rendered, the proof tendered by him was to the effect that the price was agreed upon, to wit, $75 per month; but proof of such contract is admissible for the purpose of showing the reasonable value of the services rendered. Naylor v. Adams, 15 Cal. App. 548, 115 P. 335; San Joaquin Light & Power Co. v. Barlow, 43 Cal. App. 241, 184 P. 899; Umphray v. Hufschmidt (Cal. App.) 238 P. 749. The case of Gillin v. Hopkins, 28 Cal. App. 579, 153 P. 724, relied upon by the appellant touching the question of variance, is not in point here. In the Gillin Case the services were to be paid for in shares of stock. The judgment was simply for so much money. The court in that case very properly held that there was a failure of proof and that on the merits of the controversy the plaintiff was not entitled to the judgment rendered. The question in the case at bar is not so much the question of services rendered or to be rendered, but whether the plaintiff was under the agreement entitled to any compensation. In the case of Elmore v. Elmore, 114 Cal. 516, 46 P. 458, the question before the court was whether the defendant was chargeable as a trustee in the handling or acquisition of certain property, and the judgment went off on a question of personal liability, separate and distinct from any trustee relationship. The cases cited by the appellant are not in our opinion parallel with the issues presented in the case at bar and have no bearing thereon.

This disposes of all questions raised on this appeal, and the appeal being, as we think, without merit, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action by Milton K. Young and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Young & Young, against Charles O. Bruere, Sr., and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William K. Young, E. H. Mitchell, and L. R. Brigham, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the defendants from a judgment against them for $1,000, in an action to recover for legal services alleged to have been rendered at the special instance and request of the defendants. This theory was abandoned later, and it is contended by respondents upon appeal that the conduct of appellants, as disclosed by the record, shows their employment of plaintiffs and their implied agreement to pay for services rendered.

[1] The appellants, on the other hand, contend that there is no warrant in the evidence for the finding of the court that they agreed to pay plaintiffs the reasonable value of their services upon demand. This controversy about the facts presents the only problem upon appeal. The evidence, stated most strongly for the respondents, is about as follows: In the year 1922, the plaintiff was the legal representative of John C. Alstrom in his official capacity as administrator of the estate of his deceased son, John Bruere Alstrom. This estate was being probated in Los Angeles county, and was entitled to one-half the assets of the estate of Julia Bruere, deceased, then in process of administration. The defendants in the present action, Charles O. Bruere and Charles O. Bruere, Jr., were also entitled to participate in the distribution of the property of the said estate of Julia Bruere, deceased.

In August, 1922, certain real property belonging to the estate of Julia Bruere, deceased, was sold to Mrs. M. K. Bennett for the sum of $27,500. In the fall of 1922, plaintiff instituted proceedings upon behalf of John C. Alstrom, administrator of the estate of John Bruere Alstrom, deceased, to have the said sale of the property of the Julia Bruere estate set aside upon the ground that the consideration was inadequate. This motion was denied by the superior court and the sale confirmed. While this matter was pending, defendant Charles O. Bruere, Sr., was in communication with plaintiff and interested in the proceedings which affected his interest as well as those of Alstrom.

After the denial of this motion, the Title Insurance Company communicated with plaintiff and stated that it would not pass the title to the property sold to Mrs. Bennett because more than a year had elapsed between the time of sale and the filing of an inventory in the estate. Mr. Young then had a telephone conversation with defendant Bruere, Sr., in which he told him of the report of the title company and also told him that he (Mr. Young) was going to make a motion to set aside the confirmation of the sale. Mr. Young then prepared the necessary papers for his motion, and it was made in the name of John C. Alstrom, administrator of the estate of John Bruere Alstrom, deceased.

On or about January 18, 1923, when this second motion was to be heard in the superior court, Mr. Bruere appeared there, where he met Mr. Young. The motion was continued for one day, and on the following day Mr. Young met defendants down town, and they went with him to the superior court. On the way, the motion was discussed by Mr. Young, who stated that it would be advisable to have another bid made for the property in excess of the amount for which it had previously been sold, and also stated that he had induced a friend of his to make a written bid of $31,500. Mr. Young secured a certified check for $3,150 to be offered to the court in the event this bid was accepted. Upon the hearing the matter was taken under submission, and later the confirmation of the sale was set aside.

After the hearing of this motion, Mr. Young left the courtroom with Mr. Alstrom and defendants, and they had a conversation relative to the certified check for $3,150. Mr. Young stated that, since this bid had not been accepted he would return the check to the bidder, Mr. Bush, and that, since Mr. Bush had furnished the $3,150 necessary to make the bid, he was entitled to some remuneration. One of the persons present suggested that it would be proper to give Mr. Bush $50. Defendant Bruere Sr., told Mr. Alstrom to give Mr. Young $50, and he would return him $25 of this amount when he got the money, thus accepting and recognizing his responsibility in the matter. Mr. Alstrom accordingly gave Mr. Young $50 with which to compensate Mr. Bush. Subsequent to this time Mr. Young saw the defendants "off and on." Mrs. Bennett, the purchaser of the property from the estate of Julia Bruere, deceased, perfected an appeal from the order setting aside the confirmation of the sale. With relation to this appeal Mr. Young had a talk with Mr. Bruere and Mr. Alstrom in his office. There was a discussion about the cost of preparing briefs on appeal, etc. Mr. Bruere then stated that he would not stand in the way of an appeal, but that he did not wish to pay for an appeal to the Supreme Court. Mr. Young advised him to contest the appeal, and gave his opinion that the judgment of the lower court would be affirmed. One of the persons present asked what Mr. Young's fee would be, and in reply to this question Mr. Young stated that his father would have to fix the fee, and, as he was not in town, Mr. Young, Jr., was not prepared to state the fee.

After this conversation plaintiff had several conferences with the attorney for Mrs. Bennett, the purchaser, with reference to a compromise of the controversy and the dismissal of her appeal from the order setting aside the confirmation of the sale. In connection with this compromise, Mr. Alstrom and Mr. Bruere came to Mr. Young's office on March 28, 1923. He told them of his conferences with reference to a settlement and that Mrs. Bennett would accept $2,000 for a quitclaim deed and release of all her interest in the property and dismiss her appeal, and he advised the persons interested in the estate of Julia Bruere to pay this amount to Mrs. Bennett and reimburse themselves from the increased price they would get from the property. "Mr. Bruere thought the idea was all right. I told him to go and get the money. * * * The next morning he came into the office and said they wanted to go through with it, and Mr. Bruere, Jr., and Mr. Bruere, Sr., and Mr. Alstrom came into my office the next morning, March 29, 1923. I told them to go over to the executor of the estate of Julia Bruere * * * and get the necessary documents from the estate that they were heirs to and bring it back to the office and I would put the deal through. They left the office and came back in half an hour, and Mr. Alstrom had a check for $750 and Mr. Bruere, Jr., had a check for $375, and Mr. Bruere, Sr., for $375, which was—they explained that they did not have the additional $500 to make up the necessary $2,000 to put over the compromise, that there wasn't enough cash in the estate, and they endorsed the checks over to me and told me to put it in my account and make the deal, and I said, 'What about the extra $500?' And Mr. Alstrom said, 'I will put up the extra $500, and the Brueres can give me their note or pay me back for their share.' Mr. Alstrom put up his check for $500, which made the sum of $2,000, and I prepared a note for the sum of $275, which was $250, being one-half of the advancement of $500 by Alstrom made on their behalf and $25 in addition, being one-half of the amount Mr. Alstrom paid me for Mr. Bush for putting up that money to make that bid down there, his proportion of the $50 we paid Mr. Bush. So I made out the note for $275, and Mr. Bruere signed it, and they told me to sign the contract for settlement and put the deal over. I said, 'All right.'"

Mr. Young then prepared the agreement of compromise. With relation to it, Mr. Young stated that he was told to prepare this agreement in the presence of the two defendants and Mr. Alstrom, and that one of the three instructed him to prepare the instrument, and the others "acquiesced in it." The instrument was signed by the defendants and Mr. Alstrom.

[2] There is no question about the liability of Mr. Alstrom for legal services rendered on his behalf, and he paid defendants $2,000 therefor, and judgment was accordingly entered in his favor. We are not concerned with his liability upon this appeal. The question presented is as to the liability of defendants Bruere. As against them, the foregoing is the substance of the evidence in favor of plaintiffs' case. We think that such evidence supports the finding of the trial court with reference to defendants' liability. Where legal services are actually performed with the knowledge and consent of the other party and not as a gratuity, a promise will be implied to pay for the benefits actually received. 2 R. C. L. 1046, 1048.

> "The absence of an express promise on a client's part to pay will not, however, prejudice recovery, if the employment is fairly made out from all the attendant circumstances. Acts of recognition or acceptance are in general equivalent to a prior engagement. Thus acquiescence by a client in his attorney's conduct may supply the place of a request to act, provided the case was such that the client might reasonably know that he would be expected to pay for the service." 6 Cal. Jur. 730, 731.

Where one performs for another, with the other's knowledge, a useful service of a character usually charged for, and the latter expresses no dissent, or avails himself of the service, a promise to pay the reasonable value of the services is implied. 6 Cal. Jur. 23; Semi-Tropic, etc., Ass'n v. Johnson, 163 Cal. 639, 642, 126 P. 488; Pixley v. W. P. R. Co., 33 Cal. 183, 91 Am. Dec. 623.

In the several cases relied upon by appellants in support of their position the facts are distinguishable from those in the instant case. In the case of Chicago, etc., Railroad Co.

v. Larned, 26 Ill. 218, the parties sought to be charged had "sat quietly by" and allowed the attorney to conduct a case in which they were jointly interested. In the instant case the defendants took an active part in the conferences and the court proceedings and furnished money to pay Mr. Bush for making a higher bid for the property. They were jointly interested with Mr. Alstrom, and they consulted with the attorney about the matter in its various stages. When Mrs. Bennett appealed from the order setting aside the sale, defendants did not wish to pay legal fees to defend this order upon appeal, but they expressly agreed to negotiate for a compromise, and led the attorney to believe that his negotiations to that end were on their behalf. They confirmed this impression by furnishing money for the compromise and signing the agreement evidencing it.

As said in the case of Davis v. Trimble et al., 76 Ark. 115, 88 S. W. 920, relied upon by appellants, "Each case must stand upon its own peculiar facts."

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William C. Doran, Judge.

Action by the Peerless Insurance & Brokerage Company against the Dwyer Equipment Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. Frank Courtney, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. H. Harris, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This is an appeal by defendant Dwyer Equipment Company from a judgment rendered against it in an action in claim and delivery.

The basic facts appear to be that, on a conditional sales contract, the plaintiff sold an automobile to one Porter, who left it with one Blake to be painted. The paint job having been completed and no payment having been made therefor, under the then provisions of the law (sections 3051 and 3052 of the Civil Code) Blake proceeded to enforce the lien which he claimed, and thereunder sold the automobile to the defendant Dwyer Equipment Company. The plaintiff company offered reimbursement, which was declined, following which this action was commenced, and which resulted in a judgment for plaintiff as against Dwyer Equipment Company.

Appellant specifies as error that the findings and judgment of the trial court were not supported by the evidence, and that such findings and judgment are contrary to law.

The findings which are attacked are as follows:

> "That plaintiff now is, and at all times in plaintiff's complaint mentioned has been, entitled to the possession of that certain personal property, more particularly described as follows: [Describing the automobile.]
> "That it is not true that the defendant Dwyer Equipment Company was ever the owner of the said property or entitled to the possession thereof. * * *"

[1] Attention is especially directed by appellant to that part of such findings which is to the effect that at all times mentioned in the complaint plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the automobile, and that it is not true that the defendant Dwyer Equipment Company was ever the owner of the said property or entitled to the possession thereof.

Section 3052 of the Civil Code, under which the sale of the automobile was authorized for the nonpayment of the paint job, provides in part that:

> "If the person entitled to the lien * * * be not paid the amount due and for which said lien is given, within twenty days after the same shall have become due, then such lienholder may proceed to sell said property. * * *"

In the case of Trumpler v. Bemerly, 39 Cal. 490, it appears that certain estray animals were sold under the provisions of the statute. Stats. 1863, p. 697. Notice of the sale was given for 19 days instead of 20 days, as by the statute was provided. It was held that the proceedings were void and conferred no title upon the purchaser at the sale. The court said in part:

"This statute, as all others prescribing modes by which a party may be divested of his property without his consent, must be strictly construed; and a party claiming to have acquired a right and title to property by virtue of its provisions as against the original owner, must affirmatively allege and prove that the mode prescribed by the statute for the acquisition of such title has, in every particular, been strictly followed (citing authorities)."

In the case of Chase v. Putnam, 117 Cal. 364, 49 P. 204, for the reason that proper notice of a sale was not given, it was held (syllabus) that:

"A sale by the constable of animals taken damage feasant upon the land of the distrainor, without giving the ten days' notice of the sale required by the statute, is void, and the distrainor purchasing at such a sale cannot still retain possession by virtue of his lien. By such a sale, the lien must be deemed to have been waived or lost."

See, also, Bensley v. Mountain Lake Water Co., 13 Cal. 306, 73 Am. Dec. 575; Curran v. Shattuck, 24 Cal. 432; McCarty v. Southern Pacific Co., 148 Cal. 211, 216, 82 P. 615.

On the trial of the action at bar, evidence was introduced, which it must be assumed was accepted by the court as true, to the effect that the paint job had not been completed for the statutory period of 20 days at the time proceedings were commenced by Blake to satisfy his lien. Such being the case, the proceedings for foreclosing the lien were premature, from which it would result that the sale under the foreclosure proceedings was a nullity and had no effect upon plaintiff's right to possession of the automobile, nor vested any title thereto in the purchaser at such sale.

[2, 3] Appellant suggests that the purported findings by the court to which reference has been had, to the effect that plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the automobile, and that the Dwyer Equipment Company was never the owner nor entitled to the possession thereof, do not constitute findings of fact, but are conclusions of law only, and upon which no judgment can be based. Goodman v. Anglo-California Trust Co., 62 Cal. App. 702, 217 P. 1078.

The authorities in this state, if not unanimous, are very generally to the effect that, in an action in claim and delivery, allegations of ownership or possession are averments of ultimate facts, and that findings of fact which follow the pleadings in the statement of ultimate facts are sufficient.

In the case of Fredericks v. Tracy, 98 Cal. 658, 660, 33 P. 750, 751, it is said:

"To sustain this action [claim and delivery] plaintiff must have the right to immediate and exclusive possession at the time of the commencement of his suit. It is a cardinal principle in pleading that ultimate and not probative facts are to be pleaded. The ultimate fact in such an action is, that plaintiff was at the time the action was commenced the owner of, or had some special property in the chattel, coupled with a right to the immediate possession thereof."

In Summerville v. Stockton Milling Co., 142 Cal. 529, 547, 76 P. 243, 250, the court says:

"The action of claim and delivery is primarily an action for possession. The general allegations of ownership or right of possession of the defendant are sufficient, and this form of statement is the better form of pleading"—citing authorities.

See, also, Nudd v. Thompson, 34 Cal. 46; Conner v. Bludworth, 54 Cal. 635; Harris v. Smith, 132 Cal. 316, 64 P. 409; Beggs v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 532, 147 P. 585; Consolidated Music Co. v. Morrison, 30 Cal. App. 303, 158 P. 342.

The syllabus, which is supported by the text of the opinion (in which authorities are cited), in the case of McCarthy v. Brown. 113 Cal. 15, 45 P. 14, is that:

"Findings should state the ultimate facts pleaded, and not probative facts, and findings which follow the pleadings in the statement of ultimate facts are sufficient."

Additional reasons are suggested by the respondent why the judgment should be affirmed, but, if a correct conclusion has been reached with reference to the question discussed herein, a further consideration of the appeal becomes unnecessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BARBERA. (Cr. 1312.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 3, 1926.)

1. Courts ⚿50—That prosecution for violating Juvenile Court Act should have been heard in another department of superior court was mere irregularity, not available on appeal (Juvenile Court Law, §§ 16, 21 [St. 1915, pp. 1238, 1246]; Const. art. 6, § 6).

In prosecution under Juvenile Court Law, § 21, that another department of the superior court had been designated under section 16 to hear cases coming under act held mere irregularity, not available on appeal, in view of jurisdiction conferred on superior court by Const. art. 6, § 6.

5. Criminal law 🔑695(1)—Testimony on preliminary hearing properly excluded, though no sufficient objection made, when no showing made that witness was deceased or out of jurisdiction (Code Civ. Proc. § 1870).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, defendant offering testimony given at preliminary examination must show to satisfaction of trial court that witness is either deceased or out of jurisdiction, and where he did not do so, evidence was properly excluded, though prosecution made no sufficient objection.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Peter Barbera was convicted of violating Juvenile Court Law, § 21, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph J. McShane and David K. Watkins, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, of San Francisco, for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. Defendant appeals from a judgment entered upon a verdict of a jury finding him guilty of a misdemeanor, to wit, a violation of section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225), and also from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1-3] The first point argued upon the appeal is that the trial court was without jurisdiction. This objection was not made at the trial, and is presented for the first time upon appeal. It is based upon the following facts: The trial was had in department 11 of the superior court, state of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and it is contended that this department and the judge presiding therein are not those designated by the judges of the superior court to hear cases coming under the Juvenile Court Law, in accordance with the provisions of section 16 of said law. Said section 16 provides: "The superior court * * * shall exercise the jurisdiction conferred by this act." As a matter of convenience in procedure, it is also provided that the judges of the superior court, in counties or cities and counties having more than one judge, shall designate, annually, one or more of their number, whose duty it shall be to hear all cases coming under said act.

If it be true that this cause should more properly have been heard in another department of the superior court, the record discloses, at most, an irregularity. Graziani v. Denny, 174 Cal. 176, 179, 162 P. 397; Nickel v. State, 179 Cal. 126, 129, 175 P. 641. Whether sitting separately or together, the judges of the superior court hold but one and the same court, and the jurisdiction they exercise in any cause is that of the court and not the individual, under article 6, § 6, of the Constitution. Graziani v. Denny, supra. Where the jurisdiction of a particular court is defined by the Constitution the Legislature cannot by statute restrict or enlarge that jurisdiction. Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 P. 35; People v. McKamy, 168 Cal. 531, 143 P. 752. Therefore the Juvenile Court Law could not change the effect of the constitutional enactment, even if it sought to do so, which it distinctly does not, for, after providing for the selection of one or more judges to hear cases under the act, it expressly provides "that nothing in this section contained shall be construed to conflict with article 6, § 6, of the Constitution of the state of California."

We conclude that, at most, the record discloses an irregularity in this matter and not a want of jurisdiction, and that as to such matter the defendant will not be heard to complain for the first time upon appeal. It was said in Re Wolff, 183 Cal. 602, 192 P. 33:

> "Even if there were irregularities or defects in the proceedings under the Juvenile Court Law, the defendant, if he wished to take advantage thereof, or to object to the jurisdiction of the superior court after the information against him is filed, could do so only by presenting his objections in the superior court, and he cannot raise the objections by a proceeding in habeas corpus after conviction."

[4, 5] Error is assigned in the refusal of the trial judge to permit the attorney for defendant to read into the record the testimony of two men given at the preliminary examination. With relation to that matter, the record is largely made up of broken and unintelligible sentences, but it does appear that counsel for defendant stated to the court: "There are two witnesses that testified at the—." Thereupon the district attorney interrupted to ask that the jury be excused if counsel was "going to make some statements as to what transpired at a certain time or what—." Thereupon counsel for defendant stated that he was not going to testify, but was asking permission to read the testimony of two witnesses who testified in the lower court, saying further: "These witnesses were present, and they were sworn and testified. They are not available now by reason of the fact—." Thereupon the district attorney interrupted, saying: "Just a moment. I am going to object to counsel's statement." The following is an account of the subsequent proceedings:

> "The Court: Counsel knows what foundation he must lay for the reading of a witness' testimony.
> "Mr. McShane: I have been unable to subpœna these witnesses by reason of the fact that—
> "The Court: And you can't lay the foundation to show that they came under the exception and that their testimony can be read; is that the point?
> "Mr. McShane: I am endeavoring to show this, your honor: That they lived at this place and are not there now, and that this event was over a year ago and these men are seafaring men, as they have sworn to be and testified—
> "The Court: Just a minute.
> "Mr. McShane:—as such, and I cannot locate them. Now they have testified at length and were examined by the district attorney at that time, and for that reason, not being able to locate them, I am unable to subpœna them.
> 'The Court: Is this your full showing for the purpose of reading that?
> "Mr. McShane: Yes, your honor.
> "The Court: Well; of course counsel knows it is not an adequate showing, and the motion will be denied."

It is argued that the people made no sufficient objection to the admission of this testimony. This argument is "beside the mark." The defendant desired to introduce a kind of evidence which could have been received only after the foundation for the same had been laid by a showing that the parties who had originally given the testimony were deceased or out of the jurisdiction. Section 1870, Code Civ. Proc. It was incumbent upon him to make a showing satisfactory to the trial court that either of these preliminary conditions existed before offering the evidence. This he did not do, and the trial court properly denied him the right to read into the record the testimony upon the former hearing.

[6] Objection is made to an instruction of the court to the effect that it is not essential to a conviction of the defendant that the testimony of the minor should have been corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses. Appellant contends that this instruction is a violation of section 1108, Penal Code. That section does not relate to the offense with which the defendant was charged. The Penal Code deals with the offense of "inveigling, enticing, or taking away an unmarried female of previous chaste character, under the age of eighteen years, for the purpose of prostitution, or aiding or assisting therein." Section 21 of the Juvenile Court Law deals with a person who commits an act or omits the performance of a duty, which act or omission causes or tends to cause or encourage any person under the age of 21 years to come within the provisions of section 1 of said law, which designates the type of minors who are amenable to said law. Clearly, the offenses are not the same. In the particular instance we are considering, since the act or omission of defendant caused or tended to cause the minor to become a prostitute, that element of the offense was one entering into the offense defined in section 1108, Penal Code. But there the likeness ends. The Juvenile Court Law deals with persons under 21 years of age, and the Penal Code with persons under 18 years of age; the Penal Code deals with unmarried females of previous chaste character, while no such limitation occurs in the Juvenile Court Law.

It seems, clear, therefore, that the provisions of section 1108 of the Penal Code cannot be extended to a prosecution such as we have before us. Apart from this fact, it is pertinent to point out that the judgment does not stand alone upon the testimony of the minor. It is corroborated by the testimony of the police officers that the girl, a child of 15 years of age, was found at the defendant's hotel, which was a lodging house for men, and where she had no legitimate business. The police officers also testified that upon their entry defendant motioned to the girl to get away and that she attempted to obey him, when she was prevented from doing so by the officers, that upon being questioned she stated facts which constituted the offense charged against the defendant, in his presence, and that he made no denial of them.

There are no other matters which require consideration, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by the City of Sacramento against the Central California Traction Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Butler, Van Dyke & Desmond, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Robert L. Shinn, City Atty., and Charles J. Hasman, Deputy City Atty., both of Sacramento, for respondent.

PULLEN, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to recover moneys paid by the city of Sacramento, a municipal corporation, to city employees injured in the course of their employment by the Central California Traction Company. Judgment was rendered in favor of the city for the amount sued for, and an appeal has been taken to this court from the order denying the motion for a new trial and from the judgment.

On and prior to the 12th day of January, 1921, the city of Sacramento was the owner of a certain unit of fire-fighting equipment, consisting of a motor truck, attached to which was a hook and ladder truck; the entire apparatus measuring 62 feet in length and weighing about 14 tons. This apparatus was operated by a crew of seven men, including a driver who had charge of the motor truck, and a tillerman mounted on the hook and ladder trailer who guided the two wheels of the trailer by means of a tiller wheel, but had no control over the speed or route of the tractor.

On the 12th of January, 1921, some time prior to 9 o'clock in the morning, this equipment was taken by its crew for the purpose of getting a supply of gasoline at a service station about four blocks away. After obtaining the gasoline at the filling station the crew took the equipment on a trial trip to adjust the carbureter. After the carbureter had been satisfactorily adjusted they started to return to their fire house by a circuitous route crossing the intersection of Eighth and O streets.

The defendant was operating an interurban car line between Sacramento and Stockton. Its lines, a double track, running north and south along Eighth street, crossed over the street at the intersection of Eighth and O, at which point an interurban car operated by defendant collided with the motor fire equipment above described, injuring two firemen and damaging the fire apparatus.

The injured firemen brought separate actions against the defendant traction company, alleging that their injuries were caused by the negligent operation of the interurban car. Settlements were effected in their suits and they were not brought to trial. The respondent city of Sacramento brought this action against the traction company to recover damages to its fire equipment, and in addition, after setting up the relation of employer and employee, existing between itself and the two injured firemen, alleged that it had paid certain sums for hospital and physicians' services for the injured men and had become obligated to pay certain sums in addition thereto under the obligation cast upon it by law by virtue of that relationship.

In the settlement of the action against it by the injured firemen the traction company did not obtain the consent of the city to the compromise nor the consent of the court in which all of the actions were pending.

The answer of appellant denied that there was any negligence on its part in the operation of its car causing the collision and consequent damage and set up in addition the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the crew of the fire appartus and especially on the part of the driver.

The testimony indicates that the speed of the fire truck upon entering the intersection was about 5 miles an hour and that the interurban car was going at the rate of 15 to 25 miles per hour. It was stipulated that the damage to the fire apparatus was $3,183.58 and for medical, surgical, and hospital treatment for the employees the sum of $629.15, as well as the amount of the average weekly earnings of the injured employees, and also the period of time over which such injury and incapacity for duty would extend. This stipulation was received by the court, subject to the objection of appellant that the facts therein stipulated to were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. From these stipulated facts the court computed the amount that would have been awarded the injured employees under the provisions of the Compensation Act and instructed the jury that if they found for the plaintiff the plaintiff was entitled to recover in addition to the amount of damages for the truck the stipulated amount expended for medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, and also the stipulated amount representing compensation to the injured employees, which amounts the jury found due, and returned a verdict in the sum of these amounts aggregating $7,786.53.

The first point urged by appellant for reversal is based upon the instruction of the court directing the jury that if they found for plaintiff to find in the specific sums referred to above. It is conceded that if the city can maintain this action it is by reason of the provision of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 831) which in section 26, as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 910), provides for what may be called a subrogation suit which may be brought by the employer whenever having become obligated to pay compensation by reason of an injury to an employee within the provisions of the act under such circumstances as to give rise to a liability for the damage resulting.

We are unable to find error in the instruction of the court. The evidence shows that the amounts actually paid by the respondent to the injured employees were in excess of the compensation fixed by the Workmen's Compensation Act. The jury determined from the evidence that appellant was liable and the amount of liability was merely a matter of computation based upon the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act and flowed naturally from the fact of liability. If, as a matter of law, the respondent paid or had become obligated to pay such compensation, the damages sustained by the respondent were necessarily the amounts so paid or incurred by the terms of the act. Citing Moreno v. L. A. Transfer Co., 44 Cal. App. 551, 186 P. 800.

The amount of the wages of the injured employees were stipulated, and the amount actually paid was stipulated, which amount was greater than the obligation imposed by the Workmen's Compensation Act, and this left nothing to be done, but to compute the amount which respondent was entitled to recover under the act in the event the jury should find for plaintiff. Any other finding by the jury would have been unsupported by the evidence.

[1] The second specification of error is that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence testimony concerning the amounts paid by respondent to its injured employees or concerning the extent of disability suffered by the employees or in any wise tending to fix the liability of respondent under the Workmen's Compensation Act. If the respondent had offered evidence as to the disability of the injured employees and the amounts actually paid by it as compensation for such injuries, it could not be claimed to have been either incompetent, irrelevant, or immaterial, and would have been admitted by the court, but in this case to obviate the introduction in evidence of numerous witnesses the existence of the facts were stipulated, subject to the objection stated above. The material question was the extent of the payment and the fact of disability, both of which elements were included in the stipulation.

The law has imposed an obligation upon an employer to pay compensation to its injured employees and has given it a right of subrogation as against a tort-feasor who had negligently injured the employee to the extent of the compensation so paid by the employer.

[2] Appellant further claims that the court erred in admitting evidence of the amounts that the respondent had paid to its employees without proof that it had either paid them or had become obligated to pay them by virtue of the provisions of the Compensation Act.

There is a provision in the charter of the city of Sacramento which provides that a city employee who becomes physically disabled by reason of injuries received while in the performance of his duties should be entitled to receive medical, surgical, and hospital treatment, and full pay during the continuance of his disability, or until retired upon pension.

It appears from the evidence that no application had ever been made by the injured employees for payment of disability indemnity under the Workmen's Compensation Act and that the only sums paid out by the respondent have been payments of salaries, hospital and medical expenses and pensions as provided by the city charter. We deem it immaterial, however, out of what particular fund the payments may have been made or in response to what particular demand the moneys were so paid, for the undisputed fact shows that payments were made, and a formal demand or application would have resulted in nothing further than has already been done.

Appellant also criticises numerous instructions given by the court. We have carefully examined the entire testimony, and the instructions taken as a whole clearly declare the law as applicable to the case.

[3] Appellant claims also that, as a matter of law, the driver of the fire truck was guilty of contributory negligence. From the testimony we learn that the fire truck approached the intersection, sounding its siren, at a rate of speed testified by some to be 25 to 30 miles an hour, by others not exceeding 5 miles an hour, and that the interurban car going south on Eighth street was approaching the intersection without a warning signal at a rate of speed of from 10 to 25 miles an hour, and at the same time a street car belonging to appellant was going north on Eighth street at about 15 miles an hour. The street car had entered the intersection and the driver of the fire truck swerved to the north to avoid striking the car and in so doing came directly in the path of the approaching interurban car which struck the truck, throwing it back against the street car, as a result of which the injuries and damages alleged were sustained.

The driver of the truck testified that when about 55 feet from the intersection he looked toward the north or right and could see to the alley a distance of about 160 feet and neither saw nor heard an interurban car; that he looked to the south and saw the street car approaching the intersection and devoted his attention to the approaching street car until struck by the interurban. We cannot agree with appellant that, as a matter of law, the driver of the truck was guilty of contributory negligence.

In view of the foregoing, we are satisfied with the rulings and judgment of the trial court.

The judgment should be and is hereby affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In this matter defendant and appellant has within the prescribed period requested this court to reconsider its decision rendered in favor of respondent. Appellant complains that this court has misconstrued certain principles of law pertaining to the measurement of damages.

We have reviewed the decision as filed and the briefs submitted last upon the original hearing and also the brief requesting a rehearing.

Appellant appears to overlook the point that the facts complained of, viz. the employment, the amount of compensation, and the length of time that each employee had suffered injury and the period of time before he would again be physically able to resume his duties, were all stipulated.

Petitioner is correct as to the general principles of law applicable to the case in question. The action is a subrogation suit and the measure of damages in this as in any damage action is the amount which will compensate the injured employees for all the detriment proximately caused by the breach of defendant; but at the trial of this action, instead of plaintiff proving the injuries in the usual manner, it was stipulated that the firemen were employees, that they were injured, and the extent and duration of the injuries, as well as the salaries received at the date of injury, leaving as the only question to be determined that of liability.

It is true that respondent was restricted by the instruction given by the trial court and complained of by appellant which fixed the measure of damages at 65 per cent. of the salaries received. The jury might have assessed a large amount for pain and suffering, but of that appellant cannot complain, and respondent has raised no protest.

We again declare that, in view of the stipulation, it was not error for the trial court to compute the amount of damages based upon the earnings of the employees, for aside from any allowance for pain and suffering, an allowance of either more or less than the stipulated earnings computed by the court would not have been sustained by any evidence in the case.

It is correct that the instruction should not have limited the measure of damages to earnings alone; but appellant, being benefited thereby, cannot be heard to complain.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The petition for a hearing in this court is denied. Such denial, however, should not be taken as an approval of what is said in the opinion indicating that the measure of damages in such cases is the amount fixed by the Workmen's Compensation Act for injuries to be paid by the employer to the employee or his dependents. See Western States, etc., Co. v. Bayside L. Co., 182 Cal. 140, 187 P. 735. Applying the rules which are generally applicable to measure the liability of a tort-feasor, we think that the appellant, under the particular facts of this case, was not prejudiced by the instruction of the court limiting the damages which the respondent might recover to the stipulated amounts.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Actions by Lawrence V. Overell and by Robert E. Overell against Arthur O. Overell for the removal of the latter as trustee. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Bordwell & Mathews and Odell S. McConnell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joe Crail and Harold C. Morton, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. Two companion cases are presented by this appeal, one an action by Lawrence V. Overell and the other by Robert E. Overell, against Arthur O. Overell, to have him removed as trustee under two certain declarations of trust. Under each declaration of trust 375 shares of the capital stock of the J. M. Overell Furniture Company, a corporation, is held in trust. The parties plaintiff are beneficiaries under the trust declarations. The parties plaintiff and the party defendant are brothers. Each declaration of trust is dated October 20, 1920, and made by the mother of the parties, Anna E. Overell, who appointed herself trustee thereunder and designated the defendant as her successor in the event of her death before the expiration of the trust. Mrs. Overell died in 1923, since which time the defendant has acted as trustee under said declarations of trust. Each trust declaration provides that the trustee shall hold the stock with full and complete voting power thereof, paying the entire net income to the beneficiary for a period of ten years, after which time the trust estate shall be transferred to the beneficiary discharged of any and all trusts; and in the event of the death of the beneficiary during the existence of the trust, then said trust property is to be transferred, discharged of any trusts, to his heirs at law.

All the stock of the Overell Furniture Company is owned by the Overell family. The defendant owns 509 shares and holds 750 shares in trust for the plaintiffs in these proceedings, and the remainder of the 2,500 shares is owned by other brothers. The plaintiffs sought the removal of the defendant as trustee and the appointment of another trustee or the termination of the trust, it being contended that the defendant was not a fit and proper person to be trustee of the stock because his personal interests conflicted with his duties as trustee; that the actions of the defendant with relation to the management and voting of plaintiffs' stock were inimical to the best interests of plaintiffs; and that because of the personal antagonism existing between the defendant and the plaintiffs, defendant was not a proper person to act as trustee.

The trial court gave judgment removing Arthur O. Overell as trustee and appointing as trustee the nominee of the plaintiffs. Defendant appeals from this judgment, and contends that the complaint does not state a cause of action for the removal of the trustee, that the findings do not support the judgment, and that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

No demurrers were filed to the complaints, and the following is a summary of their allegations: Both of the plaintiffs are employed in the business of the Overell Furniture Company. Robert E. Overell is credit manager, and has been employed in the business for about eight years. Lawrence V. Overell has been employed in various capacities for about three years. The trustee, by reason of being such, has control of a majority of the stock of the corporation and, in addition, dominates and controls another brother, I. R. Overell, so that he controls two-thirds of the stock of this corporation. He became trustee of the stock on January 8, 1923, and at the first stockholders' meeting thereafter, in April, 1923, proceeded to cause the number of directors of the corporation to be reduced from five to three, and changed the by-laws of the corporation so as to permit their amendment at any directors' meeting by a two-thirds vote of the directors. By reducing the number of directors, the defendant eliminated Walter E. Overell from the board of directors. Walter E. Overell had been on the board of directors for several years, was familiar with the business, and the best interests of the business and of the stock belonging to the trust estate required the retention of Walter on the board of directors. The defendant, having chosen a board of directors subject to his domination and having changed the by-laws so they could be amended at any time by two-thirds of this board, and having further adopted a resolution that any person might hold two offices, proceeded to elect himself president and general manager and become in full control of the affairs of the corporation.

It is alleged that the income from the trust estate depends entirely upon dividends declared upon the stock; and that the payment of the same rests entirely with the defendant; that dividends have not been declared for the year 1922 nor for the year 1923, although the earnings of the corporation have been large; that the defendant had the power to increase his salary as he saw fit; that the defendant proposed to cause the capital stock of the Overell Furniture Company to be increased to the extent of $100,000, and was about to take the necessary steps to call a stockholders' meeting and by proper legal action increase the stock to such extent; and that by reason of being the trustee under the trust declaration, he would have sufficient voting power to secure the increase of stock; that there was no necessity for the increase of the capital stock; and that this step was being taken despite the objections of the plaintiffs and for the purpose of compelling them to raise large sums of money to purchase the additional stock, or, in the event of their failure so to do, the defendant would purchase the additional stock, thereby permanently securing the control of the corporation; that only by having the voting power of the trust stock could the defendant increase the capital stock; that plaintiffs would be unable to purchase sufficient of the new stock to retain their proportionate interests in the corporation; that defendant notified the plaintiffs that he proposed to remove the business of the corporation to a new building and refused to discuss the matter with plaintiffs; that this matter was of great importance to said corporation, and therefore to the trust estate consisting of stock in said corporation, and the stock of plaintiffs should be fairly and impartially represented in voting on this question; that defendant, for a period of two years, has taken a hostile, unpleasant, and insulting attitude toward plaintiffs, calling them vile names and stating to them that they were not entitled to any interest in the business nor any stock therein and that defendant attempted to intimidate plaintiffs by telling them that if they were to take any steps to secure control of their stock he would discharge them from their positions; that by reason of the hostility and antagonisms existing between the parties, the defendant would not act for the best interests of the plaintiffs.

The trust declarations provide that the trust may be terminated at any time prior to the expiration of the ten-year period, in the discretion of the trustee. The complaints allege that by reason of the hostile feeling between the defendant and the plaintiffs, the defendant could not exercise a fair and impartial discretion in this matter of terminating the trust.

[1] Appellant urges that the matters complained of are all within the legal rights of the defendant and will not constitute cause for his removal as trustee. We cannot agree with this position. In all matters connected with his trust a trustee is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary, and may not obtain any advantage therein over the latter by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat or adverse pressure of any kind. Section 2228, Civ. Code. As long as the confidential relation lasts the trustee or other fiduciary owes an undivided duty to his beneficiary, and cannot place himself in any other position which would subject him to conflicting duties, or expose him to the temptation of acting contrary to the best interests of his original cestui que trust. This prohibition operates irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of such dealing. 3 Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. § 1077.

The case of Gartside v. Gartside, 113 Mo. 348, 20 S. W. 669, is one involving a trust of stock in a "family" corporation, and presents many features similar to the case at bar. The defendant trustee was a brother of the complainants, having been appointed trustee under the will of their father. Part of the trust estate consisted of stock in a coal company. We quote from the decision:

> "Defendant is president and treasurer of the company, and he is enabled, without the consent of plaintiffs, to control the election of the board of directors, as he, his mother, his sister that sides with him, and his brother own 4,020 of the shares, while plaintiffs own 1,980. He pays the dividends on the stock to his sisters. * * * He refuses to give his sisters any information in regard to the business of the coal company. * * *

"We think also that the court erred in not removing defendant from the trust for these reasons: First. He occupies antagonistic relations to the coal company property. He owns stock as an individual, as trustee, he holds the stock of his sisters, and he controls the business of the company as its president. He is, indeed, the company, being in full and complete control of it. He elects himself president and treasurer, and fixes and pays his own salary. * * * Defendant's attorneys make this distinction with great clearness between defendant's actions as an officer of the company and his conduct as trustee and complain that plaintiffs cannot or will not see that distinction.

"The argument is that the beneficiaries have no right to inquire into defendant's management of the corporate property, and that, even if they had such right, it is evident 'they together represent too small a fraction of its stock to enable them to exercise control of the business and it is a sufficient answer to all their complaint and criticism that all that has been done represents the will of the majority of those interested in the company.' If that is true, then it is perfectly manifest that the stock of the complaining beneficiaries should be held by some one other than the defendant. This would operate as a slight check, at least, on his management of the company's affairs. The fact that he can control the company without the consent of complainants, instead of being a reason for permitting him to retain the title to their stock with the power to vote it, affords the strongest reason why he should surrender it to some one whose interests are not identical with his. His dual relations to this property are antagonistic, and the court should sever them by removing him from the trusteeship, and by the appointment of some other discreet business man, who, no doubt, will be able to find some legal method of inquiring into the management of the business of the company."

Many features of the instant case are considered in the foregoing quotation; another feature of the instant case is discussed in the case of Pyle v. Pyle, 137 App. Div. 573, 122 N. Y. S. 260 (affirmed 199 N. Y. 538, 92 N. E. 1099), as follows:

"By accepting a salary as president of the corporation, he has placed himself in a position whereby his personal interest may, or has, come directly in conflict with, and to a certain extent antagonistic to, his interest as trustee. It is not necessary to determine that he has acted in bad faith or received from the corporation a sum in excess of what he would have been legally entitled to if he had been selected as president of the corporation had he not been a trustee of an estate holding one-half the capital stock. One-half of the salary paid to him diminishes to that extent what would otherwise be paid to the beneficiaries of the trust which he represents, and to this extent at least he is not in a position to so act that his personal interest does not come in conflict with his interest as trustee. He ought not to have placed himself in such position, and, having done so, ought not to be permitted to act as trustee."

In Matter of Hirsch's Estate, 116 App. Div. 367, 376, 101 N. Y. S. 893, 899, it is said:

"It is not necessary to determine that the appellant acted in bad faith or received from the corporation a sum in excess of what he would have been legally entitled to had he been selected as president and counsel for the company by the stockholders owning stock in their own right. He placed himself in a position where his personal interest and the interest of the beneficiaries for whom he was trustee were to a certain extent antagonistic."

[2] In May v. May, 167 U. S. 310, 17 S. Ct. 824, 42 L. Ed. 179, the court said:

"The power of a court of equity to remove a trustee, and to substitute another in his place, is incidental to its paramount duty to see that trusts are properly executed; and may properly be exercised whenever such a state of mutual ill-feeling, growing out of his behavior, exists between the trustees, or between the trustee in question and the beneficiaries, that his continuance in office would be detrimental to the execution of the trust, even if for no other reason than that human infirmity would prevent the cotrustee or the beneficiaries from working in harmony with him, and although charges of misconduct against him are either not made out, or are greatly exaggerated. [Citing authorities.]"

Also, in McPherson v. Cox, 96 U. S. 404, 419 (24 L. Ed. 746), it is said, "Where a trustee is charged with an active trust, which gives him some discretionary power over the rights of the cestui que trust, and which brings him into constant personal intercourse with the latter," it may be conceded "that the mere existence of strong mutual ill feeling between the parties will, under some circumstances, justify a change by the court."

In the instant case the trustee has discretionary power over the termination of the trust and the declaration of dividends, which constitute the income from the estate. The trustee and beneficiaries are brought into constant personal contact because of the employment by the same corporation.

We quote further from Gartside v. Gartside, supra:

"The second reason why the defendant should be removed from the trusteeship mentioned is the unfriendly and even hostile relations that exist between him and the cestui que trusts. Hostility between the trustee and the cestui que trust is not of itself a sufficient ground of removal, unless it appears that the action of the former is probably controlled or might be controlled by it. Some of the courts make a distinction between hostility growing out of the trustee's fault, or partly out of his fault, and that growing wholly out of the fault of the cestui que trust. Conceding that such distinction is founded in reason, which is not clear to us, however, yet we think the evidence in this case shows conclusively that defendant is not entirely without fault. * * *

"In our opinion the hostility of these parties and the situation and nature of the property and their relations to it make the continuance of defendant as trustee incompatible with the best interests of the beneficiaries, and he should be removed. This position is supported by authority, and, it seems to us, upon principle, too. Perry on Trusts, § 276, and cases cited."

Cases announcing a principle in harmony with the foregoing authority are: Maydwell v. Maydwell, 135 Tenn. 1, 185 S. W. 712, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1043; Wilson v. Wilson, 145 Mass. 490, 493, 14 N. E. 521, 1 Am. St. Rep. 477; Laughlin v. Wells Bldg. Co., 179 Wis. 56, 190 N. W. 899. The case last cited answers the argument of appellant based upon the fact that the record shows that the beneficiaries of the trust have probably been as disagreeable and inconsiderate in their treatment of the trustee as he has been in his treatment of them, in the following language:

> "We find, however, upon examining the evidence that a state of serious antagonism has arisen between the trustee and the cestuis que trustent. Whether the trustee is more to be blamed for the existence of this antagonism than the cestuis que trustent, we need not determine. * * * While it is true that the mere fact that a quarrel exists between a cestui que trust and the trustee is not ground for the removal of the latter, yet such fact, in connection with other facts and circumstances, may be taken into consideration in determining whether or not a trial court has abused its discretion in removing the trustee. In the case of a trust not coupled with any interest in the trustee, the welfare of the beneficiaries of the trust constitutes the chief matter for consideration."

[3] The attack made by the appellant upon the findings is without merit. It is true that some of the findings are immaterial and unnecessary to the decision, but that fact does not prejudice the appellant. There are in the record findings sufficient to meet the rules of law enunciated in the decisions from which quotations have been made herein which are supported by the evidence. Defendant voted the stock of the beneficiaries to his personal advantage in such matters as his election to the offices of president and general manager, and in increasing his salary and in making changes in the board of directors and in the by-laws of the corporation, all calculated to increase his power and control in the corporation. A very bitter antagonism exists between defendant and plaintiffs, which has gone so far as to be manifested in physical violence upon some occasions. Such conditions tend to make it impossible for the defendant to impartially exercise his discretion in the matter of terminating the trust and in other matters involving the interests of the beneficiaries.

The contention that the findings do not support the judgment is answered by our discussion of the sufficiency of the complaints, as the findings embody, substantially, the allegations of the complaints.

[4] The only other matter requiring consideration is the contention that the appellant should be allowed a reasonable sum for attorney's fees for services rendered on appeal, which sum is suggested as $2,500 in each of the two cases. In exercising discretion in this matter we are impressed by the fact that the trial court has already allowed the trustee $2,500 in each case, or a total of $5,000, to meet any obligation he may be under for the expenses of this litigation. In view of that fact, we are inclined to take the position of the court in the case of Laughlin v. Wells Bldg. Co. supra, wherein it was said:

> "The trial court allowed the plaintiff [the trustee] $1,500 for legal services in this case, allowed him for disbursements actually paid out as trustee, and allowed him to tax statutory disbursements made by him in this action. In view of such allowances, we have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff [the trustee] should have no further allowances for costs, disbursements, or counsel fees upon this appeal."

The judgments are affirmed.

JOHNSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.

1. Commerce ⚷27(3)—Empty cars of oil company being moved to yard where they were to be inspected, after which owners of oil intended to use them in interstate shipments, held not in interstate commerce, within federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665).

Empty, private owned cars being moved to certain yard where they were to be inspected, after which owners of incoming oil, who had leased such cars, intended to ship oil to other states in them, held neither vehicles nor parcels of interstate commerce, so as to permit action under federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665) for death of brakeman on train of which they were part, notwithstanding statement as to their intended use by traffic manager of lessor to railroad's car clerk.

2. Master and servant ⚷265(1).

One seeking to recover under federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665) has burden to show that railroad was engaged in interstate commerce at time of injury.

3. Master and servant ⚷265(1).

In suit under federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665), there is presumption that railroad, while operating within state, was engaged in intrastate commerce.

4. Commerce ⚷27(3).

To be liable for employee's injury, under federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665), railroad must have accepted and designated for interstate use one or more units of train on which he worked.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Effie May Johnson, as administratrix of the estate of Gustave C. Johnson, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin and Henley C. Booth, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff from a judgment in defendants' favor after motion for nonsuit made and granted in the trial court. The action is one in which the plaintiff, as administratrix of the estate of Gustave C. Johnson, deceased, and for the benefit of herself as his widow and of his two daughters, seeks to recover damages for injuries resulting in his death through the alleged negligence of the defendants. The deceased, at the time of receiving such injuries and of his death therefrom, was employed by the defendant Southern Pacific Company in the capacity of a switchman and was engaged in moving a train of freight cars westerly from the belt line of the state railroad along King street, in the city of San Francisco, to the Mission Bay yards of the defendant in said city. It is expressly conceded that the collision which caused the death of the decedent occurred through the negligence of another employee of the defendant, and the only question presented in the case upon motion for nonsuit and upon this appeal is as to whether the train of cars upon which the deceased was riding in the course of his employment at the time of his injuries was engaged in interstate or intrastate commerce. If the former, the superior court would have jurisdiction to entertain this action under the provisions of the federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 8657–8665); if the latter, the sole original jurisdiction would be in the State Industrial Accident Commission. The case as to the principles of law involved resembles in its main aspects the case of Mappin v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Ry. Co., 247 P. 911, recently decided by this court, but as to certain of its facts it so far differs from that case as to present the serious question as to whether a different conclusion should not be arrived at upon this appeal. The train of cars upon which the deceased was riding at the time he received his fatal injuries consisted in what is known in railroad parlance as a "drag," embracing a number of freight cars which had been received by the defendant from the belt line railroad and were being transported to its Mission Bay yards. The ultimate destination of most of these cars is immaterial to the present controversy, but as to one or two of their number it is contended that these had been so far definitely committed to interstate commerce as to render the entire train engaged in such commerce under well-established principles of law. Mappin v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Ry. Co., supra. As to the cars so claimed to be thus committed to interstate commerce, the following are the undisputed facts of the case: A shipment of vegetable oil was in course of ocean transit from Manchuria, consigned to Cook, Swan & Co. of San Francisco, but intended by the latter, its owners, for further shipment by rail to certain eastern customers, with the exception of one carload thereof, which, when transferred from steamer to tank car, was to be sent to Richmond, Cal., and also a portion of a tank carload which was to be delivered to Nason & Co., a San Francisco customer. In order to facilitate these further shipments of said oil, it was necessary that Cook, Swan & Co. should procure the necessary tank cars therefor, and accordingly the said owners of said oil arranged with the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company to lease 25 privately owned tank cars for such purposes, and gave its order to its said lessor to assemble these cars, to route 23 of them east when filled with oil from the steamer, to route one of them to Richmond, and, as to the remaining car, to take it when loaded to its own plant in said city, to draw off some of the oil into barrels for eastern shipment, and to send the remainder in its said car to the aforesaid San Francisco customer of Cook, Swan & Co. Upon receiving the above order the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company began to assemble the required number of oil tank cars by using some cars of its own and by arranging to procure others from other private owners of cars. One of these latter was car 328, belonging to one Victor Labordie, and intended for use in the eastern shipment of said oil. Another car, apparently the property of the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company, was numbered 1075, and it, together with car 328, were ordered to be taken to the Mission Bay yards of the defendant herein, there to await the arrival of the oil-laden steamer which was expected to be at the dock ready for unloading upon the following day. In order that these two cars might be transported from the tracks of the belt line railroad to the Mission Bay yard of the Southern Pacific Company, the traffic manager of the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company applied to the Southern Pacific Company to make such transfer and the latter accordingly issued a bill of lading to the former, which, in substance, recited that it had received from the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company the aforesaid two cars designated and described as "Mty Tank Cars O. V. O. X. 1075, G. R. Y. X. 328," having for their destination "Mission Bay yard, State of California." Nothing further appears upon this bill of lading as to any agreement or understanding between the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company and the Southern Pacific Company as to any further transportation of these two cars or either of them by the latter beyond their stated destination, but there was some evidence of an oral direction that these cars, when assembled with the remainder of the 25 cars engaged to be supplied by the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company to Cook, Swan & Co., in the Mission Bay yard of the Southern Pacific Company, were to be there held awaiting the arrival of the oil-laden steamer at Pier 54. and that when it had there arrived and was ready for unloading these cars were to be taken to said dock in suitable lots for the purpose of being loaded with said oil. There was an intermediate condition to the effect that the cars were to be inspected while in the defendant's said Mission Bay yard, for the purpose of determining whether they were in condition for their intended use and the evidence in the case showed that when thus inspected, after being brought to said yard and after the collision which caused the decedent's injuries and death, car 328 was found to be unfitted for such intended use and it was accordingly discarded. As to car No. 1075, however, the evidence in the case showed that it was found to be fit and that it was taken by the defendant herein to Pier 54 on the day following the decedent's injuries and was there loaded with oil, a portion of which was to be and was in fact delivered to Nason & Co., the San Francisco customer of Cook, Swan & Co., and the remainder of which was to be and was in fact taken to the plant of the Vegetable Oils Company in San Francisco, where it was barreled and reshipped to the eastern customers of Cook, Swan & Co.

[1-4] Upon the basis of the foregoing facts as shown by the undisputed evidence in the case, the trial court, upon motion for nonsuit, concluded that the plaintiff had not sustained her contention that the train of cars upon which the deceased employee of the defendant was riding at the time of the injuries which caused his death were at the time of his said injuries engaged in interstate commerce, so as to confer upon the superior court jurisdiction to entertain this action under the terms of the federal Employers' Liability Act, and hence granted said motion for nonsuit, and thereupon entered judgment in the defendants' favor. We are of the opinion that the trial court was not in error in so doing. The burden was upon the plaintiff in this action to establish the fact that the defendant, at the very time when its employee through its negligence received the injuries which caused his death, was engaged in interstate commerce, the presumption being, in the absence of such proof, that the employer while in the use and operation of its railway within the state was engaged in intrastate commerce. Terry v. Southern Pac. Co., 34 Cal. App. 330, 169 P. 86; Bradbury v. Railway, 149 Iowa, 51, 128 N. W. 1, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 684; Osborne, etc., v. Gray, 241 U. S. 16, 36 S. Ct. 486, 60 L. Ed. 865. In the production of such required proof it was necessary for the plaintiff in this case to show that one or more of the units in the train of empty cars, which the defendant was engaged in moving along its tracks at the time of the decedent's injuries, had been definitely accepted and designated by said defendant for interstate uses and was moving at such time along the line of its, or their, destiny. The proofs which the plaintiff tendered in that behalf fell short of sufficiency to support such burden in several essential respects. The two particular freight cars in said train which the plaintiff relied upon as having been devoted to interstate uses were car 328 and car 1075. Neither of these two cars belonged to the defendant, nor were either of them foreign cars which had been received by the defendant from other railroad lines at points outside of the state laden with interstate freight bound for California points as was the case in Mappin v. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé, supra, and which it was the duty of the defendant after unloading to start on their homeward way. The cars in question here were the property of private owners located within this state and such cars, prior to the leasing thereof by Cook Swan & Co., had no inherent interstate quality whatever. Neither had such cars or either of them taken on such quality in so far as the defendant was concerned prior to the time of the collision in which the decedent lost his life. It may be conceded that Cook, Swan & Co., in procuring said cars through its leasing arrangement with Oriental Vegetable Oils Company, intended to devote them, or at least one of them, to the transfer of its cargo of vegetable oil to eastern points, and that such transfer would be interstate commerce; but that would not of itself suffice to cast upon the defendant the burden sought to be imposed upon it in this forum and form of action, since, in order to do so, it was essential to show that the defendant had definitely received and accepted said cars for devotion to such intended interstate uses. It is the carrier and not the owner of the article being transported who must be engaged in interstate commerce at the time the injury to its employee occurs in order to entitle the latter to invoke the jurisdiction of the state courts under the terms of the federal Employers' Liability Act. A very apt and instructive case upon this subject is that of Southern Pacific Co. v. Arizona, 249 U. S. 472, wherein the precise question here under consideration is discussed and decided. The cases cited in support of that decision also consider differing phases of situations resembling that of the case at bar. These, with certain other apposite cases, are the following: Railroad Commission, etc., v. Worthington, 225 U. S. 101, 32 S. Ct. 653, 56 L. Ed. 1004; Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Iowa, 233 U. S. 334, 34 S. Ct. 592, 58 L. Ed. 988; Chicago Junction Ry. Co. v. Ind. Bd., 277 Ill. 512, 115 N. E. 647; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Peck, 255 F. 261, 166 C. C. A. 431; C. B. & Q. R. R. v. Harrington, 241 U. S. 177, 36 S. Ct. 517, 60 L. Ed. 941; Minn. & St. L. R. Co. v. Winters, 242 U. S. 353, 37 S. Ct. 170, 61 L. Ed. 358, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 54; Smith v. Interurban Ry. Co., 186 Iowa, 1045, 171 N. W. 134; Oregon R. & N. Co. v. Campbell (C. C.) 180 F. 255; Ill. Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens, 233 U. S. 473, 34 S. Ct. 646, 58 L. Ed. 1051, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 163.

It is true that in the case of Baltimore, etc., Ry. Co. v. Settle, 260 U. S. 166, 43 S. Ct. 28, 67 L. Ed. 189, and in certain of the cases cited therein, upon which the appellant herein strongly relies, it was held that when the shipper had definitely determined the contents of the carrier's cars to be destined as interstate commerce the carrier could not be permitted to change their quality to that of intrastate traffic by the form of the agreement for carriage, such as by the issuance of local waybills or charging local rates; but the reason underlying this line of decisions is that carriers cannot be permitted, for improper motives, in bad faith, and in an attempt to avoid their responsibilities under the interstate commerce laws to attempt to give to a definite interstate movement of freight an intrastate quality by these forms of subterfuge. No such question is presented in the instant case, nor is it pretended that the waybill of the carrier herein was not issued in good faith as expressing its agreement for the transfer of the cars in question to the destination named therein. The only evidence in this record which looks in any other direction is that furnished by the witness Fontaine, who was traffic manager of the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company, and who informed one Emig, designated in the evidence as "car clerk" of the defendant, that the purpose of the movement of these cars from the belt line railroad to the defendant's Mission Bay yards, and thence later to Pier 54, was that these cars were there to be loaded with a shipment of oil chiefly designed for eastern points. But this volunteered statement of the traffic manager of a concern which, while the lessor of these cars, had no control over their content or destination, could not be binding either upon the owner and shipper of the oil in question or the railroad company in its acceptance of these cars for transportation to the place where they were to be loaded with said oil. The undisputed fact is that the entire control over the content to be placed in said cars and over their destination when loaded therewith remained at all times with the owner of the oil and was not transferred and was not to be transferred to the defendant until such time as these cars received their load of oil at Pier 54, and until the shipper thereof, Cook, Swan & Co., then designated the destination of each of these cars. The only agreement under which the defendant received these cars and was engaged in their transfer to its Mission Bay yards at the time of the decedent's injuries was that contained in the waybill issued by it upon its reception, possession, and ensuing transportation of these cars to the destination named therein. By the express terms of said waybill the defendant received and undertook to transport the two empty cars in question, not as vehicles for the transportation of freight therein or to be placed therein, but as themselves parcels of freight which the defendant contracted to deliver at a stated destination, viz., at its Mission Bay yards within the city of San Francisco. Beyond said destination the defendant did not, by the terms of its written agreement, agree to transport said cars. There is, however, some evidence to the effect that oral instructions had been given over the phone by the traffic manager of the Oriental Vegetable Oils Company to certain agents of the defendant to deliver said cars after their inspection at said yards at Dock 54 when the steamer arrived with its cargo of oil and was ready to unload it, but there is no evidence of any existing agreement or undertaking on the part of the defendant or between it and the owners of the oil content to be placed in said cars by which the defendant had become engaged or bound to transport said cars or either of them to any fixed destination, either within or without the state of California, when they had received their cargo of oil; nor is there any evidence whatever showing that any control over the destination of said cars or either of them beyond that set forth in said waybill, or at most beyond Pier 54, had been invested in the defendant at any time prior to the time of the collision in which the decedent lost his life. On the contrary, the undisputed evidence in the case discloses that the owners of said oil fully retained and fully exercised such control over the ultimate destination of said cars up to and after they had received their content of oil; that car No. 328 failed to pass muster upon its inspection in the defendant's Mission Bay yards and never did reach said pier, receive its load of oil, or go into either interstate or intrastate service, but went into a car shop for repairs; and that, as to car 1075, it was transmitted, after due inspection in the defendant's said yards, to said Pier 54 and was there loaded with oil, but that after being so loaded it was, by the order of the owners of said oil, sent to the premises of Nason & Co., one of their local customers, and was there partly unloaded; and that it was then taken to the oil company's plant in San Francisco where the remainder of its oil content was barreled and then reshipped to an eastern destination, during all of which time and of these several changes of freightage said car No. 1075 remained and continued to be under the sole control, as to its ultimate destination, of the owners of said oil.

From the foregoing undisputed facts, the conclusion would seem to be irresistible that at no time prior to the collision which caused the injuries and death of the decedent had these two cars or either of them taken on the quality of either vehicles or parcels of interstate commerce in so far as the relation of the defendant to them or to their destination was concerned. This being so, it must be further concluded that, as to the train of cars upon which the decedent was employed and was riding at the time of his fatal injuries, the defendant was not in their transportation at the time of such collision engaged in interstate commerce, and, this being so, was not subject to the jurisdiction of the state courts in this form of action for damages to its employee which were the result of such collision.

The defendants' motion for nonsuit was therefore properly granted and the judgment based thereon is accordingly affirmed.

1. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12)—Error, if any, of court's comments on trifling importance of evidence offered for impeachment in admitting it, held not prejudicial, where it was inadmissible.

Error, if any, of trial court in commenting upon its little importance in admitting record of juvenile court, offered by accused for impeachment, showing state's witness had entered plea of guilty to larceny charge, held not prejudicial, since record was not admissible in first instance.

2. Witnesses 🔑345(1)—Juvenile court's record held not admissible for impeachment purposes, since no finding of such court could amount to conviction of a felony.

Record of juvenile court, offered for impeachment, held inadmissible, since proceedings in such court are not penal, and hence no finding of juvenile court could amount to conviction of a felony.

3. Criminal law 🔑1166½(8)—Denial of challenge for cause on ground juror had opinion accused killed decedent held not prejudicial, where sole issue was whether accused acted in self-defense.

Denial of challenge for cause, directed to juror who stated, on voir dire examination, opinion that accused killed decedent, held not prejudicial, notwithstanding accused had exhausted his peremptory challenges, where accused during trial admitted homicide, but urged it was justified.

4. Criminal law 🔑1166½(5)—That juror, whose name was drawn in his absence, was seated without redrawing name, held not prejudicial, where he did not sit in case and method of his excuse was not shown.

Where slip was drawn from jury box, and person named was not in courtroom, that upon return he was seated in place of excused juror without returning name to box held not prejudicial, if error, where he did not sit during trial and record was silent as to method by which he was excused.

5. Criminal law 🔑377—Testimony of character witness that he had never heard accused's reputation discussed, and testimony represented his personal opinion, held evidence of good reputation.

That testimony of accused's character witness was stricken when he testified on cross-examination he had never discussed accused's reputation or heard it discussed, and that testimony represented his personal opinion, held error, since fact he had not heard subject discussed was some evidence of good reputation, and he may not have recognized distinction between testifying to reputation and to an opinion as to reputation.

6. Criminal law ⚷1168(4)—Error in striking out testimony of accused's character witnesses held not prejudicial, where testimony of other character witnesses was admitted.

Error of court in striking out, on motions of prosecution, testimony of two character witnesses offered by accused, held not prejudicial, where accused introduced testimony of seven other character witnesses, and state did not produce an equal number to the contrary.

7. Witnesses ⚷277(2)—Questions whether accused had ever previously had gun trouble and had previously drawn gun on anybody held proper cross-examination in murder prosecution, in view of his direct examination.

Where, in murder prosecution, accused's counsel asked him whether he had had any trouble or difficulty with anybody previously, and, if he had been charged with any offense, questions whether this was first occasion he had any gun trouble with any person and whether he had ever drawn gun on any one before, held proper cross-examination.

8. Criminal law ⚷683(1)—That accused had drawn gun on and threatened to kill witness held admissible to rebut his testimony that he had never drawn gun on any one.

Testimony that several years previous to trial accused had drawn gun on witness and threatened to kill him held admissible, in murder prosecution, to rebut his testimony that he had led an untroubled life and had never drawn gun on any one.

9. Homicide ⚷338(1)—Admitting testimony that decedent served two years in navy held not prejudicial, if error.

Admission of testimony of decedent's mother that he had served in navy two years held not prejudicial, if erroneous under rule that decedent's character is not in issue unless first attacked by defense.

10. Criminal law ⚷1163(1)—To justify reversal, prejudice must affirmatively appear from the record (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, injury or prejudice to justify a reversal cannot be presumed from mere fact of error, but must affirmatively appear from an inspection of the record.

11. Homicide ⚷254.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of murder in the second degree.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

D. B. Hoffman was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles E. Scott and Edgar B. Hervey, both of El Centro, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and E. R. Utley, Dist. Atty., and J. E. Simpson, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of El Centro, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice LAWLOR, is adopted as the opinion and decision of the court:

"The defendant, D. B. Hoffman, was informed against by the district attorney of the county of Imperial for the crime of murder. It was stated in the information, among other things, that the defendant had, on May 29, 1923, murdered John A. Schafer in said county. After trial the defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree. The judgment of conviction was, however, reversed on appeal (195 Cal. 295, 232 P. 974) and a new trial had. The second trial of defendant on the charge likewise resulted in his being convicted of murder in the second degree. From the judgment entered upon this latter conviction, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant prosecutes this appeal. The evidence produced at the second trial is substantially the same as that produced upon the first trial. This being so, a general statement of the evidence will suffice for a consideration and weighing of the errors asserted to have occurred upon the second trial.

"The homicide was admitted by the appellant, but is claimed to have been in self-defense. At the time of the homicide, the appellant was a rancher in the Imperial Valley, living with his wife on leased premises. One Donald Cornelison had been employed by appellant about the ranch, but left said employ after having worked approximately a day and a half. On the evening of the day that Cornelison left appellant's employ, he (Cornelison), in company with one James H. Shell and the decedent, came in an automobile to appellant's ranch and there engaged in conversation with one of the ranch hands. The trio departed in said automobile about 9 p. m. Shortly thereafter the appellant observed an automobile stopped, with lights out, opposite a field leased by him, and in which stood his thresher and tractor. Appellant, suspecting that the occupants of the parked car were about to steal from his thresher and tractor, drove in his car, accompanied by his wife, in the direction of the other machine. At this point in the narrative the appellant testified, in substance, that upon reaching the parked car he left his automobile and saw two boys proceeding in the direction of the thresher whereupon he called to them to come away from there; that he fired one shot in the air apparently to frighten them; that subsequent to the firing of the shot in the air the decedent, whom he did not at that time recognize, appeared and said, 'What in hell are you doing here?' that appellant's wife left their automobile and inquired of decedent what the boys were doing there, to which he replied, 'None of your damned business'; that decedent approached him with one hand on his right hip pocket and threatened that he would 'get him'; that, as decedent advanced toward him, he (appellant) backed away; that, during the progress of decedent's asserted threatening advance toward him, decedent started to remove his hand from his hip pocket, whereupon appellant shot him; that he believed that decedent had a gun on him; that decedent was about 6 feet from him when he shot him, having advanced approximately 20 feet from the starting place.

"In all material respects, the appellant's narrative of the immediate events leading up to the homicide was corroborated by the testimony of his wife.

"Donald Cornelison, called as a witness for the prosecution, testified to the effect that he and James H. Shell had entered the field containing the thresher and tractor for the purpose of securing a piece of wire with which to repair a broken shock absorber on their car; that decedent was in the car with them when they stopped for this purpose; that while in the field they heard the appellant call to them; that as they were coming from the field he saw the decedent leaning with his right hand on their car and with his left hand on his side; that the appellant turned and fired upon the decedent, who exclaimed, 'I am shot!' that decedent thereupon climbed into appellant's car; that appellant then pointed the gun at the witness and inquired what 'devilment' they were up to; that he told appellant the purpose of their entry into his field; that appellant told him and Shell to take decedent from appellant's car and to a doctor; that they did so; and that decedent, so far as he was aware, did not have a weapon upon his person at the time of the homicide.

"Substantially the same story was told by James H. Shell when called as a witness for the prosecution.

"1. The first assignment of error is that the trial court made certain asserted improper remarks touching the admissibility of a record of the juvenile court, which remarks are said to have been prejudicial to the appellant. It appears that appellant, for the purpose of impeaching the witness Cornelison, offered in evidence a record of the juvenile court which showed that Cornelison had previously entered a plea of guilty in said court to a charge of grand larceny. The trial court, after expressing some doubt as to the admissibility of such a record for impeachment purposes, stated in part: '* * * I don't think it is very important. To save time I think it may be admitted. * * * I do not think it amounts to anything in particular.' Counsel for appellant immediately requested that the foregoing remarks of the court be expunged from the record.

[1, 2] "We are of the opinion that the record of the juvenile court was not admissible in the first instance for purposes of impeachment as the proceedings in such a court are not penal in their character. In re Daedler, 194 Cal. 320, 228 P. 467. This being so, no plea of the minor or finding of the juvenile court based thereon could amount to a conviction of a felony so as to render the record admissible for impeachment purposes. The error then, if any, of the trial court in commenting upon the same, cannot be held to be prejudicial.

[4] "3. The name of James C. Sharp was drawn from the jury box as a prospective juror, when it was ascertained that he was not, at the time, in the courtroom. The slip bearing his name was thereupon placed upon the clerk's desk and other names withdrawn from the box sufficient to temporarily complete the jury. Subsequently Sharp returned to the courtroom, and, over the objection of appellant that he could not properly be called as a juror without a return of his name to the box and a redrawing therefrom, was seated in the place of an excused juror and examined. He was not among those who finally sat in the case, and nowhere in the record does it appear by what method he was excused. In view of these circumstances, it cannot be held that the procedure by which he was temporarily seated as a juror, even assuming, without deciding, it to have been erroneous, was prejudicial to appellant. The only possible injury that appellant could have suffered would be the use of one of his peremptory challenges to unseat Sharp. But, as the record does not show the method by which he was excused, this court must assume, the burden resting upon appellant to show injury, that he was either excused for cause or upon a peremptory challenge of the prosecution. The contention is therefore without merit.

[5, 6] "4. Hereunder, it is urged that the trial court erred in striking out, on motions of the prosecution, the testimony of George M. Austin and George R. Wade called as character witnesses by the appellant. The proceedings leading up to the orders striking out the testimony of these respective witnesses were somewhat analogous, and may therefore be stated, in substance, as follows: After each of said witnesses had, in response to questions propounded by counsel for the appellant, testified to the good reputation of the appellant for peace and quiet in the community in which he resided, the prosecution, on cross-examination, asked each witness if he had ever discussed appellant's reputation with any one or heard it discussed. These questions were answered in the negative. Thereupon the prosecution inquired of each witness if his testimony represented his personal opinion of the appellant for the enumerated traits. The motions to strike and the orders followed and were apparently based upon the affirmative answers made to his latter question. We are of the opinion that the trial court erred in granting the motions of the prosecution and in ordering the testimony of these respective witnesses stricken out. The fact that neither witness had heard the subject discussed was some evidence of appellant's good reputation in the community where he resided. People v. Adams, 137 Cal. 580, 70 P. 662. Moreover, the witnesses may not have recognized a possible distinction between testifying as to reputation and testifying to an opinion as to reputation. We are of the opinion, however, that the error was not prejudicial, for the appellant offered and had admitted the testimony of seven other character witnesses. The state did not produce an equal number of witnesses who testified to the contrary. We conclude that the error of the trial court in this respect did not work a miscarriage of justice, and would not, therefore, warrant a reversal of the judgment and order.

[7] "5. While on the witness stand on his own behalf the appellant was interrogated in part by his counsel to the following effect: 'During the 22 years you have been in Imperial county, except for the matter which is the subject of this trial here, have you ever had any trouble or difficulty with anybody whomsoever, other than a matter of such discussion as any one is apt to be subject to? Have you ever been charged with any offense whatsoever?' Appellant responded: 'Never, never in my life.' On cross-examination, and over the objection of appellant's counsel, the prosecution asked the appellant the following questions: 'Q. This is the first occasion you ever had any trouble with a gun with any person, Mr. Hoffman? * * * Q. Did you ever draw a gun on anybody before?' To which questions the appellant respectively answered: 'A. I never used a gun on anybody before;' and, 'A. No, sir; I never drew a gun on anybody.' We find no merit in appellant's contention that the trial court ruled erroneously in each of these instances. The two enumerated questions asked on cross-examination were, in our opinion, clearly within the scope of the direct examination of appellant and therefore proper cross-examination.

[8] "6. Subsequent to the above proceedings and during the production of rebuttal evidence by the prosecution, the state produced a witness who was permitted to testify, over appellant's objection, to the effect that three or four years previous to the trial he had been quail hunting on the appellant's premises when the appellant appeared, holding a 'long gun' pointed at him; that he proceeded toward the appellant but was commanded by the latter to stop, the appellant saying, 'No; don't come any closer, if you do I will kill you.' We are of the view that this rebuttal evidence was properly admitted, for it tended to impeach the testimony given by appellant that he had led an untroubled life and had never drawn a gun on any one. In so holding we are not unmindful of the rules that a witness may not be impeached as to collateral matters, and that proof of character by evidence of general reputation can be met only by evidence of general reputation and not by specific acts. Neither of these rules is, in our opinion, applicable, so as to preclude the introduction of this rebuttal testimony.

[9] "7. Under this assignment of error it is urged that the trial court erred in permitting the mother of the decedent, over appellant's objection, to testify, among other things, that the decedent had served two years in the navy. The Attorney General having in mind the rule that the character of the decedent is not in issue unless it has first been attacked by the defense, readily concedes that the introduction of the evidence complained of hereunder may have been erroneous, but contends that its reception could not have prejudicially affected the appellant. With this latter contention we are in accord. Assuming this testimony to have been improperly admitted, we do not think that the appellant was injured thereby.

"Other contentions urged are without merit.

[10, 11] "In conclusion it may be stated that we are of the opinion that the errors found to have been committed during the trial were not prejudicial to the appellant nor did they influence a verdict of conviction which would not have, but for their commission, been rendered. Since the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, injury or prejudice cannot be presumed from the mere fact of error. To justify a reversal on appeal, such injury or prejudice must affirmatively appear from an inspection of the record. The evidence here was sufficient to sustain the verdict rendered, and we cannot say upon an examination of the record that a miscarriage of justice has resulted."

The judgment and order appealed from are, and each is hereby, affirmed.

BAUER et al. v. BAUER et al.

1. Executors and administrators 🔑35(17)—Contention that trial court's order denying separate petitions for removal of executors was inadvertently made because of statement that petitions would be heard separately cannot prevail, where petitions were heard together and submitted for decision.

Where trial court stated it would not hear separate petitions, filed by heirs for removal of executors, together, but submitted both matters for decision after full hearing and decided all questions in controversy, contention that order denying both petitions was inadvertently made cannot prevail.

2. Executors and administrators 🔑35(19).

If trial court's order disposing of separate petitions for removal of executors, after stating they would be heard separately, was inadvertently made, party complaining thereof had duty of directing attention thereto.

Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, and C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

J. W. Morin and Morin, Newell & Brown, all of Pasadena, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This appeal is by Hamilton A. Bauer and certain other heirs of the estate of Emile Bauer, deceased, and is from certain orders of the probate court made in the course of the administration of the estate of said deceased. The proceedings in which these several orders were made had their inception in the presentation of a petition to said court by Hamilton A. Bauer, a son and heir of said deceased and a legatee and devisee under the latter's last will, wherein said petitioner sought to have a citation issued and served upon Lily M. Bauer and Lloyd C. Bauer, executrix and executor, respectively, of the decedent's last will, requiring them and each of them in their said official capacities to appear and be examined with relation to certain properties of said estate described in said petition which, it was alleged, the said executrix and executor had failed to account for or include in their inventory of said estate, but, on the contrary, had appropriated to their and each of their own use. The petitioner also applied for an order suspending said executrix and executor from their respective offices as such until such time as they should be examined as to said properties and should make an accounting thereof. Upon the filing of said petition a citation was issued in accordance with the prayer thereof returnable at a date fixed therein.

Prior to the return day of said petition of Hamilton A. Bauer certain other of the heirs and legatees of said Emile Bauer, deceased, presented a further petition to said probate court setting forth substantially the same facts as were averred in the former petition and alleging the same misappropriations of the properties described therein by the said Lily M. Bauer and Lloyd C. Bauer and alleging that the latter, in their respective official capacities, have made and are making no effort to recover for the benefit of said estate any portion of said properties which they have individually appropriated to themselves, and further alleging that the said executrix and executor of said estate are proposing to sell certain of the remaining properties of said estate, which have been specifically bequeathed to the petitioners, for the purpose of paying certain debts of said estate, and which sale, if so permitted to be made, will have the effect of depriving the petitioners of their interest therein as such specific legatees. The petitioners prayed that a day be set for a hearing of their said petition; that the sale of said properties of said estate be enjoined; and that the executors be removed from their office as such. These petitioners are represented by Hamilton A. Bauer and by C. F. Baxter as their attorneys.

To the aforesaid petition of Hamilton A. Bauer an answer was presented by Lily M. Bauer and Lloyd C. Bauer, wherein all of the averments of the petition were specifically denied, and wherein particularly the respondents denied that said Emile Bauer, at the time of his death, was the owner of any of the properties set forth in the aforesaid petition of Hamilton A. Bauer, and denying that any property whatever that Emile Bauer owned at the time of his death had been concealed or misappropriated or excluded from the inventory of his estate. Wherefore the respondents prayed that the citation issued upon the filing of the said petition be dismissed and the petition denied.

Upon the return day fixed for the hearing of the aforesaid petition of Hamilton A. Bauer the parties and respondents to both petitions, with their counsel, were in court. Whereupon Hamilton A. Bauer requested that both his own petition and the petition of the other heirs and legatees of said estate, whom he and Mr. Baxter represented, should be heard and determined together. In response to said request the attorney representing respondents objected, upon the ground that no citation had been issued or served upon the respondents on account of the second petition and that they had not answered and were not in court in respect to that matter. The court stated that he would not hear the latter petition at that time, but would determine the two matters, one at a time. The court then proceeded to take testimony apparently upon the issues raised by the first of said petitions and the answer thereto and the matter proceeded through several days of hearing, wherein apparently all of the matters of dispute presented by both petitions were fully gone into; counsel for both sets of petitions appearing and taking part in the controversy and Mr. Baxter, particularly, who represented the second set of petitioners, taking a leading part in the examination of the respondents in both proceedings. The record seems to disclose that the whole subject in controversy was gone into by the trial court without any further question being raised as to the matters presented in the second petition being not in issue. So far as the record discloses, the matters set forth in the petition of the second set of petitioners and which were substantially the same as those averred by Hamilton A. Bauer in the first petition were fully exploited in said hearing and were fully argued by respective counsel. At the conclusion of the taking of the testimony and at the close of the argument the court made the brief order, "Argued and submitted." Whereupon the clerk inquired, "Both matters submitted?" to which the court replied, "Yes; both matters." Thereafter, on April 30, 1924, the trial court made and entered the order or orders which are appealed from herein, wherein it was recited that both petitions had come on for hearing regularly before the court on the 19th day of March, 1924, all of the parties thereto being present in court and represented by counsel, and that testimony, both oral and documentary, had been then offered on behalf of both sets of petitioners and of the respondents, and that thereafter both matters had been argued and submitted to the court for its decision. Whereupon the court proceeded to decide that the citation and restraining order theretofore issued should be and they were thereby dismissed and that the petition for the removal of the executors should be and the same was thereby denied.

No objection was made at the time of the filing thereof to the form of the said order, but this appeal was taken therefrom and from the whole thereof in due course by both sets of petitioners.

[1, 2] It was for the first time urged in the briefs of appellants' counsel, presented in the course of said appeal, that the trial court had never in fact heard the petition for the removal of said executors presented by the second set of petitioners, and that its order denying the prayer of said petition for the removal of said executors had therefore been inadvertently made and that its said order made in that behalf should be reversed for that reason. This contention on the part of appellants is without merit.

Conceding that the record discloses some indisposition on the part of the trial court to hear said petitions together, nevertheless, apparently, it proceeded to do so, and, after an exhaustive examination of the matters in dispute as presented by both petitions in which counsel for both sets of petitioners had fully participated, proceeded to submit both matters for decision, and thereafter and in its order undertook to decide all of the questions in controversy as presented by both petitions. If its order in that respect was inadvertently made, it was the duty of the appellants herein to have directed the attention of the trial court to its inadvertence in that regard and to have said order corrected. But this they did not do, apparently considering that the whole subject had been presented in the evidence and argument before the trial court and had been submitted to it for decision.

The next contention which the appellants make upon this appeal is that the evidence which was presented at said hearing before the trial court was sufficient to have justified the making of an order compelling an accounting by the executor and executrix as to the properties which it was alleged in said petition they had appropriated to their own use and benefit and was also sufficient to have justified the removal of the said executor and executrix for their failure and refusal to make such an accounting. No question is apparently raised upon this appeal as to the jurisdiction of the trial court to hear and determine disputed questions of title with relation to these several properties and the right of Lily M. Bauer and Lloyd C. Bauer as individuals receiving the possession and apparent title to the same prior to the death of the decedent to hold said properties in their individual right. The principal question presented upon the appeal is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the order of the trial court refusing the relief prayed for in each and both of said petitions.

Upon that question there would seem to have been sufficient evidence to sustain the order of the trial court, or, perhaps it might better be said, an insufficient amount of evidence to justify the granting of either or both of said petitions.

It follows that in this case the order of the trial court should be and it is hereby affirmed.

STIERLEN v. SCOTT. (S. F. 11332.)

1. Wills 🔑358.

Appealable judgments and orders, in probate proceedings, enumerated in Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3, not including order striking out will contest, or count thereof, or order sustaining demurrer to contest, such orders are not appealable.

2. Wills 🔑358.

Judgment in will contest that contestant take nothing, based on order sustaining demurrer to contest, held not appealable, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3.

3. Courts 🔑488(1).

Where will contest was transferred from District Court of Appeals, under Const. art. 6, § 4, Supreme Court was not precluded from dismissing appeal, by denial of motion to dismiss by District Court of Appeals.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Application by Rosa Scott, executrix, for the probate of the will of George F. Stierlen, deceased. From a decree against contestant, Emma Stierlen, admitting the will to probate, she appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Charles F. Hanlon, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry K. Wolff and Geo. A. Connolly, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. [1] Motion to dismiss appeal. This is a contest for the probate of a document purporting to be the last will and testament of George F. Stierlen, deceased. The executrix and sole devisee named in said document, Rosa Scott, filed a petition asking for the probate thereof as the last will and testament of said deceased. The contestant, Emma Stierlen, the surviving wife of said deceased, filed a contest thereto. In her written contest, which she filed after a voluntary dismissal by her of a prior contest to said will, said contestant set forth in five separate counts five distinct grounds wherein she asserted the invalidity of said document: (1) Failure of execution; (2) unsoundness of mind; (3) undue influence; (4) actual fraud; (5) constructive fraud. The proponent of said will filed a motion to strike out the first count of said contest and a demurrer to the remaining four counts thereof. The court granted said motion and sustained said demurrer without leave to amend. A written order signed by the trial judge was made and filed, striking out said count 1. A written order was also signed and filed, sustaining said demurrer without leave to amend, and judgment was entered that the contestant take nothing by her contest and that proponent recover her costs. Respondent's motion to dismiss said appeal is based upon the ground that the order striking out count 1 of said contest and the order sustaining the demurrer to the last four counts thereof and the judgment following said order are not appealable orders. The judgment and orders in probate proceedings from which an appeal can be taken are set forth and enumerated in subdivision 3 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

> "The only appealable orders in probate matters are those designated in subdivision 3 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure." Estate of Edelman, 148 Cal. 233, 82 P. 962, 113 Am. St. Rep. 231.

Neither an order striking out a contest, or a count thereof, nor an order sustaining a demurrer to a contest, is one of the orders enumerated in said subdivision of said section, and consequently neither of them is an appealable order.

[2] Appellant further calls to our attention the fact that, while the probate court made the order sustaining the demurrer to the four last counts of the contest, it followed up said order with a judgment that contestant take nothing by said contest and that proponent recover her costs. But this fact does not in any way assist appellant upon this appeal, as a judgment based upon an order sustaining a demurrer to a contest to the probate of a will is in no better standing, in so far as its being an appealable order is concerned, that an order sustaining such a demurrer, as neither an order sustaining a demurrer nor a judgment entered thereafter and based thereon is listed among the appealable orders enumerated in subdivision 3 of said section 963. It is true that a somewhat different rule applies in ordinary civil actions; that is, after an order is made sustaining a demurrer, which is not an appealable order, is followed by a judgment dismissing the action upon plaintiff's failure to amend after demurrer sustained, an appeal can be taken from said judgment. This, however, is not the rule as to a judgment rendered in a probate proceeding dismissing a contest after the sustaining of a demurrer thereto. Estate of Rawson, 66 Cal. App. 144, 225 P. 474. Neither are the orders appealed from orders made after final judgment, for no final judgment admitting or refusing to admit the will to probate, as far as the record shows, has been made by the probate court. Upon the entry of an order admitting said will to probate an appeal therefrom would lie and in the consideration of said appeal the validity of the orders herein sought to be appealed from would be proper matters for review. Estate of Rawson, supra; Estate of Edelman, supra.

[3] It is contended by appellant that a motion to dismiss this appeal, having originally been made in the District Court of Appeal and denied by said court, has become final, and that it is not within the power of this court to review the same nor to entertain a motion made anew herein to dismiss said appeal. Respondent made said motion to dismiss this appeal in the District Court of Appeal and said court denied the same. No petition for a hearing of this cause has been made to this court by respondent. The appellant, however, filed a petition for a hearing herein, not for the reason that she was dissatisfied with the action of the District Court of Appeal in refusing to grant respondent's motion to dismiss, but for the reason that the ruling of the District Court of Appeal sustaining the action of the probate court in striking out the first count of her contest to the probate of said will was considered by her to have been erroneous.

The petition of appellant was granted and this court made an order transferring said cause to this court for hearing. This was done under the authority of section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, which provides as follows:

> "The Supreme Court shall have power * * * to order any cause pending before a District Court of Appeal to be heard and determined by the Supreme Court."
> "When such an order is made within the time prescribed in the Constitution, the decision of the District Court of Appeal is vacated and the matter is transferred to this court for a determination of all the material questions involved therein, to the same extent as if originally instituted in this court." Rockridge Place Co. v. City Council, 178 Cal. 58, 60, 172 P. 1110.

It follows, therefore, that this court is not limited in the action it may now take in the consideration of the motion presented upon this appeal by any decision or order made, or action taken, in this case while the same was pending in said District Court of Appeal. A motion to dismiss an appeal is one of the motions which may properly come before this court, and which this court may be called upon to determine, in any case originally appealed hereto. It therefore has the same right, and it is its duty, to entertain the motion made herein by respondent to dismiss said appeal in all respects as if said cause had never been before said District Court of Appeal.

It is ordered that said appeal be and the same is hereby dismissed.

DOWELL v. McLEES, County Clerk.

1. States ⚷27.

Mandatory duty of Legislature, under Const. art. 4, § 6, to adjust legislative districts after each United States census, can be exercised but once between one census and census following, and, until exercised, assemblymen are to be elected by districts as theretofore established.

2. States ⚷27.

Boundaries of assembly district formed within municipality held not changed by consolidation of municipalities under statute, or by annexation of unincorporated territory to municipality under statute (St. 1891, p. 71, St. 1913, p. 577, and St. 1913, p. 594, § 9).

Application by Edward H. Dowell for writ of mandate to be directed to J. B. McLees, County Clerk of the County of San Diego, to compel the printing of petitioner's name on the official ballot to be used in certain precincts as a candidate for member of the assembly for the Seventy-Ninth assembly district. Writ denied.

J. A. Isaacson and E. I. Kendall, both of San Diego, for petitioner.

Chester C. Kemply, Dist. Atty., of San Diego, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the county clerk of San Diego county to print the name of the petitioner as a candidate of the Republican party for the office of member of the assembly, Seventy-Ninth assembly district, upon the ballots to be used in voting precincts numbered 35 to 44, inclusive, 95 to 105, inclusive, and 27 to 34, inclusive within the city of San Diego, at the primary election to be held August 31, 1926.

In 1891 the Legislature divided the state into legislative districts as required by section 6 of article 4 of the Constitution (Stats. 1891, p. 71). The Seventy-Ninth assembly district was therein described as "all that portion of San Diego county situated within the corporate limits of the city of San Diego," and the Eightieth assembly district was described as "all that portion of San Diego county not included in the 79th assembly district." Since 1891 no change in the boundaries of said districts has been made, unless the same has been accomplished, as contended by the petitioner, by reason of the following facts:

On or about the 29th day of December, 1923, the cities of San Diego and East San Diego were consolidated under the provisions of an act to provide for the consolidation of municipal corporations. Stats. 1913, p. 577. By this consolidation proceeding, all of the territory within the former city of East San Diego, and now included within San Diego city precincts numbered 35 to 44, inclusive, and 95 to 105, inclusive, became a part of the city of San Diego.

On or about the 11th day of May, 1925, certain unincorporated territory known as Normal Heights was annexed to the city of San Diego pursuant to an act providing for the annexation of unincorporated territory to municipalities. Stats. 1913, p. 587. By this annexation proceeding all territory now within San Diego city precincts numbered 27 to 34, inclusive, became a part of the city of San Diego.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the petitioner that, by reason of the foregoing consolidation and annexation proceedings, the boundaries of the Seventy-Ninth assembly district were so changed as to include the territory comprising the present San Diego precincts above named. We perceive no merit in the contention. In fixing and readjusting the boundaries of assembly districts, the Legislature acts pursuant to the provisions of section 6 of article 4 of the Constitution. Under that section, which is mandatory and prohibitory, the power to form legislative districts can be exercised but once during the period between one United States census and the succeeding one (Wheeler v. Herbert, 152 Cal. 224, 92 P. 353), and by the terms of the section, until the legislative power is exercised as therein provided, assemblymen shall be elected by the districts as theretofore established.

In section 9 of the Annexation Act (Stats. 1913, p. 594), the Legislature was at pains to provide that "nothing in this act contained shall alter or affect the boundaries of any senatorial or assembly district." There is nothing in the act which purports to affect the boundaries of any senatorial or assembly district, and the terms of said section 9 must be held to mean that no proceedings taken under the act shall alter or affect the boundaries of such districts. The Consolidation Act of 1913 contains no similar provision, but such would be the law, even in the absence of a legislative declaration to that effect. We conclude, following the reasoning and conclusions in Wheeler v. Herbert, supra, that neither the consolidation nor the annexation proceedings referred to had the effect of changing the boundaries of said assembly districts.

The writ is denied.

ERNSER et al. v. WALCOTT et al.

(S. F. 11954.)

Municipal corporations 🔑197—Veteran, preferred on eligible list for fire department, held entitled to preference in appointment as long as list was effective, though preference period had expired (Charter of San Francisco, art. 13, § 22, as added by St. 1921, p. 1797).

Charter of San Francisco, art. 13, § 22, as added by St. 1921, p. 1797, providing that war veterans passing examination should be classified ahead of others on eligible list for fire department, such preference to expire in five years, held to give veteran placed on list within such period right to preference in appointment as long as such list was in force, though five-year period had expired.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Nicholas D. Ernser and others against Earle A. Walcott and others, as members of and constituting the Civil Service Commission of the City and County of San Francisco. Peremptory writ granted.

Grover O'Connor, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondents.

Leo A. Cunningham, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ, for Nonveterans.

WASTE, C. J. This application for a writ of mandate involves the question whether or not "veterans" (as defined in section 22 of article 13 of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco), whose names appear on the "current firemen's list" of persons eligible for appointment to positions in the fire department, shall be certified by the respondent civil service commission ahead of nonveterans on the same list.

Appointments to positions in the fire department are subject to the provisions of article 13 of the charter. At the general election held on the 2d of November, 1920, the people of San Francisco added a new provision to article 13, known as section 22. After defining the term "veteran" to mean "any person who has served in the army, the navy or the marine corps of the United States in time of war, or in any expedition of the armed forces of the United States, and received an honorable discharge or certificate of honorable active service," the section provides that the civil service commission "shall by rule establish preference for veterans as follows: In the case of entrance examinations to establish eligible lists in the police and fire departments, veterans who become eligible for appointment by attaining the passing mark established for the examination, and whose service as veterans exceeds three months, shall be classified on such eligible lists in the relative order of the individual ratings attained and ahead of all nonveterans passing such examinations, and shall be eligible for appointment on the basis of such order of standing on such eligible lists. This preference shall expire five years after the ratification of this amendment." Stats. 1921, p. 1797. This amendment became effective by approval of the Legislature on the 21st day of January, 1921.

For the purpose of complying with the charter amendment, the civil service commission in February, 1924, adopted a rule (rule 40, § 8), providing for preference for veterans attaining the passing mark in entrance examinations for firemen and policemen, which follows substantially the language of section 22 of article 13 of the charter, and providing the preference should expire at the close of January 13, 1926. Thereafter the commission held an examination for the position classified as fireman, and rated the standing of the persons participating. On the 9th day of December, 1924, it prepared a list of eligibles made up of all those who had participated in the examination, and whose average standing was not less than the minimum percentage fixed by the commission as the passing mark. It adopted a list of 593 firemen "arranged in the order of excellence of general average percentage as determined by the examination," regardless of whether the successful candidate was or was not a veteran. Nos. 1, 2, and 3 on the list were nonveterans. Nos. 4 and 5 were veterans. No. 6 was a nonveteran. The arrangement continued in that manner through the entire list of 593 successful candidates, each veteran being designated by a "V" before his number on the list. While this arrangement did not amount to a classification of veterans "ahead of all nonveterans passing such examination," it was provided in the resolution adopting the list that "war veterans [should] be preferred over all nonveterans for certification, such preference to be given to the veterans in the order of their standing upon [the] list."

From and after the date of the adoption of such eligible list, and to and until the 21st day of January, 1926, the commission, in response to requisitions made for the names of persons to fill the position of fireman, certified only the names of the veterans on the list and in the order of their standing, save and except where any of the veterans waived or refused to accept appointment, in which event the commission certified the veteran standing next highest on the list. All the veterans on the eligible list of firemen, whose ratings have been higher than the individual ratings attained by the four petitioners here, have either been certified to fill positions in the fire department or have waived or refused appointment to such positions; and the four petitioners are now the four highest veterans on the eligible list.

The fire department has now made four requisitions to the commission, which takes the position that the preference given to veterans on the eligible list, entitling them to appointment before nonveterans, expired on the 21st day of January last, and that it is now compelled by other provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, and by its own rules, to certify, in response to the requisitions, the highest eligibles on the current list, irrespective of whether such eligibles are veterans or nonveterans. Petitioners have therefore brought this action to compel the respondents to certify them, the four highest veterans on the eligible list, to the fire department for investigation and appointment.

The respondent commission takes the position that section 22 of article 13 of the charter merely granted a preference to veterans by way of a right to be classified as eligible for appointment ahead of nonveterans during a period of five years, which period having expired, the commission contends the veterans are no longer entitled to such preference. The petitioners admit that section 22 does not require or permit the civil service commission to give any preference to veterans in examinations given after the expiration of five years, but contend that, the commission having established an eligible list during the five-year period, such lists remains in full force for two years after its adoption, and that during such two-year period the commission must continue to certify eligibles in the order of their standing as determined when the list was adopted. Having been classified ahead of nonveterans when the list was made up, petitioners insist that they still occupy that favorable position, and that they and other veterans will continue to be entitled to certification, in answer to requisitions from the fire department during the full period of two years from the date of the present current firemen's list, sometime in December, 1924.

Considerable argument has been advanced by opposing counsel as to the correct grammatical construction to be given to the words and phrasing of section 22 of article 13 of the charter, and our attention has been directed to various rules of construction and procedure adopted by the respondent commission. We have read the section giving the "preference" to veterans in the light of its relation to other sections of article 13, which are as they were when section 22 was adopted. From the situation thus presented, regarded in the light of the reasons behind the adoption of the section, we are inclined to the view that it was the intention of the framers of the amendment to the charter to provide that for a period of five years, veterans who became eligible by examination for appointment in the fire department were entitled to be placed on a preferred list ahead of all nonveterans, to be certified as required by the demands of the department, within the effective period of such list, not exceeding the two-year period within which the civil service commission cannot remove the name of a candidate. See Mann v. Tracy, 185 Cal. 272, 278, 196 P. 484.

Our attention has been called to rule 40, § 8 of the civil service commission's rules, adopted February 19, 1924, which provides:

> "Veterans, with over three months' service, who attained the passing mark in entrance examinations for firemen and policemen, shall take rank on eligible lists in the order of their individual rating, and ahead of all nonveterans passing such examinations. This preference shall expire at the close of January 13th, 1926."

But we find nothing in the rule providing that appointments shall not be made after the five-year period, from the eligibles on the list created before that period expired. Petitioners have cited Cook v. Civil Service Commission, 160 Cal. 598, 600, 117 P. 662, in which it was held, citing section 10 of article 13 of the charter, that the commission cannot properly set aside its action after it has declared a list of eligibles, except that it may strike off the names of candidates after they have remained thereon more than two years. respondents and amicus curiæ argue that the case is not in point, for the reason that the commission is not in any way changing or altering its eligible list, but is merely acting in accord with a charter provision which has terminated a preference previously held by the veterans over nonveterans.

If all right to preference, both in the matter of being placed at the head of the eligible list and of being considered for certification for appointment ahead of nonveterans, ceased at the end of five years, we see no good reason why the commission should not, at the end of that time, disregard the preferential rating of veterans and thereafter certify veterans and nonveterans as it is now attempting to do. We are of the opinion, however, that when the preference created by section 22 in favor of veterans attached by reason of examination, rating, and listing ahead of nonveterans, during the five-year period, it carried with it the further right of certification, for appointment on requisition, for the full period during which the eligible list of the commission remains in force.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue, directing the respondents, as members of and constituting the civil service commission of the city and county of San Francisco, to certify to the board of fire commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, in response to the requisitions referred to in the petition herein, the names of these petitioners, respectively, according to the individual ratings attained by them on examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Friedrick Robert Gunther, also known as Robert Gunther, deceased. Petition by Leland Gunther Hewitt, by D. A. Mace, his guardian ad litem, against Charles P. Cutten, as executor, and others, for revocation of the probate of the will. Judgment for defendants, and contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Fletcher A. Cutler, of Palo Alto, for appellant.

H. C. Nelson, of Eureka, and James W. Henderson, of San Jose, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Humboldt refusing to revoke the probate of the last will and testament of Friedrick Robert Gunther, entered upon granting the motion for nonsuit upon the hearing of appellant's petition for the revocation of the probate of said will.

Friedrick Robert Gunther, also known as Robert Gunther, died on the 19th day of May, 1924, at the city of Eureka, county of Humboldt, of which city he was a resident for many years, and in which county and elsewhere he left property, both real and personal, of considerable value. He left a last will and testament which had been executed by him on August 25, 1923, which was in due course admitted to probate in said court on the 19th day of June, 1924. Thereafter, and on July 31, 1924, Leland Gunther Hewitt, a minor, then of the age of 19 years, appearing by his guardian ad litem, filed his petition in said court for the revocation of said will, alleging that the decedent was unmarried during his life, and at the time of his death left surviving him as his only relative and heir at law the said minor, who was the son of a daughter of a brother of said deceased. Two grounds of contest were urged by said petitioner for the revocation of said will; the first being that said decedent was not at the time of the execution of his said will of sound mind, and was not competent to make a will; second, that at the time said decedent executed his said last will and testament he was laboring under a certain insane delusion with respect to said petitioner, and that as a result thereof he had made no provision for said petitioner in said will, but, on the contrary, had expressly refrained from so doing. The executor of said will, Charles P. Cutten, and two legatees named therein, E. L. French and Mrs. W. H. Mathews, appeared separately, although by the same counsel, and by their respective answers put in issue the averments of said petition with relation to the deceased's unsoundness of mind and of the existence of the alleged insane delusion at the time of the execution of said will. The issues thus presented came on for trial, and were heard before said court, on the 8th day of June, 1925; the said hearing occupying several days. At the conclusion of the petitioner's case, the respondent made a motion for nonsuit upon each of the said grounds of contest, based upon the insufficiency of the proof offered by the petitioner in support thereof. The court granted said motion, and thereupon entered its judgment, refusing to revoke the probate of said will. The petitioner moved for a new trial, and upon the denial thereof has taken and prosecutes this appeal.

The sole questions presented upon this appeal relate to the sufficiency of the evidence offered on behalf of said petitioner as presenting a sufficient case to go to the jury. Upon the issue of the alleged unsoundness of mind of said decedent, the petitioner presented three witnesses; namely, A. Hanney, Mrs. Edith Rochat, and the petitioner, Leland G. Hewitt. The witness A. Hanney testified that he had known the decedent from the year 1920 up to the time of his death; that he had seen him nearly every day while he was living in a cabin which he had rented from said decedent, up to July, 1921, when the deceased had gone to San Francisco, where he remained for 3 or 4 months, after which he had gone to live with Mr. French in Eureka. The witness saw him there once a month when he went to pay his rent; seeing him about as frequently after the deceased had gone to live at the home of Mrs. Edith Rochat in the summer of 1923. The witness did not see the testator at all during the months of August, September, October, or November, 1923, but saw him at intervals after that time when he went to pay his rent to him up to a month before he died. The evidence of this witness shows that the deceased during the time he knew him had gradually become physically weakened with his advancing years, and that he had a number of physical ailments which not infrequently accompany old age, and that upon certain specific occasions, of which the witness gave details, he had displayed a certain forgetfulness and lack of memory, but that upon other occasions, both before and after these specific instances, the mind of the decedent had been clear and his memory good, and that the witness, in the capacity of the tenant of the deceased, had continued to transact business with the latter both before and after the date of the execution of his will, and up to within a month of the time of his death. This witness did not see the testator during the period preceding the date of the execution of his will for several weeks and after the execution for more than 3 months, and his testimony, with the exception of that portion therof which deals with the physical condition of the decedent and with his occasional lapses of memory, sheds no light whatever upon the capacity of the decedent to make and execute his will on August 25, 1923, or as to his soundness of mind at and for a considerable period before and after said date.

As to the testimony of the contestant, Leland Gunther Hewitt, it may be dismissed as to the first ground of contest with the statement that he had not seen the testator at all since July, 1922, when he paid him a brief visit, during which the testator talked rationally to him, and readily remembered a former visit which he had paid him during earlier months in the same year. His testimony, therefore, could cast no light upon the capacity of the testator to make or execute his will at the date thereof in August, 1923.

The remaining witness offered by the contestant was Mrs. Edith Rochat, who testified that she had not known the deceased prior to August 3, 1923, when he was brought to her house by Mr. French, and when arrangements were consummated by which he made his home with her thereafter up to the time of his death. This witness testified to the weakness and rather distressed physical condition of the deceased when he first came to live with her, and also testified to her treatment of his disorders, and to the fact that his physical system responded to her treatment in so far as it was possible, considering his advanced years. This witness gave testimony in considerable detail, both upon direct and cross-examination, with relation to the decedent's physical infirmities, and also with relation to his mental habitudes; but, aside from this, she gave no evidence whatever which could be of any possible aid to the contestant in so far as it related to the decedent's mental capacity during the period of his residence with her, and particularly during the period preceding, including, and succeeding the time of the making and execution of his said will. On the contrary, this witness, upon her cross-examination, went fully and in detail into the precise circumstances attending the execution of said will and particularly embracing his direction to the attorney who prepared said will with respect to the condition of his properties and with relation to his intended disposition thereof. Upon these subjects this witness offered the most positive evidence as to the soundness of the decedent's mind as to this perfect knowledge of the state of his business affairs and as to his thorough understanding and explicit directions as to the objects of his bounty and contents of his will. The foregoing was the state of the evidence as to his first alleged ground of contest when the contestant closed his case.

As to the second alleged ground of contest, namely, the alleged insane delusion of the testator with relation to the contestant as reflected in the terms of his said will, it appears therefrom that the testator in his said will assigned as his reason for making no provision for the contestant in his said will the following:

> "Seventh. My closest relative is Leland Gunther Hewitt, who is a son of Martha Gunther Hewitt. I have purposely made no provision for him in this will for the reason that I have heretofore given property to him of which he has made bad use. Because of the manner in which he handled this property it is my belief that anything which I might give him by this will would be used unwisely, and it is my desire and intention, so far as I am able to do so, to leave my property to persons who will care for the same and make good use of it. It is for that reason that I have made no provision for Leland Gunther Hewitt by this will."

It is asserted by the petitioner as his second ground of contest that the foregoing statements of the testator in his said will were entirely untrue, and amounted to an insane delusion on his part with relation to the same and to the contestant. In support of this ground of contest, the contestant became his own witness, and undertook to testify upon his direct examination that the relation between himself and the testator had been at all times friendly; that the testator had never at any time given him any property other than that of certain occasional presents of money, and that he had never handled any property which he had received from said decedent unwisely. Upon the cross-examination of said contestant the facts were brought out, however, that at one time, when the contestant was quite young, the testator had deeded some property to the father of the contestant in trust for him, and that the taxes on this property had been allowed to go delinquent, and that it had been sold for such delinquent taxes, and that later a bank had obtained a judgment against the contestant and his father upon a note signed by both, and that the property had been sold upon execution. It is true that the contestant testified that he had never heard of the deed from the decedent to his father in trust for him or of the sale of said property for delinquent taxes or upon such execution. But it nowhere appears from his evidence or from that proffered on his behalf that the foregoing facts had not been brought to the attention of the testator prior to the time when he executed his said will and when he embraced therein his foregoing statement as to his reason for making no provision for the contestant therein.

[1, 2] With respect to the law of the case, it may be said as to the appellant's first ground of contest that the evidence, when viewed in the light of the authorities, must be held entirely insufficient to justify the trial court in sending that branch of the case to the jury. The recent decisions of this court in cases quite similar to the instant case, in so far as they relate to the physical condition and soundness of mind of aged testators, leave no doubt as to the correctness of the ruling of the trial court in granting the motion for nonsuit herein. The requirement, as clearly stated in these decisions, that the presumption that a person is of sound mind, and that the burden is always upon the contestant of the will of such person to show affirmatively that the testator was of unsound mind at the time of the execution of his said will, has been wholly unsatisfied by the evidence offered by the contestant in the instant case, for, while it does appear that the testator was old and feeble physically, and that he was suffering from many of the infirmities of old age, and was approaching the term of his life at the time of the making of his will, the evidence wholly fails to show that with respect to his mental condition before and at the time of and after the date of the execution of said will he was not in a mental condition to fully understand the condition of his properties and the nature and consequences of his act. The cases above referred to are: Estate of Dole, 147 Cal. 188, 81 P. 534; Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932; Estate of Dow, 181 Cal. 106, 183 P. 794; Estate of Casarott, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085; Estate of Perkins (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 45.

[3, 4] With respect to the alleged insane delusion of the testator and of the law applicable thereto, it may be said that, while it may be conceded that the testator was not altogether justified in the opinion as expressed in his said will that the contestant had received and had not made proper use of properties which had theretofore been given him by the testator, it cannot be said that his mistaken understanding, if it be such, upon that subject amounted to an insane delusion, since it appears from the evidence that there was some basis of fact underlying the testator's belief upon that subject. An insane delusion is not only one which is error, but one in favor of the truth of which there is not only no evidence, but regarding which there is the clearest evidence to the contrary. It is a delusion or conception which springs up spontaneously in the mind of a testator, and is not the result of his belief or knowledge of any fact which would in reason or in probability furnish evidence in its support. The law upon this subject has been very fully and ably set forth in Estate of Scott, 128 Cal. 57, 60 P. 527; Estate of Allen, 177 Cal. 668, 171 P. 686; Estate of Russell, 189 Cal. 759, 210 P. 249; Estate of Perkins (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 45; Estate of Shay (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 1079, and cases cited. It follows from these authorities as applied to the facts of this case that the contestant herein furnished no sufficient evidence of an insane delusion on the part of said testator as would have served to justify the trial court in denying the respondent's motion for a nonsuit upon that ground also.

It follows that the judgment herein must be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

> "3. I hereby direct that all of the estate of which I may die seized or possessed be sold as soon as possible after my death. The proceeds of said sale I hereby devise and bequeath as follows: (1) One-third (⅓) thereof to Rev. Patrick Mulligan of St. Joseph's Church, San Francisco, California, to do with as he sees fit."

Then follows a bequest of $500 to Jessie Weigmore, a second bequest of $500 to Rev. Patrick Mulligan "for masses for the repose of my soul and the souls of the members of my family," a bequest of $300 to Abbie Bone, and finally all the rest and residue of the estate to Maud Junkins, whom the testatrix appointed executrix of her will. At the time of her death the estate consisted of the sum of $20 in money and a parcel of improved real property situated in the city and county of San Francisco, which was subject to a mortgage given to secure the payment of a promissory note for $2,100. During the administration of the estate the executrix, prior to the sale of said real property, collected $869.50 in rents therefrom. The real property was sold by said executrix for $9,000, and after deducting the amount of the mortgage the estate received therefrom the sum of $6,900. The total amount of money, therefore, which came into the hands of said executrix, was the sum of $7,789.50. The debts of said deceased and the expenses of administration amounted to $1,814.12, which, deducted from the total amount of money received by said executrix, left for distribution the sum of $5,975.38. This amount was distributed by the probate court as follows:

To Rev. Patrick Mulligan....................	$3,000 00
To Mrs. Jessie Weigmore....................	500 00
To Rev. Patrick Mulligan for masses for the repose of the soul of said deceased and for the repose of the souls of the members of her family	500 00
To Abbie Bone..................................	300 00
To Maud Jenkins, the remainder............	1,675 38
Total	$5,975 38

said property was the amount of its selling price less the amount of the mortgage then a lien upon said property. The amount due on the mortgage in all probability and, if the usual practice governing transactions of this nature were followed in making said sale, never actually came into the hands of the executrix, but was paid over to the mortgagee at the time of the sale, and only the net proceeds of said sale was received by the executrix, in which event only the amount actually received by the estate could be considered as the proceeds of the sale. But had the full purchase price of said real property actually been paid to said executrix and had she thereupon paid to the mortgagee from said proceeds the amount of the mortgage, the result thereof would have been the same. The proceeds of said sale would have been the amount remaining in the hands of the executrix from the selling price of said real property after the payment of said mortgage lien thereon. No purchaser of said real property would have paid to the executrix the full purchase price which he was paying for said property until said mortgage debt had been paid and said mortgage satisfied and discharged. We are satisfied that it was not the intention of said testatrix to give to Rev. Patrick Mulligan one-third of the gross proceeds of said sale.

The next question that presents itself is: Did the testatrix by the above provision of her will intend to bequeath to Rev. Patrick Mulligan one-third of the proceeds of that portion of the property of her estate as might be sold and converted into money, or did she intend that he should receive one-third of her estate after the payment of all just claims against it? That the testatrix had in mind her whole estate is apparent from the wording of this paragraph of her will. She directs her executrix to sell all of the estate of which she died seized or possessed as soon as possible after her death. She then proceeds to dispose of the proceeds of said sale, evidently dealing with said proceeds as her entire estate. She bequeaths one-third thereof to Rev. Patrick Mulligan and the remainder to others of her acquaintance. She makes no mention of her debts or of expenses of administration. It must be presumed, however, that she knew she had certain debts and that there would be expenses incurred in the settlement of her estate. It must also be assumed that she knew that these must be paid before any of such proceeds of said sale or any of her estate could be distributed to her legatees. It is apparent, therefore, that in the making of the said bequests she did so with the knowledge that it would be necessary for her executrix to pay the debts of the estate and the expenses of administration before her legatees could be paid the respective sums of money bequeathed to them, and that her intention was that such bequests would become effective only as to the amount of her estate remaining in the hands of her executrix after the payment of all just and legal claims against the same. That under a proper construction of said will, Rev. Patrick Mulligan would receive one-third of the estate of said deceased and not one-third of the proceeds of the sale of the property thereof, we think, might be more apparent if we consider its provisions in the connection with a slightly different set of facts. Let us suppose that said testatrix had sold said real property herself prior to her death and had collected the purchase price thereof, and that all of the estate coming into the hands of said executrix consisted of money. Could it reasonably be claimed that because there was no property to be sold by said executrix, and consequently she received no proceeds from any sale made by her, that the bequest to Rev. Patrick Mulligan would fail entirely? We think not. On the other hand, we believe that under such a set of facts it would be most reasonable to hold that it was the intention of said testatrix, by the above provisions of her will, that Rev. Patrick Mulligan should receive one-third of the estate left by her rather than to limit him to one-third of the proceeds of the sale of property, and as there was no property to be sold, to deny him any right to participate in the distribution of said estate. We will also suppose another set of facts. Instead of there being only $20 in money left by testatrix, suppose that there had been $10,000 in money left by her. Could it be seriously contended in such a case that the bequest to Rev. Patrick Mulligan was limited simply to the proceeds of the property of the estate which might be sold and that he was not to participate to any extent in the money left by said deceased? We think not. The provision of said will that all the property of the estate of said deceased be sold, and that one-third of the proceeds of said sale be given to Rev. Patrick Mulligan, would, in our opinion, have carried with it one-third of all her estate, notwithstanding the fact that a portion thereof was money which had come into the hands of said executrix from sources other than through a sale of property belonging to her said estate. In other words, we think it was the clear intention of said testatrix to bequeath to Rev. Patrick Mulligan one-third of her estate rather than one-third of the proceeds of the sale of the property of said estate. By one-third of the estate, we, of course, mean one-third of the residue remaining in the hands of said executrix after the payment of the debts of said deceased and the expenses of administration.

Under this construction of the above paragraph of the last will and testament of said deceased, the question of whether the bequest to Rev. Patrick Mulligan was a specific bequest or not becomes immaterial. If the bequest to him, as we have so held, was one-third of the estate of said deceased, then all he would be entitled to under the will would be one-third of the money belonging to the estate after the payments of the debts and expenses of administration. By the terms of the decree of distribution there was distributed to him an excess of said amount, and to this extent said decree is erroneous.

For this reason said decree is reversed, with direction to the trial court to enter an order and decree of distribution in accordance with the views herein expressed.

In re KING'S ESTATE.

PRITCHARD v. KING.

(S. F. 11556.)

1. Executors and administrators ⚷314(3)—Application filed in probate court, asserting right to decedent's entire estate as surviving partner, held to require no action by administratrix before petitioning for distribution.

Application filed in probate court, wherein decedent's alleged partner asserted that entire estate was partnership property, to which she was entitled, and demanded delivery, held not a creditor's "claim," since right asserted was that of stranger to estate, and administratrix' failure to act thereon did not impede right to petition for distribution when estate was otherwise in condition.

2. Executors and administrators ⚷435—Probate court lacks jurisdiction to determine claims to estate in course of administration asserted by stranger to estate.

Probate court has no jurisdiction to determine adverse claims to properties of an estate in course of administration before it when asserted by stranger to estate.

3. Executors and administrators ⚷314(11)—Applicant held not entitled to have claim to decedent's entire estate as his surviving partner determined on administratrix' petition for distribution and prior to distribution (Code Civ. Proc. § 1664).

Alleged surviving partner held not entitled to present and have determined her claim to entire estate of decedent, on ground that it was partnership property, on administratrix' petition for distribution and prior to distribution thereof, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, since she was an adverse claimant.

4. Executors and administrators ⚷314(3)—Provision for petition to court to declare to whom distribution should be made, held applicable to right claimed in privity with estate (Code Civ. Proc. § 1664).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, providing that any one claiming to be entitled to distribution of an estate may petition court to declare rights of all persons and to whom distribution should be made, held applicable only to determination of rights claimed in privity with the estate.

5. Executors and administrators ⚷314(3)—Adverse claimant to estate, not instituting action to determine claim prior to time for distribution of estate, held not entitled to have distribution delayed.

Alleged surviving partner of deceased held not entitled on application therefor, made on day set for hearing on petition for distribution, to have distribution delayed until she might litigate asserted right to receive entire assets, since prior thereto she should have instituted action in proper court to determine claim.

6. Executors and administrators ⚷314(3).

Distribution cannot be delayed to await determination of prospective litigation by adverse claimants when estate is otherwise ready for distribution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George E. Samuels, Judge.

Petition by Hazel Hubbard King, as administratrix of estate of Fred G. King, for distribution. From a decree directing final distribution, Sadie E. Pritchard, claimant, appeals. Affirmed.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, and Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Clark Sargent, of San Francisco (Charles J. Heggerty, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a decree of distribution made and entered in the above-named estate. The appeal is taken by one Sadie E. Pritchard, who claims to be a surviving partner of the decedent, and who sought to assert her right as such in the course of the proceedings in the probate court for the administration of said estate, and by seeking to have set aside to her therein and upon the distribution thereof the entire property of said estate. The following are the facts of the case as disclosed by the record upon appeal: Fred G. King died on December 11, 1920, and letters of administration upon his estate were thereafter and in due course issued to his surviving widow on January 4, 1921. Notice to creditors was thereafter duly published and a decree establishing due notice to creditors entered on December 7, 1921. On May 2, 1921, the appellant presented and filed in the probate court a document entitled "Notice of sale surviving partner," wherein the appellant proceeded to set forth that she was, between the years 1891 and 1920 and up to the date of the death of said decedent, his equal partner in all his various deals and business enterprises, and that all of his estate was partnership property, and that she was entitled to have the possession of all of said property delivered to her as such partner by the administratrix of said estate, and she thereby demanded such delivery and an accounting as to the business of said partnership. The administratrix apparently took no action with reference to the claim and demand of the appellant as set forth in said document; nor did the appellant, so far as this record discloses, take any further action thereon until the time arrived for the final distribution of said estate and until the administratrix, in September, 1924, presented her final account and petitioned for such distribution. Notice of the hearing upon said last-named petition having been duly given, the appellant herein again appeared and filed another document, wherein she again asserted and set forth substantially the same facts with regard to her partnership relation to said decedent and her right as such partner to the whole of the property of said estate as the assets of such partnership, and prayed that the said court "ascertain and declare the rights of your petitioner and all persons to said estate and all their interests therein and to whom distribution thereof should be made and make a distribution thereof accordingly." The hearing upon the petition for distribution of said estate came on regularly before said court on the 5th day of November, 1924, and on said date and at the time of said hearing the appellant again appeared and filed another document entitled "Protest to the distribution and final account," wherein she again reasserted and repeated her previous averments with relation to said partnership and to the properties of said estate, and objected to the distribution of said estate to the heirs of said decedent as prayed for in the petition for distribution, and added thereto a prayer that the distribution of the estate be held in abeyance until such time as would enable her to establish her contention with relation to the properties of said estate. The probate court apparently disregarded each and all of these several petitions and protests on the part of said appellant and proceeded to make and enter its decree of distribution of said estate to the widow of said decedent and to his son and daughter, who were shown to be his heirs. This appeal is from said decree of distribution.

The appellant makes three contentions upon this appeal: First, that she was entitled to have her first application filed herein acted upon by the administratrix as a "claim" against said estate, and that, in the absence of such action upon her said "claim," said estate was not in condition for distribution at the time of the making and entry of the decree therefor, from which this appeal is taken; second, that the appellant was entitled to have her said claim to the properties of said estate as the surviving partner of said decedent considered and determined under the provisions of section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure and prior to the distribution of said estate; third, that the appellant was entitled to have the distribution of said estate delayed in accordance with her prayer therefor until such time as she could have litigated and determined her claim to the properties of said estate as the surviving partner of said decedent.

[1, 2] With respect to the first of these contentions, we find it to be without merit. An examination of the document first presented by the appellant herein in the course of the administration of said estate discloses that it is in no sense a creditor's claim against said estate, since the sole right which the appellant asserted therein was that of a hostile claimant to the whole of the properties of said estate as the surviving partner of the decedent, King. She thus placed herself in the position of a stranger to said estate, seeking to have her claim to the ownership of the whole of the properties of said decedent litigated and determined in the probate court and in the course of the administration of said estate. That the probate court has no jurisdiction to determine adverse claims to the properties of an estate in course of administration before it when asserted by a stranger to said estate has been fully determined in numerous decisions by this court. Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 P. 724; Barnard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 512, 16 P. 307; Estate of Ryder, 141 Cal. 366, 74 P. 993; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 P. 981. This being so, the administratrix of said estate had cast upon her no duty to take any action whatever upon the asserted right of the appellant to have delivered over to her the properties of said estate, and it follows that her failure to take such action in no way impeded the right of said administratrix when said estate was otherwise in a condition for distribution to present her petition for the distribution thereof.

[3, 4] With regard to the second contention of the appellant herein, that upon the presentation of said petition for distribution she was entitled to present and have determined her aforesaid claim to the ownership and possession of the entire properties of said estate, under the provisions of section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we are of the opinion that this contention has also no merit. It is true that section 1664 of said Code provides that any person claiming to be an heir of the deceased or entitled to distribution in whole or in any part of an estate in course of administration may file a petition "praying the court to ascertain and declare the rights of all persons to said estate and all interests therein and to whom distribution thereof should be made," and that such persons may set forth therein "their respective claims of heirship, ownership or interest in said estate"; and that after notice given as provided in said section the court shall "acquire jurisdiction to ascertain and determine the heirship, ownership and interest of all parties in and to the property of said deceased, and such determination shall be final and conclusive in the administration of said estate and the title and ownership of said property." The foregoing provisions of said section, however, and the proceedings which are referred to therein for the determination of the issues provided for in said section, have been uniformly held by this court to have application only to the determination of rights claimed in privity with said estate and to have no application to the rights or titles of persons claiming adversely thereto. In re Burton, 93 Cal. 459, 29 P. 36; In re Blythe, 112 Cal. 689, 45 P. 6; McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 55, 53 P. 421; More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 65 P. 1044, 66 P. 76; Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 360, 125 P. 904, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1319.

[5, 6] With respect to the third and final contention of the appellant herein to the effect that she was entitled upon her application therefor, made upon the day set for the hearing upon the petition for distribution, to have the distribution of said estate delayed until such time as she might require to have litigated and determined her adverse claim as surviving partner of said decedent, we find no semblance of merit in said contention. If said appellant had or has any right as surviving partner of said decedent to receive and administer the properties of said estate as the assets of said alleged partnership, it was clearly her duty long prior to the time for the proper distribution of said estate to have instituted an action in a court of law or equity for the determination of her said claims, and doubtless upon the institution of such action and upon a proper showing made therein she would have been accorded the right to have the distribution of the properties of the estate of her deceased partner reasonably delayed in order that her aforesaid claims might in a proper forum be determined. The appellant, however, herein has made no showing of this sort, and it has been fully determined that the distribution of estates cannot be delayed in order to await the determination of prospective litigation by adverse claimants to the properties or any portion thereof of an estate when the same is otherwise ready for distribution. Estate of Ross, 180 Cal. 643, 182 P. 755.

The decree appealed from is affirmed.

1. Elections 🔑181—Right of voting for person whose name is not printed on ballot held limited to writing name in blank space provided therefor (Pol. Code, §§ 1196, 1197, 1203–1206, 4480, and section 1211, subd. 1).

Under provisions relating to voter's privilege of voting for person whose name is not printed on the ballot, Pol. Code, §§ 1196, 1197, 1203–1206, and section 1211, subd. 1, when construed together pursuant to section 4480, the privilege is limited to writing the name in the blank space provided for the purpose.

2. Elections 🔑180(1)—Legal requirements prescribing manner of voting must be complied with, though voter's intention may be determined (Direct Primary Law, § 18).

Where statutes prescribe manner of voting, such requirements must be complied with, notwithstanding provision in Direct Primary Law, § 18, that no ballot shall be rejected for technical error not rendering it impossible to determine voter's choice.

3. Elections 🔑182—Vote evidenced by sticker held not validated by provision that an unauthorized mark shall not invalidate ballot unless for identification (Pol. Code, § 1211, subd. 4).

Pol. Code, § 1211, subd. 4, providing that no unauthorized mark upon a ballot shall invalidate such ballot unless placed thereon for purpose of identifying ballot, does not validate vote indicated by use of sticker, though not used as means of identification.

4. Elections 🔑182—Use of stickers held not "writing" in of name, and was unauthorized and illegal (Pol. Code, §§ 16, 17, 1196, 1197, 1203–1206, and 1211, subd. 1).

Use of stickers on which was printed name of person whose name was not on printed ballot, and which were pasted on ballot by voters, held unauthorized, under Pol. Code, §§ 1196, 1197, 1203–1206, and 1211, subd. 1, requiring "writing" in of name, notwithstanding sections 16 and 17, providing that "writing includes printing."

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action contesting election by J. B. McFarland, contestant, against Gus Spengler, contestee. Judgment for contestant, and contestee appeals. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich and Dorsey & Campbell, all of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Alfred Siemon, Paul F. Garber, and Claflin & Lambert, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an election contest. In 1924 J. B. McFarland, the contestant and respondent, and Gus Spengler, the contestee and appellant, were rival candidates for the office of member of the board of supervisors of Kern county. At the primary election in August, McFarland received the greater number of votes. By reason thereof he won and Spengler lost the right to have his name printed on the official ballot to be used at the general election in November (Stats. 1921, p. 1218). Spengler, however, continued to be a candidate for the same office at the general election. He organized and carried on what is called a "sticker" campaign. He caused slips of paper to be prepared, on one side of which his name was printed in the same sized type used in printing the names of candidates on the ballot, and on the other side of which was mucilage, to enable the voter to paste the slip upon the official ballot. These stickers were circulated among the electors, with the request that they be used at the general election by pasting the same on the official ballot in such way that they would cover the blank space left upon the ballot to permit electors to write in the name of a person other than McFarland for whom they might desire to vote for that office. It developed as a result of the campaign that 701 sticker ballots were cast for Spengler, which, when counted with other ballots on which the name of Spengler was written in the usual way, gave Spengler a majority of 90 votes. Without counting the sticker votes McFarland received a majority. On the contest, the trial court rejected the 701 sticker votes and declared McFarland elected. From a judgment to that effect Spengler has appealed. The only question for determination on the appeal is whether the use of stickers, employed as above indicated, is authorized by the laws of this state.

Prior to 1891 there appears to have been no lawful authorization for writing in the name of a person not found upon the ballot. In that year, section 1196 of the Political Code was amended so as to provide for blank spaces on the ballot, and further providing:

> "Nothing in this Code contained shall prevent any voter from writing upon his ballot the name of any person for whom he desires to vote for any office, and such vote shall be counted the same as if printed upon the ballot, and marked as voted." Stats. 1891, p. 170.

Thereafter, other sections of the Code were amended so as to conform to the same plan. In 1903, section 1197, providing the form of the ballot and the instructions to voters, was amended so as to require the ballot to contain in the instructions to voters the following: "To vote for a person not on the ballot, write the name of such person, under the title of the office, in the blank column" provided for that purpose. Stats. 1903, p. 147. Prior to 1919, section 1203 imposed upon the election officers the duty to see that the stamps and ink pads were in the voting booths and in condition for proper use. In 1919 that section was amended so as to provide that no "supplies or conveniences shall be furnished other than the ink pads and stamps by which a cross (X) may be made as herein provided for," and a provision was inserted that "nothing herein contained shall prevent an elector from using a pencil for the purpose of writing in on the ballot the name of any candidate for whom he desires to vote." Stats. 1919, p. 320. Section 1204, in order to prevent voters from marking their ballots contrary to law, provides that it shall be the duty of an election officer, at the time the ballot is delivered to the voter, to state to him, orally and distinctly, so that it may be heard by the bystanders, "that he must mark the ballot with the stamp provided by law or it will not be counted." Stats. 1913, p. 1169. Section 1205 provides how the voter shall prepare his ballot. It is there stated that the elector may also "vote for a candidate or person whose name is not printed on the ballot by writing a name for such office in the blank space left therefor," in which case the vote "shall be counted for the person whose name is so written." Section 1206 also provides that boards of election shall not furnish for use in the voting booth "any other or additional means or method by which a ballot may be marked than the ink pads and rubber stamps," and contains the proviso that "nothing herein contained shall prevent an elector from using a pencil for the purpose of writing in on the ballot the name of any candidate for whom he desires to vote." Stats. 1919, p. 320. Subdivision 1 of section 1211 provides that "any ballot which is not marked by the elector as provided by law shall be void," and "any name written upon a ballot shall be counted for such name for the office under which it is written; provided it is written in the blank space therefor, whether or not a cross (X) is stamped, or made with pen or pencil, in the voting square after the name so written." In quoting from the Code sections, italics have been supplied.

[1] The foregoing provisions of the Political Code relate to the same subject, and must be read together. Pol. Code, § 4480. They relate to the voter's privilege of voting for a candidate or person whose name is not printed on the ballot, and, when read together and compared, they qualify the right to vote for such a candidate or person by prescribing the method, which is by writing the name in the blank space provided for that purpose. The use of the words "writing" and "writing in" and "written" as applied to voting for a person whose name is not on the official ballot, is a clear evidence of intention on the part of the Legislature to exclude other methods not specifically authorized. It has been held, and may well be said to be the general rule, that:

> "If a statute so provides, but not otherwise, the electors may use printed pasters for the insertion of names not upon the ballot instead of writing them in the space reserved for their reception." 15 Cyc. 356, and cases cited.

Whether the laws of this state authorize the use of stickers has not been directly presented or passed upon by this court, but sufficient attention has been called to the subject to indicate that, if the Legislature intended that stickers were to be used, they should be specially authorized by statute. Section 1204 as adopted in 1872 contained the provision that, if upon any ballot a name had been erased and another substituted therefor in any other manner than by the use of a lead pencil or common writing ink, the substituted name must be rejected. Concerning this provision, the Code commission said:

> "This section is intended to prevent the use of nitrate of silver, or any other chemical substance which may be written over a name and not be distinguishable until time brings out the impression; also to prevent the use of pasters, the use of which is subject to two objections: First, their liability to come off; second, their liability to be fraudulently taken off." Pol. Code, Annotated, 1874 (1st Ed.) vol. 1, p. 282.

This note of the Code commission was favorably commented upon in Rutledge v. Crawford, 91 Cal. 526, 27 P. 779, 13 L. R. A. 761, 25 Am. St. Rep. 212. In Russell v. McDowell, 83 Cal. 70, 23 P. 183, the court was considering the validity of certain ballots upon which the name of a candidate for sheriff had been printed without authority. In the course of the opinion the court said:

> "The general object of the law was, of course, to give effect to the real intention of the voter—to secure the counting of his ballot in favor of the candidates of his choice—and it contained many specific provisions to that end. But the general rule for ascertaining the intention of the voter was to read his ballot as printed or written, and be guided by that. To this rule there were no exceptions, save those expressly provided for. One of these, contained in section 1204 of the Political Code, related to pasters—a fraud of the same kind, though clumsier and more easily detected than spurious tickets. It is surprising that the Legislature did not from the beginning deal with names fraudulently printed on tickets exactly as it dealt with names fraudulently pasted on tickets."

And it has been held that the provisions of section 1205 as to the manner of voting are mandatory. Sweetser v. Pacheco, 172 Cal. 137, 155 P. 639.

The foregoing comment of the Code commission to the effect that section 1204 was intended to prevent the use of pasters and the comments of this court in the cases above cited to the same effect have been a part of the legislative and judicial history of the state for over 40 years. Such being the case, it is significant that the Legislature has not so amended the election laws as to specifically authorize the use of stickers if it was intended that they should be used. In the absence of a change in the law so as to authorize them, we conclude that it was never the intention of the Legislature to permit that method of voting.

[2] Appellant attempts to justify the use of stickers by reference to the rule laid down in section 18 of the Direct Primary Law that:

> "No ballot shall be rejected for any technical error which does not render it impossible to determine the voter's choice." Stats. 1911, p. 785.

In Castagnetto v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 673, 209 P. 548, relied upon by the appellant, it was held that a primary election ballot marked with a pencil cross was not invalid under said section. But special attention was called in that case to the fact that the general election law did not permit such a marking of the ballot and that the provisions of said section 1205 were mandatory. Assuming, however, that a general election ballot marked with a pencil cross would be valid, it would not follow that the pasting of a paper on the ballot would satisfy the statutory requirement that the name be written on the ballot by the voter. True, the intention of the voter must be ascertained, but it is not enough to find out generally the voter's intention. Such intention must be expressed in the manner prescribed by law. People v. Town of Sausalito, 106 Cal. 500, 39 P. 937. When the method of expressing the voter's intention is prescribed by authority of law, such method becomes a matter of substance. 10 Cal. Jur. 78, and cases cited. In other words, the right to express one's choice of a candidate at the polls is not unrestricted. It is subject to reasonable regulation in the interest of secrecy and uniformity of the ballot and the fairness of the vote, etc. Spier v. Baker, 120 Cal. 370, 52 P. 659, 41 L. R. A. 196.

> "It appears to be the universal rule in all states which have adopted the so-called Australian system, as said by the Supreme Court of Iowa in Whittam v. Zahorik, 91 Iowa, 23, 59 N. W. 57, 51 Am. St. Rep. 317, 'whether a ballot should be counted does not depend solely upon the power to ascertain and declare the choice of the voter, but also upon the expression of that choice in the manner provided by the statute.' To put it in another way, as was said in Vallier v. Brakke, 7 S. D. at page 354, 64 N. W. at page 184: 'The statute having prescribed the manner in which the elector may designate by marks upon his ballot the candidate for whom he intends to vote, and declared the effect of such marks, neither the judges of election nor the courts are authorized to go beyond those marks in order to ascertain the voter's intention.'" Pleasant Grove U. S. Dis. v. Algeo, 61 Cal. App. 660, 215 P. 726.

See, also, Covina Union High School Dis. v. McClellan, 67 Cal. App. 640, 228 P. 409.

[3] Subdivision 4 of section 1211 provides:

> "No mark upon a ballot which is unauthorized by this act shall be held to invalidate such ballot, unless it shall appear that such mark was placed thereon by the voter for the purpose of identifying such ballot."

The appellant contends that this Code provision is full justification for holding the sticker votes valid and counting them in his favor. It may be assumed that the stickers were not placed on the ballots by the voters for the purpose of identifying the same. With that assumption the stickers would not invalidate the whole of said ballots, but the Code provision does not purport to validate an unauthorized vote shown on a valid ballot. The objection to the ballots offered in evidence by the appellant was that they did not disclose a valid vote for Spengler, and the objection was sustained on that ground, and not on the ground that said ballots were invalid in their entirety.

[4] Appellant again seeks to justify the use of stickers by reference to sections 16 and 17 of the Political Code, where, in defining words and phrases, it is provided that "writing includes printing and typewriting." It is argued that, as the sticker contained printing, the pasting thereof on the ballot is equivalent to writing the name on the ballot. This is a non sequitur. The Code provisions plainly require that the impression made on the ballot by writing the name of the candidate in the blank space shall be manually accomplished by the elector while in the voting booth.

Appellant strongly relies on the case of Snortum v. Homme, 106 Minn. 464, 119 N. W. 59, where it was held that the words "write" or "written," when applied to the statutory right of the voter to write other names on the ballot in the blank space under the printed names, included "any mode of representing the words or letters" as provided by the laws of Minnesota, and it was there decided that an elector, before going into the booth, could provide himself with, and later use in marking his ballot, a printed or typewritten paster or sticker. It does not appear that the laws of Minnesota contained the restrictions which are embodied in our Political Code with reference to the supplies and conveniences which may be furnished to the voters. The Supreme Court of Illinois, however, has reached the opposite conclusion on statutory provisions similar to our own, and based on what is deemed the better reasoning. Fletcher v. Wall, 172 Ill. 426, 50 N. E. 230, 40 L. R. A. 617; McSorley v. Schroeder, 196 Ill. 99, 63 N. E. 697. In the latter case the court very pertinently said:

> "It is manifest that, if pasters may be resorted to by one candidate, they may be by all, and the official ballot might become but little more than a convenient card upon which to paste private tickets printed and circulated in secret. The use of such tickets would revive the evils sought to be guarded against by ballot law."

An examination of the authorities in other jurisdictions shows that the clear weight of authority is to the effect that, if the statute so provides, but not otherwise, stickers may be used. If authorized by statute, the use thereof would necessarily be accompanied by reasonable statutory regulations to guard against any abuses that might otherwise attend the exercise of the right. Since there is no such authorization in this state, it follows that the trial court was correct in excluding the sticker ballots involved herein.

REEDER v. FINDERUP. (Civ. 5612.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 10, 1926. On Petition for Rehearing June 29, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court August 9, 1926.)

1. Corporations 🔑170—Maker of note, given to corporation in payment of stock, under corporation's agreement to deliver shares, became stockholder at once.

Where defendant gave note to corporation in payment of stock, under agreement of corporation to deliver shares to him, he became a stockholder, since agreement to deliver was sufficient consideration for note.

2. Bankruptcy 🔑290—Failure of consideration subsequent to bankruptcy adjudication held no defense to suit by trustee of bankrupt corporation on note given to pay for shares.

Where defendant gave note to corporation in payment of shares, under corporation's agreement to deliver shares, and corporation held stock as security, inability to deliver certificate when corporation thereafter became bankrupt was no defense to suit on note by trustee in bankruptcy, since rights of parties date from bankruptcy adjudication.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; S. L. Strother, Judge.

Action upon a promissory note by J. K. Reeder, as trustee in bankruptcy of California Tractors, Inc., against Walter Finderup. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed with directions.

Milton M. Dearing and Robert M. Thomas, both of Fresno, for appellant.

Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued as trustee in bankruptcy of California Tractors, Inc., an insolvent corporation, to recover upon a promissory note executed by defendant in favor of the corporation, and given to cover payment of balance on the purchase of stock of the corporation. The cause was tried on an agreed statement of facts, and judgment went for the defendant. Findings were waived, and the plaintiff presents this appeal from the judgment on the roll and a bill of exceptions containing the statement of facts.

The note upon which the suit is based was executed February 2, 1922, by the defendant. He agreed to pay the corporation $300 ninety days after date, with interest at 7 per cent. and a reasonable attorney's fee if suit were brought for collection. In the statement of facts it was agreed "that on said 2d day of February, 1922, defendant agreed to buy from said corporation, and said corporation agreed to sell to defendant, 5 shares of the capital stock of said corporation for the sum of $500, to wit, at the rate of $100 per share; that thereupon, and on said date, defendant paid said corporation, for said stock, the sum of $200 lawful money of the United States, and made, executed, and delivered to said corporation the promissory note sued on in this action, for the amount of the balance of said sum of $500 to be paid for said shares of stock; that said promissory note was in words and figures as set forth in paragraph II of plaintiff's complaint in this action; that, at the time of said transaction, said corporation held a permit from the commissioner of corporations of the state of California, authorizing it to sell its said stock for cash, lawful money of the United States, or in exchange for 25 per cent. cash and the subscriber's promissory note or notes for the balance thereof, with interest, if any, and that said permit provided, among other things, that all certificates issued to subscribers in exchange for cash and promissory notes should be held by the company as a pledge for the principal amount of said note or notes and interest thereon, if any; that defendant has never paid said promissory note or the interest thereon, or any part thereof, and has never offered so to do, and said corporation has never delivered to defendant the certificates for said shares of stock, and has never tendered or offered delivery thereof to him, and that plaintiff has not delivered or tendered delivery of said certificates to defendant; that no certificate for said stock has ever been made out or entered on the stock book of said corporation, and defendant has not demanded delivery of said certificates, either from said corporation or from plaintiff."

It was further stipulated that, if judgment should be given in favor of the plaintiff herein, it should be in the principal sum of $300 "for interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from February 2, 1922, compounded May 3, 1922, for $75 attorney's fees and for $8.50 costs."

The only defense tendered before the trial court was that there was a failure of consideration, in that the corporation was, because of its insolvency, unable to deliver the stock, and that there had been no delivery or tender before suit was brought. In support of the judgment, the defendant argues that he was neither a stockholder nor a subscriber, but that he had merely "agreed to purchase" the stock, and hence was not liable as either. The answer is in the statement of facts—on February 2, 1922, the defendant agreed to buy 5 shares of the stock of the corporation for the sum of $500, and "that thereupon and on said date defendant paid said corporation for said stock the sum of $200, * * * and made, executed, and delivered to said corporation the promissory note sued on in this action for the amount of the balance of said sum of $500 to be paid for said shares of stock."

Thus the agreement to purchase was consummated on the same day by the payment of $200 of the purchase price thereof in cash, and the delivery of the note for the balance, and the defendant thereupon became a stockholder. The certificate evidencing the sale to defendant was held by the corporation as security for the note under an order of the state commissioner of corporations. This transaction took place on February 2, 1922; the suit was filed on January 15, 1925. If the defendant did not have actual notice of the order under which his stock certificate was held by the corporation as security for his note, his failure to demand that it be issued over a period of three years forces the inference that he fully assented to the arrangement. However, the actual issuance of the certificate of stock is of no importance. The certificate is merely evidence of ownership—proof that the party is a stockholder and proof that he is the owner of the stock. But proof of both of these facts can be made without a certificate. Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 117, 121, 28 P. 110, 111. In the case cited, the court used language particularly appropriate here:

> "When the corporation has agreed that a person shall be entitled to a certain number of shares in its capital, to be paid for in a manner agreed upon, and that person has agreed to take and pay for them accordingly, he becomes their owner by a valid contract made upon a valuable consideration"—citing cases.

[1, 2] It is upon this contract between the corporation and the defendant that this action is based, and the question arises, Is the failure to deliver or tender the certificate a defense to this action? The defendant pleaded in his answer that the note was given in payment of the balance for the stock under the agreement of the corporation to deliver the 5 shares to him, and that the corporation had been unable to make delivery since June 2, 1924, the date of the adjudication of bankruptcy. The agreement of the corporation was, of course, a sufficient consideration for the note, and the note was good as "payment" for the stock. Pacific Trust Co. v. Dorsey, 72 Cal. 55, 57, 12 P. 49. The rights of the parties in this suit date from the adjudication of bankruptcy, and, if the consideration was good at that time—a fact that is admitted because not denied—the subsequent failure of consideration is not a defense to a suit by the trustee.

The judgment must be reversed, and, as findings were waived and the statement of facts is sufficient to cover a judgment for the plaintiff, a new trial is not necessary.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment for the plaintiff as prayed in accordance with the stipulation of facts on file.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The respondent has asked for a rehearing of the judgment in the above-entitled cause, rendered by this court on June 10, 1926. In his petition he criticizes the language of the opinion to the effect that he had pleaded in his answer that the note in suit was "given in payment" for the balance of the stock. We had previously given a full statement of the transaction taken from the agreed statement of facts upon which the cause was tried. From this it appeared that the stock was sold for $200 cash and the promissory note for the balance, in accordance with the permit of the commissioner of corporations. The language of the opinion criticized was merely our legal conclusion of the effect of the pleading.

We are satisfied from the facts stated that the sale was complete when the note was given and that the liability to the creditors of the corporation dated from that time.

Rehearing denied.

ORANGE COVE WATER CO. v. SAMPSON et al. (Civ. 3060.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 11, 1926.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⚷54.

Vendees under contract for sale of realty, based on adequate consideration, acquire equitable title to property.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⚷54—Equitable title of vendees under contract of sale held not destroyed by subsequent agreement in no way affecting rights of vendor.

Equitable title of vendees under contract of sale held not destroyed by subsequent agreement, making no change in terms of contract in any way affecting rights of vendor, but amounting only to agreement between vendees respecting their interests in land.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⚷54, 191—Vendee, not in default under contract of sale, remains equitable owner with right of possession as against all others at time of subsequent conveyance of right of way over land.

Vendee, not in default under contract of sale which was not superseded by new contract, held to remain equitable owner of land, with right of possession, to exclusion of all others at time of subsequent deed by grantor conveying right of way over land to plaintiff.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⚷54—Vendee under contract of sale is trustee of purchase money for vendor who holds land in trust for vendee as security for purchase price.

dor who holds land in trust for purchaser as security for payment of purchase price until conveyance of legal title to vendee is finally made.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑208.

Vendor cannot burden with an easement land previously conveyed to vendee not in default under contract of sale.

6. Easements 🔑42.

Land conveyed by vendor under contract of sale does not fall under general provisions of subsequent deed by vendor conveying right of way over land then owned by him.

7. Easements 🔑36(3).

Evidence held to show intention not to include land previously sold in vendor's deed, conveying right of way over lands owned by vendor.

8. Escrows 🔑8(1)—Deed deposited in escrow, to be delivered on full compliance with conditions of contract of sale, held of no legal effect until such compliance.

Deed conveying lands embraced within contract of sale, deposited in escrow, to be delivered on full compliance with conditions of contract, held of no legal effect until conditions were complied with.

9. Vendor and purchaser 🔑54—Depositing of deed in escrow until compliance with conditions of contract of sale held not necessary to vesting of equitable title in vendee.

Depositing of deed in escrow until full compliance of conditions in contract of sale held not necessary to vesting of equitable title in vendees who acquired interest in lands solely through contract and not through deed.

10. Vendor and purchaser 🔑232(8)—Recording of deed to right of way prior to recording of deed to land previously sold held not available to vendee of right of way having knowledge of equitable owners of land (Civ. Code, § 19).

In action to quiet title to right of way conveyed subsequent to contract of sale of land, recording of deed to right of way prior to recording of deed to land is of no avail to vendee of right of way having actual knowledge of equitable owners of land in actual possession thereof, in view of Civ. Code, § 19.

11. Estoppel 🔑118—Defendants held not estopped by conduct from denying right of plaintiff to right of way for pipe line.

Evidence held to show that defendants were not estopped by conduct from denying right of plaintiff to right of way for pipe line other than that already granted.

Under deed conveying right of way for existing water pipe line pursuant to agreement, it is assumed that intention was to limit right to use land to right expressly granted.

13. Estoppel 🔑60—Estoppel, to deny right to easement for pipe line as plaintiff may deem advantageous to its purposes, unlimited as to time, held indefinite and uncertain.

Claimed estoppel to deny plaintiff's right to easement for pipe line as plaintiff may deem advantageous to its purposes, unlimited as to time, held too indefinite and uncertain to give it force.

14. Estoppel 🔑60.

Estoppel by conduct, whether consisting of representations express or implied, must be certain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by the Orange Cove Water Company against Bettie Sampson and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Edward F. Treadwell and R. S. Laughlin, both of San Francisco, and J. A. Chase, of Visalia, for appellants.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action to quiet the alleged title of the plaintiff to a right of way in, over, and upon lot 13 of certain real property of the defendants (specifically described in the complaint), for the construction and maintenance thereon of pipe lines to be used in connection with, and as a part of, a system inaugurated by plaintiff for the transportation of water for irrigation and domestic purposes "over, through and across" said lot 13 and other real property immediately contiguous thereto. The complaint also prayed for the issuance of a temporary writ of injunction enjoining defendants, and their agents, servants, and employees, from in any manner interfering with or preventing plaintiff from laying, constructing, and maintaining pipe lines upon, over, through, and across said real property. A temporary injunction as prayed for was granted.

Issue was joined upon the question of plaintiff's ownership of the right referred to, the trial was by the court, sitting without the advisory aid of a jury, and judgment passed for plaintiff, decreeing that it (plaintiff) was the owner of said right of way or easement, and that the temporary injunction be made permanent.

The appeal is by the defendants from said judgment, and is supported by a record made up in conformity to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts, generally stated, are: By a decree in partition entered in the superior court of Tulare county, on the 17th day of February, 1887, between the heirs of one Hugh Hamilton, deceased, James L. Hamilton became the owner of certain lands embraced within, and constituting what is designated and known as, "Hamilton colony," in said county. Said James L. Hamilton (to be hereinafter referred to as Hamilton), on the 8th day of December, 1910, entered into a written contract with W. W. Collins, W. D. Collins, B. H. Bendheim, and the appellant, Arthur F. Sampson, whereby he agreed to sell, and the other parties agreed to buy, a certain portion of the land in said colony, including said lot 13, it being provided in said contract that the purchase price ($5,644.80) should be paid, after the payment of $1,411.20, "upon the execution and delivery of the agreement," in installments of a like sum in December of each of the years 1911, 1912, and 1913. Immediately upon the execution of said contract, the purchasers jointly took possession of the lands, and proceeded to plant the same to orange and other trees, and Bendheim, W. W. Collins, the defendant A. F. Sampson, and, for a limited period, W. D. Collins, from the time of the taking by them of the possession of the lands until a date in 1911—a period of about three years—worked or operated the same "as one body, known as the 'C. B. S. Company,' a fictitious name," testified W. W. Collins. Subsequently, W. W. Collins, Bendheim, and A. F. Sampson agreed to, and did, purchase the equitable interest of W. D. Collins in the contract of December 8, 1910, and further agreed to the making of a new contract in accord with the result of such purchase, but embracing, as W. W. Collins testified, "practically the same terms and conditions as were contained in the original written agreement." Accordingly, a written contract was prepared, and, although bearing the same date as the original contract (December 8, 1910), was not executed until September 18, 1911. This contract differed from the original in these particulars only: The name of W. D. Collins was eliminated therefrom as one of the vendees, or, in other words, was not a party thereto, and the individual interests in the lands and the precise liability, respectively, of W. W. Collins, Bendheim, and said Sampson were, and are, defined. After the substituted contract was executed by the various parties (now quoting from the appellants' opening brief, which contains an accurate statement of the facts of the controversy)—

"a deed, dated August 21, 1911, was executed by James L. Hamilton and his wife, conveying the lands covered by the contract of sale, in the proportions agreed upon in the substituted contract, to Sampson, Bendheim, and W. W. Collins. This deed was executed September 18, 1911, and was delivered to the First National Bank of Visalia, together with the substituted contract and certain escrow instructions which directed the delivery of the deed upon the terms of the contract being fully complied with. The escrow instructions were dated September 18, 1911, and are indorsed as received by the cashier of the bank on that date. The record does not show the exact date the final payments were made and the deed delivered, but it does show that both these steps took place and the deed was recorded on August 5, 1914.

"On September 22, 1913, Sampson, Bendheim, and W. W. Collins mutually agreed that the land which they jointly held should be partitioned and divided, and pursuant to this agreement W. W. Collins and B. H. Bendheim executed and delivered to the appellant Sampson a bargain and sale deed to that part of the land known as lot 13. This deed was dated September 22, 1913, and was executed and delivered the following day. It will thus be seen that the title of the appellant Sampson was initiated on December 8, 1910, and finally culminated on August 5, 1914—he and his associates being in possession of the property during all of that time.

"The Orange Cove Water Company was organized in 1911 by the same parties, to wit, W. W. Collins, W. D. Collins, B. H. Bendheim, and the appellant Arthur F. Sampson, for the purpose of supplying water to the same land which they had jointly contracted to purchase, and including lot 13. These parties were the stockholders, and W. W. Collins was president, and B. H. Bendheim was secretary. The system of the company has been supplying water to these lands since the spring of 1911.

"On September 15 and 18, 1911, Sampson, Bendheim, W. D. Collins, and W. W. Collins executed a group of deeds to the water company conveying various rights of way over the land, which rights of way are not involved in this action. These deeds were all drawn by the same attorney (E. C. Farnsworth), acknowledged before the same notary public, and recorded on the same date by the same person (W. W. Collins). They are as follows:

"A. Deed from Bendheim, Sampson, W. W. Collins, and W. D. Collins, as individuals and as copartners doing business under the firm name of C. B. S. Citrus Company, to Orange Cove Water Company conveying right of way for existing pipe line across lots 9, 12, and 13 to southwest corner of lot 15; thence east to boundary line between lots 13 and 14.

"B. Deed from Sampson to Orange Cove Water Company conveying rights of way for pipe line along lines of lots 15, 7, and west half of lot 4.

"C. Deed from Bendheim to Orange Cove Water Company conveying rights of way for existing pipe line over specifically described property.

"D. Deed from W. W. Collins to Orange Cove Water Company conveying rights of way for existing pipe line over specifically described property.

"E. Deed from W. D. Collins to Orange Cove Water Company conveying rights of way for existing pipe line over certain specifically described property.

"F. Deed from Bendheim, Sampson, W. W. Collins, and W. D. Collins, as individuals and as copartners, to Orange Cove Water Company conveying portion of lot 9 containing well, together with pumping plant, equipment, and pipe lines.

"The rights of way thus granted are not in dispute in this action. These rights of way are occupied and enjoyed by the company, and are not questioned, or in any way involved in this suit."

On the same date (September 18, 1911) that the contract whereby Hamilton and W. W. Collins, Bendheim, and defendant Sampson executed the contract to take the place of the contract of December 8, 1910, for the sale of the lands described in both said writings, Hamilton and his wife executed a deed to the plaintiff, the same having been, at the request of W. W. Collins, recorded in the office of the recorder of Tulare county on the 23d day of September, 1911, whereby they (Hamilton and wife) conveyed to it (plaintiff) a right of way to maintain certain pipes over and across certain property in Hamilton colony, which right of way had previously been conveyed by Sampson and his associates, said deed, however, containing the following provision:

> "Also the right of way to lay, construct, maintain, operate, repair or remove any necessary pipe lines for the transportation of water for irrigation and domestic purposes in said colony over and through any part of the lands of said Hamilton colony owned by the first parties or either of them."

It is upon the foregoing provision of the said deed that the plaintiff undertakes to support its claim to the particular right of way with which this action is concerned. Specifically explained, the contention of the plaintiff is that, at the time of the execution of said deed, Hamilton was the owner of lot 13, which, as seen, is embraced within Hamilton colony, and that the effect of the blanket provision of said deed was, therefore, to convey to the plaintiff an impregnable title to the particular right of way involved in this action. In attempting to sustain this contention, counsel for the plaintiff start with the assumption that the agreement of sale of December 8, 1910, was extinguished or its provisions set at naught by the written agreement of sale of September 18, 1911, and that, therefore, the sole source of any rights acquired by W. W. Collins, Bendheim, and defendants in the lands described in said agreements is in the said agreement of September 18, 1911. In other words, counsel maintain that the last-mentioned agreement worked a novation or a substitution of the later agreement for the original, thereby extinguishing the latter, and necessarily all the obligations thereby imposed upon either the first party or the second parties thereto. Upon that assumption the argument is advanced, quoting from respondent's brief:

> "Therefore, at the moment of delivery of the right of way deed, Hamilton was the owner of said lot 13, and, as he made and delivered the right of way deed and the contract of sale as a part of the same transaction, it must follow that the contract of sale was made and accepted subject to the right of way deed."

It is further maintained, upon testimony received in the case to the effect that, when the new arrangement, evidenced by the later written agreement, was made, A. F. Sampson and his associates expressed the desire that the blanket right of way deed should be given by Hamilton affecting any lands he might then have owned in Hamilton colony, that said deed "was taken with his (said Sampson's) consent and approval, and, therefore, subjects him as well as all other parties to the land purchase contract to its provisions." Proceeding further, counsel, in endeavoring to support the hypothesis that Hamilton, at the time of the examination and delivery of his blanket deed to the plaintiff, was the owner of lot 13, argue as follows:

> "On the same day that he executed and delivered the land purchase contract and the right of way deed, Hamilton and his wife executed a deed of grant conveying the property mentioned in said contract to W. W. Collins, Bendheim, and Sampson, but he placed this deed in conditional escrow with First National Bank of Visalia, and the grantees named therein did not receive it until 1914. The escrow instructions expressly provide that said deed is to be delivered only upon performance by the grantees of all the conditions of the contract and if the same were not performed, then the deed should be returned to Hamilton. This was a delivery in escrow on condition subject to return of the deed to Hamilton. It was not a valid or complete delivery of the deed in escrow."

[1] By the contract of sale of December 8, 1910, A. F. Sampson and his associates, including W. D. Collins, jointly acquired an equitable estate in the lands described in said instrument.

> "Such a contract to convey, if enforceable, has the effect of vesting the equitable estate in the vendee, leaving in the vendor the dry legal title. It is in effect a grant of the whole beneficial interest in the land." Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 537, 23 P. 695; Keese v. Beardsley, 190 Cal. 465, 473, 213 P. 500; Gilbert v. Sleeper, 71 Cal. 290, 293, 12 P. 172; Baldwin v. Morgan, 50 Cal. 585, 587, 588; McClellan v. Lewis, 35 Cal. App. 64, 68, 169 P. 436.

or would operate, to forfeit their rights under the contract or work a reversion of their equitable interests or any thereof to the grantor. The sale by W. D. Collins of his equitable interest in the lands was to two of his cotenants and not to Hamilton. The so-called "new" contract was not in fact a new contract. There was no change in the purchase price, nor were there changes in the terms and conditions of the instrument which affected the rights of Hamilton in any manner. The vendees, with the exception of one, who, as seen, transferred his interest to two others of the original vendees, were the same. The writing amounted only to an agreement between the vendees themselves with respect to the quantity and the character of the estate or interest in the lands which they were to hold therein and also as to the number of tenants. Therefore, at the time the Hamiltons executed and delivered the plaintiff their deed conveying to it (plaintiff) a right of way "over and through any part of the lands of said Hamilton colony owned by the first parties (the Hamilton) or either of them," the defendant A. F. Sampson and his associates were the equitable owners of the lands described in the contract of sale (39 Cyc. 1302, 1303), and, by virtue of the terms of said contract, were vested with the right to the possession of said lands "to the exclusion of others." Civ. Code, § 654; Estate of Stanford, 126 Cal. 119, 54 P. 259, 58 P. 462, 45 L. R. A. 788; 29 Cyc. 1549. As hereinabove shown, the rule in equity is that by a contract of sale of real property for an adequate and sufficient consideration the vendee acquires an equitable title to such property, and thereby becomes the equitable owner. The vendee, from the time of the making of such contract, is by equity treated as trustee of the purchase money for the vendor, while the latter is regarded as holding the land in trust for the purchaser as security for the payment of the purchase price until a conveyance of the legal title to the vendee is finally made. 21 C. J. pp. 201, 202; Crescent Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 248, 76 P. 1032, 65 L. R. A. 940; McClellan v. Lewis, 35 Cal. App. 64, 68, 169 P. 436; Baldwin v. Morgan, 50 Cal. 585. It is thus perfectly clear that the Hamiltons, when they made and delivered to plaintiff the blanket right of way deed of September 18, 1911, had no right to burden or charge any of the lands embraced within the contract of sale in question with an easement or other incumbrance. It is manifest from the foregoing considerations that the fact that the Hamilton right of way deed was recorded in the county recorder's office prior to the like recordation of the deed conveying lot 13 to Sampson has no material bearing upon the decision herein. As seen, lot 13 was not specifically mentioned in the Hamilton blanket deed, and could not be included therein under the blanket provision for the reason, as pointed out above, that it did not fall within the general provision of said deed granting a right of way over and through any lands of Hamilton colony then owned by Hamilton. Indeed, it is clear, from the fact that Hamilton had actual knowledge of the fact, as did all the parties, that the equitable title to lot 13 had previously been conveyed to Sampson and his associates, and from the further fact that, in the discussion among the parties of the matter of granting rights of way for the laying of water pipes over and across certain of the lands embraced within the contract of sale, lot 13 was never mentioned or referred to, that it was not the intention of the Hamiltons, nor within the contemplation of any of the parties when said deed was executed and delivered to plaintiff, to include said lot within the purview of the blanket provision of said deed. It will be borne in mind that W. W. and W. D. Collins, and Sampson and Bendheim and their wives, on the same date on which the contract of sale was re-executed at the request of the vendees so as to conform to the new arrangement made between the latter, as above explained, conveyed by deed to the plaintiff the rights of way for the water pipes which were, and previously had been, laid and in place over and through the lands described in the contract of sale; that among these deeds was one by defendant Sampson for the then existing right of way over and through lot 13 and along which water pipes had previously been laid, and which were then in the ground and in use; that, at the time those deeds were executed, there was no claim that Hamilton then owned lot 13.

[8-10] As to the deed by Hamilton to Sampson and associates conveying the lands embraced within the contract of sale, it is clear that, until the terms and conditions of said contract were fulfilled by the vendees therein, it was of no legal force, since there was no delivery thereof. It was deposited with the contract of sale in escrow, with instructions that it be delivered to the vendees when they had fully complied with all the conditions or the terms of the contract, and only then. But the defendant Sampson and his associates acquired their interests in the lands solely through the contract of sale, and not through the deed. Whatever might have been the specific reason prompting the act of depositing the deed in escrow with the contract of sale, it is obvious that so depositing it was not necessary to the vesting of the equitable title of the lands in the vendees. Under the circumstances here revealed, however, the fact of the recordation of the Hamilton deed prior to the recordation of the deed from Hamilton to the vendees, or the fact that the contract of sale was not recorded at or prior to the time that the first-named deed was recorded, could be of no avail to plaintiff, since the evidence without conflict shows that the plaintiff, whose officers and members were composed entirely of the vendees in the contract of sale, not only had notice, but actual knowledge, at the time it took the Hamilton right of way conveyance, of the fact that the said vendees were the equitable owners of the lands described in the contract of sale, including, of course, lot 13, and were in actual possession thereof from the time of the execution of the contract of sale to the date of the making of the Hamilton deed, and, it may be added, that, so far as it is to be learned from the record, they continued to maintain such possession down to the time of the trial of this action. The law as to this subject of notice is well understood. A general statement of the rule regarding it is declared in section 19 of the Civil Code, and its application illustrated in the following-named cases and textbooks: Talbert v. Singleton, 42 Cal. 390, 395; Rec. Dist. No. 551 v. Van Loben Sels, 145 Cal. 181, 78 P. 638; Crescent City Canal Co. v. Montgomery, 143 Cal. 248, 76 P. 1032, 65 L. R. A. 940; Devlin on Real Estate Deeds, vol. 2, § 760; Crooks v. Jenkins, 124 Iowa, 317, 100 N. W. 82, 104 Am. St. Rep. 326.

[11-14] There is a suggestion of an estoppel as against the defendants, but we find no merit therein. It is true that the water company was organized by the defendant A. F. Sampson and associates immediately upon the execution of the contract of sale and the taking of possession thereunder by the vendees, and that, in the preliminary discussion among the vendees as to the necessity for an adequate water supply for the lands for irrigation and domestic purposes, it was agreed among them that water pipe lines should be laid over and across such parts of the acreages embraced within the sale contract as would properly subserve the needs of the lands and the vendees in that respect. But, in following out the scheme thus proposed or agreed upon after the company was organized, the vendees made to plaintiff, in accord with a previous understanding, specific grants of rights of way, and water pipes were laid over and across different parts of the lands, including lot 13, and were used down to the time that plaintiff undertook to, and, under the order of the court enjoining the Sampsons from interfering with plaintiff's activities in that particular, did, in fact, exercise the claimed right of entering upon lot 13 and laying thereon another water pipe line. It is not claimed—at any rate, the evidence does not show that any such claim was made—that any express understanding or agreement was had between the parties that any other pipe line than that already existing when the deed conveying the same to plaintiff was executed should or was to be installed and maintained in, upon, or across lot 13. Thus it is to be assumed that, at the time the deed conveying the right of way for the existing water pipe line over said lot was given plaintiff, the intention was thus to limit the right of plaintiff to use said lot for that purpose to the right expressly granted. In other words, since the grants of the rights of way for pipe lines over said lands were the culmination of an agreement between the vendees to inaugurate the water system to be used for their mutual benefit, it is to be presumed that such grants involved the granting to plaintiff of all that said parties intended or agreed to convey to it in that particular and for that purpose. Such is always the construction which must be given to grants or any instrument in writing expressly delimiting its own scope. If, then, the defendants can at all be charged with an estoppel, whereby they are to be precluded from denying the claimed right of plaintiff to a right of way for a pipe line over lot 13 other than that already expressly granted, it is not an estoppel arising by contract, either directly or incidentally—that is, not one so arising out of the agreement to organize the water company, for, as seen, that agreement, so far as such rights of way were concerned, was fully consummated and at an end—but, if any estoppel at all is available to plaintiff as against defendants, it is one by conduct. There is, though, no ground afforded by the record upon which an estoppel by conduct as against defendants can be predicated. Indeed, there is no element of estoppel by conduct present here. There is no evidence of any act or words or conduct or false representation of any fact on the part of A. F. Sampson subsequent to the granting of the rights of way above spoken of or subsequent to the time the interests of the respective vendees in the lands were segregated and divided into several interests and assigned to the vendees in severalty and as such defined, whereby and wherefrom the plaintiff or its officers could have been led to the belief or the understanding or to infer that said Sampson intended, or even intimated an intention, that it (plaintiff) would be permitted to install and maintain a pipe line along any other right of way over and across lot 13 than that which had already been expressly granted. The estoppel sought to be invoked is wanting in definiteness in several respects as well as in certainty. According to its theory, the plaintiff is entitled to an easement for the purpose explained over any part of lot 13 which it (plaintiff) may deem the more advantageous to its purposes. The defendants, according to that theory, are without right to interfere or to suggest any particular route over said lot which may be adopted. Not only is this so, but the theory seems to be that plaintiff is not limited as to the time within which the right may be asserted or put into practical operation. The easement, in other words, may be a charge or burden upon lot 13 interminably or forever, subject to be exercised at any time. That this is the theory of the plaintiff is evidenced by the fact that the exercise of the alleged right was not attempted until the lapse of a period approximately of eleven years from the organization of the water company and over five years from the time (February, 1916) defendant A. F. Sampson severed his connection with, and thereby relinquished to his cotenants whatever interest he had or owned in, the plaintiff. But, regardless of the last-mentioned propositions, which, perhaps, would go more to the question of laches than that of the uncertainty of the claimed estoppel, it is clear that an attempt to invoke an equitable estoppel here would be futile because it is lacking in that element of certainty to impart to it virility and force. Naturally, since upon the doctrine of equitable estoppel one may be divested of a substantive right of property, the rule is that estoppel by conduct, whether such conduct consists of representations, either express or implied, "must be plain, not doubtful, or matter of questionable inference. * * * Certainty is essential to all estoppels. The courts will not readily suffer a man to be deprived of his property where he had no intention to part with it." Bigelow on Estoppel (5th Ed.) pp. 570–578.

LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY FLOOD CONTROL DIST. et al. (Civ. 5561.)

1. Statutes ⇨174, 175.

Where reason for rule relating to interpretation of statute ceases, rule itself ceases.

2. Constitutional law ⇨48.

Every presumption will be indulged in favor of constitutionality of statute.

3. Taxation ⇨49.

Constitution does not exempt operative or nonoperative property of public utilities from requirement of Const. art. 13, § 1, that all property except as otherwise provided in Constitution be taxed in proportion to its valuation.

4. Levees and flood control ⇨23 — Operative and nonoperative property of public utility held "taxable real property," within Los Angeles flood control district, and therefore subject to assessment (Los Angeles County Flood Control Act [St. 1915, p. 1502], §§ 10, 14; Const. art. 13, § 14).

Operative as well as nonoperative property of public utility is "taxable real property," within Los Angeles flood control district created under Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502), and as such is subject to assessment under sections 10, 14, notwithstanding act creating district does not specifically provide for such assessment, Const. art. 13, § 14, not being applicable.

5. Statutes ⇨228.

Any exemption or exception from operation of general statute must be specific.

6. Evidence ⇨11.

It is common knowledge that Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502), was intended to protect public highways and other property from damage, and that demand for its enactment resulted from great loss to property from destructive floods.

7. Levees and flood control ⇨22—That assessments under Los Angeles Flood Control Act are required to be levied and collected as general county taxes are collected held not to change character of charge as special assessment (Los Angeles Flood Control Act [St. 1915, p. 1502; §§ 10, 11, 14]; Const. art. 13, § 14).

That assessments under Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502), §§ 10, 11, 14, are required to be levied and collected in same manner as general county taxes from which operative property of public utilities is exempted by Const. art. 13, § 14, held not to change character of charge imposed as special assessment for benefits so as to exempt such operative property from assessment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. W. Guerin, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Railway Corporation against the Los Angeles County Flood Control District and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, Gordon Boller, anl H. F. Prince, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Paul Overton and Samuel Poorman, Jr., both of Los Angeles, amici curiæ for appellant.

Edward T. Bishop, Co. Counsel, and J. A. Tucker, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. The plaintiff commenced this action to recover taxes paid under protest to the Los Angeles county flood control district, a public corporation. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and this was followed by a judgment in favor of the defendants, from which the plaintiff has appealed on the judgment roll.

The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was a public utility corporation engaged within the boundaries of the flood control district in the business of transporting passengers for hire; that the district was created under the "Los Angeles County Flood Control Act" (Stats. 1915, p. 1502); that, acting under the provisions of sections 10 and 14 of said act, the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county levied for each fiscal year from 1916 to 1919–20, inclusive, a special tax on the real property in the district for the purpose of paying the interest and a portion of the principal on bonds theretofore issued by the district, said tax being levied upon all the real property in the district appearing on the assessment roll prepared by the county assessor for each fiscal year mentioned; that the taxes levied against the plaintiff's operative real property for the fiscal years 1916–17, 1917–18, and 1918–19 were not paid, and said properties were sold to the state because of the delinquency on June 29, 1917; that thereafter the plaintiff redeemed said properties by the payment of $7,382.10, and has paid, before delinquency, the additional sum of $8,223.58 to cover taxes levied for the year 1919–20; that the plaintiff filed with the board of supervisors of said county its verified petitions and claims for the refund of the money so paid, but the same were disallowed. It is then alleged that the taxes so levied were invalid in so far as they related to the operative real property of plaintiff, as they were not authorized by the Constitution and laws of the state of California and were specially forbidden by section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution. The demurrer was on the general ground that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. In support of the demurrer the defendants argued that the taxes were not invalid for the reason alleged because they were in fact assessments as distinguished from the general taxes under the rule announced in L. A. Flood Control Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 169 P. 1028, and therefore did not come under the constitutional exemption.

Appellant, conceding the rule of the Hamilton Case, insists on this appeal that the taxes are invalid because the Flood Control Act does not specifically declare that the operative property of public utilities shall be subject to assessment for these special taxes. In support of its position the appellant cites Southern California Ry. Co. v. Workman, 146 Cal. 80, 79 P. 586, 82 P. 79, 2 Ann. Cas. 583; Fox v. Workman, 155 Cal. 201, 100 P. 246; Wilson v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 176 Cal. 248, 168 P. 128; Los Angeles Pacific Co. v. Hubbard, 17 Cal. App. 646, 121 P. 306; and San Pedro, etc., R. R. Co. v. Pillsbury, 23 Cal. App. 675, 139 P. 669, 671. From these authorities the appellant has formulated the rule of law that "the operative property of the public utility is not assessable on account of a special improvement district unless the act creating such district and providing for assessment on account thereof specifically provides" therefor. From our reading of the cases cited we are unable to draw from any one of them a rule as broad and far-reaching as that claimed by appellant.

The Workman Case, 146 Cal. 80, 79 P. 586, 82 P. 79, 2 Ann. Cas. 583, involved an assessment upon the right of way of a steam railroad to pay the cost of a street improvement under the Vrooman Act. The portion of the act under which the assessment was made read: "The expenses incurred for any work authorized by * * * this act * * * shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon." Stats. 1885, § 7, p. 147. (Emphasis ours.) The case came before the Supreme Court on two appeals—one from the judgment on demurrer to the complaint and one from an order granting a temporary injunction. The latter appeal was dismissed on the ground that the injunction was merged in the judgment and the opinion rested on the judgment roll alone. The complaint alleged that the assessor had attempted to assess the "right of way" of the plaintiff abutting on Pasadena avenue on the basis of benefits for the improvement of the street, that unless restrained by the court the treasurer would proceed to sell that portion of the right of way covered by the assessment, and that such sale would result in a dismemberment of plaintiff's railway system. It appeared that plaintiff was operating a railroad system of about 487 miles in length, and that the lien covered about 9,000 feet of its right of way. Without interpreting the provisions of the statute, and, as we read it, on the ground of public policy alone, the Supreme Court held that:

> "There is no authority for making an assessment upon a right of way or for selling the same. A railroad company is a quasi public corporation in which the public is interested. It holds a franchise from the state and must operate its road or forfeit its franchise. A part of its right of way cannot be sold on execution or for a street assessment. The decisions are not in harmony on the question, but we think the best-considered cases hold that such right of way cannot be sold to satisfy a street assessment."

Three cases from Eastern jurisdictions were cited in the opinion in support of the text quoted, and a reading of these cases discloses that the court in each case rested its opinion on the ground of the public interest and convenience, that is to say, that in the absence of express statutory procedure for the enforcement of the assessment lien by some other method than the dismemberment of the railway system, the court would hold that it was not the intention of the Legislature to make the right of way subject to assessment and disrupt the public service rendered by the railroad under its franchise.

In dissenting from the order denying a rehearing in the Workman Case, Beatty, C. J., gave a very clear explanation of the meaning and effect of the opinion when he said:

"For although the decision only declares in terms that there is no authority for making an assessment upon a right of way, it means, when construed with reference to the facts of the case, that you cannot assess or sell a tract of land belonging to a railroad company if its track extends over it without expressly exempting the right of way; that is to say, without reserving to the company in the express terms of the sale the exclusive right to use the land for all the purposes of its traffic. The proposition broadly laid down is, that a part of a railroad company's right of way cannot be sold on execution or for a street assessment. Of course it is consistent and logical to say that such property cannot be assessed if it cannot be sold, for there is no possible way of enforcing a delinquent assessment for street improvements except by a sale of the abutting lots, and an assessment which binds no one is equivalent to no assessment at all."

Inasmuch as the Vrooman Act required that the assessment should run specifically to the property benefited and that the lien should attach to that property only, there was no way of enforcing an assessment against the railway's property except by a dismemberment of the operating sustem of the railway to the injury of the public. Our understanding of the reasoning of the court is that the law did not authorize the assessment and sale of a railroad right of way because, no provision having been made for reserving to the company the exclusive right to use the right of way for all purposes of its traffic under its franchise to serve the public, such authority should not be implied from the general grant of power to assess "the lots and lands fronting on the improved portions of the street." The expression quoted had been in the Vrooman Act since its enactment in 1885, and had a well known and accepted meaning as applying to the lots of land abutting the curb line of the street and "fronting" on the portion of the street to be improved. Then again the whole purpose and theory of the Vrooman Act was to provide a mode of procedure for the improvement of streets on the basis of benefits accruing to these abutting lots of land—among other things to provide the lot owners a convenient mode of egress and ingress. This theory of the original act was repugnant to the thought that it was intended to include in the assessment a right of way which would not be benefited by the street improvement. Because there was nothing in the act to indicate a departure from this well-known theory, and because of the question of public interest and convenience involved, the court properly held that the power did not exist. There is no intimation by our Supreme Court that if the Vrooman Act had expressly authorized the assessment and sale it would have been valid, and there is no holding that the failure to "expressly" include the public utility was the reason for the denial of the power to join it in the assessment.

Fox v. Workman, 155 Cal. 201, 100 P. 246, merely held that a bond issued upon the same assessment on the railroad right of way was void for the reasons stated in the earlier Workman Case. The Wilson Case in 176 Cal. held, in an action to foreclose a street assessment lien on a railroad right of way, that the case was controlled by the two cases just cited. In the course of the opinion in the Wilson Case the court called attention to the fact that the assessment involved arose prior to the amendment to the Vrooman Act which expressly authorized the assessment of rights of way, but this was done merely to emphasize the fact that the case was controlled by the Workman Cases which arose under the same statute. In fact the only "rule" of the Wilson Case is the one of "stare decisis."

In the Hubbard Case, 17 Cal. App. 646. 121 P. 306, the appellate court referred with approval to the rule of the former cases, and there held that, in the amendment to section 15 of the Street Opening Act of 1903, including in the assessment the "property of any railroad or street railroad," the Legislature used the word "property" in its limited sense as applying only to land including the right of way and franchise, but excluding the improvements such as the tracks, ties, piles, etc.

In the Pillsbury Case, 23 Cal. App. 675, 139 P. 669, 671, the same court had for consideration a case arising under the Street Improvement Act of 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 34). The only question before the court was whether the amendments to the Vrooman Act, and similar street improvement acts, had changed the public policy forbidding the assessment of railroad rights of way, as announced in the Workman Cases, so that the power to assess such rights should be implied in the act of 1901, which had not been amended. The appellate court held that, as the various acts provided for different kinds of street work under different modes of procedure, it could not be implied from the amendment of the one class that the Legislature intended to change the rule as to the other. The opinion is of importance here only for the purpose of showing that up to the time of the enactment of the Flood Control Act the rule of the Workman Case and those following it was one of public policy and convenience and nothing more.

With this rule of law before it the Legislature, in June, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1502), created a special taxing district designated as the Los Angeles county flood control district, and which embraced practically all Los Angeles county, except the islands off the coast, for the special purpose of providing for the control of the flood and storm waters of the district, to conserve such waters for useful purpose, "and to protect from damages from such flood or storm waters the harbors, waterways, public highways and property in said district." By sections 10 and 14 of the act the district was authorized to levy a tax each year upon "the taxable real property" in such district to pay the cost of carrying out the objects and purposes of the act, and the interest and principal upon bonds issued by the district, and said tax was directed to be "levied and collected at the same time and in the same manner as the general tax levied for county purposes." By section 16 of the act it was provided that nothing in the act should be construed to authorize the supervisors to raise money for said district by any method or system other than that by the issuing of bonds or the levying of a tax upon the assessed value of all the real property in the district in the manner provided. In passing on the provisions of this act the Supreme Court in Los Angeles Co. F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 128, 169 P. 1028, held that though the act used the expression "tax" it in fact conferred authority merely to levy an assessment against the real property of the district on the basis of benefits, and that the Legislature itself had determined the question of these benefits when it authorized the assessment or tax against the real property on the basis of the assessed valuation thereof for general taxation purposes. In this proceeding it is conceded by the appellants that the taxes which are involved here were in fact assessments for benefits, and that the provisions of section 14 of article 13 are not applicable for the purpose of relieving the operative property of public utilities from such assessments.

[1] This being so, the question presented is whether because of the rule in the Workman Case the failure of the Legislature to expressly designate the operative property of public utilities as subject to taxation under the act relieves such property from taxation. As we have seen, the rule in the Workman Case was based upon the question of public policy which would arise from the dismemberment of the railroad system by enforcement of the lien upon the portion of the railroad right of way assessed. This question is in no wise involved in the case before us. The Flood Control Act expressly includes all taxable real property in the district, and the lien arising from the assessment against a public utility is enforceable upon all the real property of the utility and not upon any particular portion of its rights of way. There is no reason, therefore, for the application of the rule of public policy in the interpretation of this statute, and where the reason for the rule ceases the rule itself ceases.

[2] Furthermore, we must view the act "in the light of every presumption and intendment favorable to its constitutionality." Los Angeles Co. F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, supra, p. 125 (169 P. 1030). With this in view and treating the power to tax as a power to assess for benefits, we find that the Legislature has directed that the assessment shall be made upon all the taxable real property in the district, and that it has exempted from such assessment the personal property situated therein only. If it had been the intention of the Legislature to exempt from such assessment the operative property of any public utility, it was necessary to have that exemption stated in explicit terms.

[3-5] By the provisions of section 1 of article 13 of the Constitution, all property in the state, except as otherwise provided in the Constitution, is to be taxed in proportion to its value. Numerous exemptions appear in the Constitution itself, but these do not include either the operative or nonoperative property of public utilities. By section 14 of the same article of the Constitution a special mode of assessing all the property of certain public utilities for state purposes is provided, and such property is then exempted from taxation for local purposes. This, however, it has been conceded, does not apply to assessments upon such property for special improvements, and we find, therefore, that the operative as well as the nonoperative real property of these utilities is in the category of "taxable real property in such district" within the meaning of the Flood Control Act. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the rule that when a statute is general in its terms any exemption or exception from its operation must be specific. Thus, when the Legislature declared that the tax should be levied upon all the taxable real property in the district it included every class of real property in the district which was not by the Constitution or statutes expressly exempted from that character of taxation. Now the operative real property of the public utilities within the district, though exempt under section 14 of article 13 from general taxation by the district, but not being expressly exempted from local assessments, comes within the general classification of "taxable real property," and as such is subject to the assessments for the purposes of the act.

[6] This conclusion follows all the more naturally because it is a matter of common knowledge that the purposes of the act were to protect from damage the public highways and other property in the district, and that the demand for its enactment resulted from the great loss to property from destructive floods which had, for a long period of years, interrupted traffic within the district, washed away railroad bridges, and damaged railroad tracks and rights of way and had caused enormous damage to the property owned by the various public utilities operating in the district.

[7] Counsel for the Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation, a public utility owning operative property in the flood control district, have filed a brief as "amici curiæ," in which they advance the point that such property is not subject to taxation under the act because the only machinery provided in the act for the levy and collection of a tax is that provided for the levy and collection of the "general tax levied for county purposes" from which the operative property of these utilities is exempted by section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution. The argument is that, as this operative property is exempted from county general taxes, the fact that the Flood Control Act adopted the county tax machinery as the only method of levying and collecting the "tax" for flood control purposes discloses an intention on the part of the Legislature to exempt such operative property from the burdens of the act.

The answer to the point raised is a simple one, and is found in the comprehensive opinion written by Mr. Justice Sloss in the Hamilton Case, 177 Cal. 119, 128, 129, 169 P. 1028. In that case it was held that, though the word "tax" was used throughout the act, the Legislature in fact meant an assessment, and that, accordingly, all the "taxing" provisions of the act were to be read as authorizing the imposition of a special assessment on the basis of benefits to the real property of the district. Reading the act in the light of this decision, we find that the power was conferred upon the supervisors to impose a special assessment upon all the real property in the district to pay the interest and principal on the bonds of the district, and, to a limited extent, to raise a special fund for the general purposes of the district. This power to assess goes to all the real property in the district. No real property in the district is expressly exempted, and we have seen that the operative real property of public utilities is not exempted from special assessment for benefits by reason of section 14 of article 13 or any other provision of the Constitution, This, in fact, is conceded by the appellant, as indeed it must under the decisions. Southern Pac. Co. v. Levee Dist. No. 1, 172 Cal. 345, 349, 156 P. 502; Los Angeles Co. F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, supra.

By sections 10 and 14 of the act it is provided that these assessments shall be levied and collected "at the time and in the same manner as the general tax levy for county purposes," and, by section 11, all the provisions of the Political Code relating to the "manner of levying, assessing, equalizing and collecting of taxes" are adopted and made a part of the act. The evident meaning of these provisions of the act is that, though the levy is an assessment for benefits as distinguished from a general tax, the machinery for the imposition and collection of the charge is the same as that provided for in the case of general taxes. Summarizing in the light of the decision in the Hamilton Case, the situation is this: The Legislature has created a special taxing district, and has declared that all the real property in the district (with certain unimportant exceptions) will be benefited by the proposed improvement. For the purpose of raising funds it has authorized the supervisors to assess all this real property, and has declared that the bonds issued by the district shall be a lien upon "all the real property in the district." For the purpose of convenience to the owners of such property, as well as to the county officials, it has provided that these assessments shall be levied and collected in the same manner and at the same time as general taxes for county purposes. The adoption of this general taxing machinery, however, does not change the character of the charge which is imposed as a special assessment for benefits, and the other provisions of the act plainly subject to such assessments all the real property in the district, including the operative real property of public utilities.

Judgment affirmed.

In re MAESCHER'S ESTATE.

MAESCHER et al. v. SAMMANN et al.

(Civ. 5618.)

1. Wills 🔑166(7).

Opportunity and inclination to influence testator are not sufficient showing of undue influence without some participation in making of will.

2. Wills 🔑324(3).

Evidence in will contest held sufficient to take to jury issue of undue influence.

3. Wills 🔑324(1).

Questions involving motives and inferences to be deduced from circumstances are, within reasonable bounds, exclusively within province of jury or trial court sitting without jury in will contest.

4. Wills 🔑326.

Questions involving motives and inferences to be deduced from circumstances must be resolved in favor of contestants in considering nonsuit in will contest.

5. Wills 🔑158.

In will contest, on ground of undue influence, it is unnecessary to prove exercise of such influence directly on testamentary act.

6. Wills 🔑164(3).

Evidence of testator's relations with wife, from whom he was separated, which would indicate that she deserved consideration in will, held admissible in will contest to show that will was unjust and unnatural, though she was not contestant.

7. Wills 🔑163(6).

While unjust will does not raise presumption of undue influence, its nature may be considered on such issue as circumstance.

8. Wills 🔑165(4).

Testator's statements six months before death that beneficiary was trying to force him to get divorce and marry her held admissible for limited purpose of showing his state of mind, and cannot be considered as narration of exercise of undue influence.

9. Wills 🔑165(2)—Declarations of testator showing state of mind are admissible on issue of undue influence, though not part of res gestæ.

Declarations of testator showing state of mind are admissible on issue of undue influence, though not part of res gestæ, but their value as evidence diminishes in proportion as they are remote from date of will.

10. Wills 🔑164(7).

Testator's state of mind held germane to issue of undue influence in will contest.

11. Wills 🔑384.

In will contest, error in admitting evidence bearing on mental incapacity held harmless, on proponents' appeal, where such issue was found against contestants.

12. Wills 🔑164(4).

In will contest, on ground of undue influence, evidence that beneficiary had asked testator, while he was in bed at her house, where he was staying, to give her some flats which he owned, held admissible as showing relationship between them.

13. Wills 🔑164(3)—Evidence of attention to home duties and devotion to husband by testator's wife who received little under will held admissible on issue of undue influence.

Evidence of attention to home duties and devotion to husband by wife of testator, from whom he was separated, and who received little under will, held admissible in will contest on ground of undue influence, since injustice and unnaturalness of will may be considered on such issue.

14. Wills 🔑384—In will contest, service on minor's mother by adoption, who had not filed necessary bond to qualify as guardian, though irregular, held not prejudicial, where she was subsequently appointed guardian ad litem, and answered on behalf of ward (Code of Civ. Proc. § 1328).

In will contest, service of citation on minor, who was proponent, by service on mother by adoption, who had applied for letters of guardianship for child's estate, but had not qualified by filing necessary bond, though irregular, held not prejudicial, where she was subsequently appointed guardian ad litem, and answered on behalf of ward, notwithstanding Code of Civ. Proc. § 1328.

Failure to have citation issued will justify dismissal of will contest, in absence of appearance by adverse parties.

16. Wills 🔑248.

Court's jurisdiction of will contest attaches on filing petition.

Appeal from Superior Court, of Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Louis J. Maescher, deceased. From a judgment denying probate of an alleged will, which was contested by Charles B. Maescher and others, proponents, C. F. Sammann, executor, and others, appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Seawell and Curtis, JJ., dissenting.

Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, and William K. Young, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Courtney A. Teel and Maurice C. Sparling, both of Los Angeles, and Theodore Horstman and Clarence M. Smith, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying probate to an alleged will of Louis J. Maescher, deceased, which judgment was rendered upon a verdict of a jury that said will was executed by Maescher while acting under the undue influence of Mrs. Lottie Logan, one of the beneficiaries thereunder.

As appellants contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict of the jury, and that their motion for a nonsuit, made at the conclusion of the contestants' evidence, should have been granted, we shall state the facts herein rather fully, with emphasis upon testimony supporting the verdict.

Louis J. Maescher married in 1902, and lived with his wife in Los Angeles, Cal., until 1912, when he left her, saying he would not return. Mrs. Maescher gave no cause for this action on his part, but, on the contrary, was a devoted, industrious wife, and was heartbroken when her husband left her. The year before Mr. Maescher left his wife, he met appellant Lottie Logan, and about a month after meeting her he told her he was a married man. She went about with him to public places of amusement, and during this year he would frequently return to his wife's home at 3 and 4 o'clock in the morning. Shortly after leaving his wife, Maescher went to live at the home of Mrs. Logan, where he lived until the time of his death, in July, 1923. During a part of this time Mrs. Logan also had other boarders, but during the latter years of Mr. Maescher's life her household consisted of Mr. Maescher, herself, and an infant that she had adopted, and who was also a beneficiary under the purported will and is an appellant here. During the ten years or more that Mr. Maescher lived at the home of Mrs. Logan there was no definite sum paid by him for his board and lodging. Mrs. Logan testified that she purchased much of his clothing, and charged it to her account, and paid her own accounts, and that when she needed money he would give it to her. On several occasions he gave her large amounts of money, and on one occasion gave her bonds of the value of $9,000. During a part of the time that Mr. Maescher lived with Mrs. Logan he occupied a sleeping porch off her bedroom, and was obliged to pass through her room to reach the bath. At the time of his death Mr. Maescher was living with Mrs. Logan in a four-room house owned by her.

At various times during the relationship of these people Mr. Maescher was seriously ill, and during the last three months of his life he declined very noticeably, and no longer attended to business duties. During this period he was almost constantly with Mrs. Logan. Neighbors who saw him daily testified that during the last few weeks of his life he failed both physically and mentally. About a week prior to his death he spent the night with a neighbor, and appears to have become hysterical or mentally unbalanced during the night. Mrs. Logan was sent for, and took him to her home. Several days later, on Saturday, June 16, 1923, Mrs. Logan went to the home of this neighbor, Mrs. Langworthy, to use her telephone. Mrs. Langworthy and other persons present on this occasion testified that Mrs. Logan was greatly distressed and excited, and stated that this was because she had just learned that Mr. Maescher had not made a will; that she had thought he had provided for her and the baby. She telephoned to the attorney, who afterwards drew the will, and, not being able to reach him, she telephoned to Mr. Sammann, the business manager for Mr. Maescher. She also failed to find him in his office, but left word for him to come to her home. During the conversation between Mrs. Logan and Mrs. Langworthy the latter suggested to Mrs. Logan that Mr. Maescher was incompetent to make a will, and instanced the recent occurrence at her home when he had been mentally unbalanced. Mrs. Logan agreed to this, but said that Maescher's brothers were not aware of his condition. It is admitted that late that afternoon Sammann and the attorney came to Mrs. Logan's home, and the contents of the will was discussed with Maescher.

On June 19, 1923, Mr. Maescher was taken to the office of the attorney by Mr. Sammann and there he signed the will, which contained the provisions he had directed upon the previous Saturday, according to the testimony of the attorney. Under its provisions $5,000 was left to the wife of testator, with the condition that, if she contested the will, she was to receive but $5. Twenty thousand dollars was left to Mrs. Logan, and the balance of the estate, of the value of nearly $150,000, was left to Lois Frances Logan, the adopted child of Mrs. Logan.

[1] The contest over the probate of the will was instituted by the brothers and sisters of deceased, and the jury found that the will was executed under the influence of Mrs. Logan. The facts we have set forth herein are outstanding ones in the record, but they by no means include all the matters which the jury might well have considered as fortifying their conclusion. The record shows that at the time of Maescher's death Mrs. Logan had succeeded in accumulating a fortune of over $100,000; that he had given her real property, bonds, money, jewelry, and his insurance policies. Their relations were certainly most confidential, and she had constant opportunity during the last few weeks of his life when he was weakened mentally and physically to influence his actions. It has repeatedly been held that opportunity and inclination to influence a testator are not in themselves sufficient showing of undue influence, without some participation by the person having such opportunity and inclination in the making of the will. But we have in the record before us the testimony of several disinterested witnesses regarding Mrs. Logan's concern and excitement when she learned no will had been made by Maescher, her statement that she thought a will had been made providing for her and her child, her attempt, on July 16th, to communicate with Mr. Young, the attorney, and with Mr. Sammann, Mr. Maescher's manager, who afterwards assisted her in her efforts to probate the will, the arrival of these two persons at her home on the afternoon of that day, and the conference with Maescher about his will, which resulted in its execution three days later, which was about ten days prior to his death. There are additional facts and circumstances indicating that the testator's state of mind shortly before his death, and while free from the influence of Mrs. Logan, was opposed to the disposition of his property made in his will, and, indeed, to the making of a will at all. In conversation with his wife's relatives, he revealed his desire to provide for his wife, and to avoid making a will, thus allowing his property to go to his heirs at law.

[2-5] The foregoing evidence was sufficient to entitle the contestants to submit to the jury the issue of undue influence, and was a substantial basis for the jury to find in their favor upon that issue.

> "Questions involving motives, and inferences to be deduced from circumstances, are, within reasonable bounds, exclusively within the province of the jury, or the trial court when sitting without a jury, and under the rules regarding the granting of a nonsuit, they must all be resolved, so far as possible, in favor of the contestants." Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 589, 82 P. 252, 254.

In many cases it is utterly impossible to prove the exercise of the influence directly upon the testamentary act, but this is not necessary. Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 P. 598.

Of course, there is testimony in the record relied upon by appellants which is in conflict with that above recited. The testimony regarding the circumstances surrounding the making of the will is not so greatly in conflict. Mr. Sammann stated that he came to Mrs. Logan's home on Saturday afternoon, June 16th, in response to a telephone message left for him at his home. This is in harmony with the testimony that Mrs. Logan left word for him to come to her home. He stated that when he arrived Maescher wished to make his will, and that he (Sammann) thereupon telephoned to the attorney, who came to the house. His visit was also in accordance with Mrs. Logan's purpose, for she had telephoned to him earlier in the day, and failed to find him.

[6, 7] Appellants object to testimony in the record regarding the wife of deceased, his relations with her, and especially the facts and circumstances which would indicate that she deserved consideration from him, and that she had a natural claim upon the bounty of testator. This objection is made because the wife was not one of the contestants. However, that fact does not destroy the relevancy of the evidence offered. The evidence was offered to show that the will was an unjust and unnatural one. While an unjust will does not of itself raise the presumption of undue influence, the nature of the will may be considered by the jury upon the issue of undue influence as a circumstance. Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 303, 107 P. 598; Estate of Gallo, 61 Cal. App. 174, 214 P. 496.

[8] Objection is made to evidence of statements made by testator six months before his death to his wife's aunt to the effect that Mrs. Logan was trying to force him to get a divorce from his wife and marry her; that he did not wish to do this; that he was afraid Mrs. Logan would put him out of her house if he did not, and similar statements. These statements were admitted for the purpose, and restricted by the court to such purpose, of showing the state of mind of the testator. For such limited purpose they were admissible. Declarations of a testator which reveal his condition of mind are admissible for that purpose, although not a part of the res gestæ, but their effect must be carefully limited to the question of his condition of mind, and they must not be considered as narrations of the exercise or effect of the undue influence. In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 301, 44 P. 577; Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 593, 82 P. 252. In the instant case the jury was repeatedly instructed that the declarations of the testator were admitted only to show his state of mind, and not as evidence of the facts recited.

[9] Appellants contend that, although this evidence may have indicated the mental state of testator six months before his death, mental state is not germane to the issues, and that the incidents narrated were too remote in time to illuminate the state of mind of testator at the time of the testamentary act. We think the latter objection goes to the weight of the testimony. In 28 Ruling Case Law, 151, it is said:

> "On the issue of undue influence, declarations of a testator are admissible in evidence when they are part of the res gestæ, but it is not essential that statements made by him should be of the res gestæ to render them admissible, though their value as evidence diminishes in proportion as they are remote from the date of the will."

[10] As to the objection that the state of mind of the testator was not germane to the issue of undue influence, the matter is thus analyzed in an authoritative text on Evidence:

> "Where undue influence or fraud is the issue, three uses of the evidence present themselves. The testator's utterances * * * may be offered either as indirect evidence of the testator's condition of mind-weakness, susceptibility to importunities, and the like—or as declarations of a state of mind (under the present exception), assertions of affection or dislike, etc.,—and are thus admissible; his condition of mind, intelligence and strength of purpose, feelings toward this or that person, being all circumstances which bear on the fact of undue influence; the propriety of this use is universally recognized.
> "Again, the question whether a will was made under undue influence is, in one aspect, a question whether the testamentary intentions and wishes represented in it are the normal ones of the testator, or whether, relatively to his known usual and constant state of mind, they are abnormal. It thus becomes important to learn what was the normal condition of his affections, wishes and testamentary intentions, for the purpose of establishing this standard of normality. As evidence of these affections, intentions, etc. —either by circumstantial inference or under the present exception for declarations of a state of mind—his utterances at various times before or after execution (including expressions of affection or the opposite, previous wills or statements of intention, etc.) may be resorted to. This use of such evidence is also universally accepted." 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) p. 261 et seq.

[11] Appellant objects to the admission of the testimony of Mrs. Langworthy to the effect that Mrs. Logan had admitted on Saturday, June 16th, that she knew Maescher's mind had weakened, but that she was relying upon the fact that his brothers did not know this. It is objected that this statement of Mrs. Logan could not bind the other beneficiaries under the will, and was not admissible against them. This objection is undoubtedly sound. However, as this evidence was directed to the issue of mental incompetency, upon which the jury has found against the contestants, no prejudice has resulted to the beneficiaries under the will. That issue and the evidence upon it have not been discussed herein because the special verdict of the jury upon that question has eliminated it from consideration here.

[12] Objection is made to certain testimony of the witness Mary Graham. She had been employed in Mrs. Logan's household six or seven years before the will contest. She testified that on one occasion when Mr. Maescher was in bed on the sleeping porch Mrs. Logan asked him to give her some flats which he owned, and he said he would not do so. Contestants had set forth in their pleading, and attempted to prove a continuous course of conduct on the part of Mrs. Logan and the exercise of a strong influence over Maescher from the time he first met her until his death. Their theory was that Mrs. Logan separated Maescher from his wife, and gradually and steadily persuaded him to transfer his property to her until she had acquired a large fortune, and then, when he was weakened in mind and body, influenced him to make a will, leaving substantially all the balance of this property to her and her adopted child. The testimony of Mrs. Graham was a link in that alleged chain. If its reception was not justified because of the peculiar theory of the case, nevertheless, we think it was pertinent as showing the close and intimate relationship of the parties. Certainly such a request on the part of Mrs. Logan demonstrated such relationship. The nature of the relationship between a testator and one charged with having unduly influenced him in making a testamentary disposition of his property is always a proper subject-matter for investigation by the jury.

[13] The testimony of the sister of Mrs. Maescher regarding the latter's attention to her home duties and her devotion and kindness to her husband cast light upon the naturalness of the testamentary act. It has repeatedly been held that the injustice and unnaturalness of a will are circumstances to be considered in resolving the issue of undue influence. It would be more unnatural to disinherit a blameless, devoted wife than to disinherit one who had given the testator cause for complaint.

[14] It is contended that the motion to dismiss the action as to Lois Frances Logan, a minor, should have been granted upon the ground that no citation was served upon her guardian in compliance with the requirements of section 1328, Code of Civil Procedure.

The citation was issued to Lottie T. Logan, Lottie T. Logan, as guardian of Lois Frances Logan, a minor, and Lois Frances Logan, a minor. Service was made upon Lottie T. Logan for herself personally, and she was also served as said guardian. Service was also made upon the minor personally. Lottie T. Logan was the natural guardian of said child, having adopted her. Mrs. Logan had also applied for letters of guardianship to care for the estate of said child at the date of the issuance of the citation. The objection to the service is made by the appellants because Lottie T. Logan had not qualified as such guardian of the estate of Lois Frances Logan by filing the necessary bond at the time the citation was served upon her. While this fact creates an irregularity in the service, no prejudice resulted to the minor therefrom under the facts of this case. Less than a month after said service Mrs. Logan was appointed guardian ad litem of the minor, and thereupon filed an answer for herself and on behalf of her ward as said guardian ad litem.

[15, 16] In Estate of Simmons, 168 Cal. 390, 395, 143 P. 697, 698, the court says:

> "It seems entirely clear that, under this statutory scheme, jurisdiction of the subject matter of the contest is vested in the court by the filing of the petition. Mr. Justice Temple, in his concurring opinion in San Francisco Prof. O. A. v. Superior Court, 116 Cal. 443 (48 P. 379), expresses the view that the proceeding is one in rem, and that service of a citation might have been omitted from the statutory procedure because not essential to jurisdiction of the res. But if it be thought that service of the citation has any bearing on the jurisdiction, its office can be only that of a summons in a civil action, viz., to give jurisdiction of the persons of those whose rights would be affected by revocation of the probate. A voluntary appearance would dispense with the necessity of service. Abila v. Padilla, 14 Cal. 106; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467 (117 P. 539). While the issuance of citation within the year is requisite to the maintenance of the contest, and a failure to have it thus issued would, in the absence of an appearance by adverse parties, justify the dismissal of the contest Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 390 (101 P. 8); Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467 (117 P. 539), the proceeding is none the less commenced by the filing of the petition, and the court's jurisdiction of the contest attaches upon such filing. Bacigalupi v. Superior Court, 108 Cal. 92 (40 P. 1055), relied on by respondent, merely holds that, where the petition for revocation had been dismissed, the court was without jurisdiction, after the expiration of a year from probate, to revive the lapsed petition and order a citation issued."

The other objections urged by appellants are unsubstantial. We find no error in the record warranting a reversal of the judgment, and the same is affirmed.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was charged upon an information filed by the district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco with the crime of manslaughter. He was convicted. A motion for a new trial was made and denied.

This is an appeal from the judgment and order. The facts are simple. There is evidence in the record to show that on the 30th day of August, 1925, at about 7 o'clock in the evening, one Martin Thorsen, accompanied by his wife and two young children, a son and daughter, were standing within a safety zone situated on the east side of Mission street at Courtland avenue. The boundary line of the zone was marked upon the surface of the highway and also upon a police standard located on the southerly end thereof. Thorsen and his family were waiting for a north-bound car on Mission street. The evening was clear and it was still daylight. At this time defendant was returning from a picnic in an automobile. He was driving the machine accompanied by a party of friends. As he approached the intersection of the streets named, he was proceeding in a northerly direction along Mission street down the incline which there exists, driving on the car tracks at a speed estimated by witnesses at about 30 miles an hour. As he neared the intersection of the streets, he left the car tracks and drove his car directly into the safety zone, striking Thorsen and his little daughter. His car, after passing over Thorsen, continued on for a distance of some 200 feet when it was brought to a stop. Defendant was then questioned by a police officer as to who was driving the car. This officer testified that defendant had been drinking. By reason of the impact, Thorsen received serious injuries which caused his death some three hours later. His chest and ribs were crushed and his lungs and liver both punctured. The buildings on both sides of Mission street where the deceased met his death are occupied by stores, it being a business district. In proof of this fact, there was offered and received in evidence the testimony of certain police officers. The learned trial court instructed the jury upon this subject in conformity with section 114 (a) of the Motor Vehicle Act as it existed at the time deceased met his death. That section reads as follows:

> "A 'business district' for the purposes of this act shall mean the territory contiguous to a public highway when 50 per cent. or more of the property fronting on such highway for a distance of three hundred feet or more is occupied by buildings in use for wholesale or retail business." Deering's Supp. to Codes and General Laws 1925, p. 710.

As ground for reversal appellant contends that the trial court erred in permitting the police officers to testify concerning the character of the neighborhood of Mission street where deceased was struck, and that it likewise erred in not properly instructing the jury upon this subject. This contention is based upon the provisions of section 114, subdivision (c) of the Motor Vehicle Act. It reads as follows:

> "Every public highway shall be deemed to be outside of a business or residence district unless sign posted, as provided in this act, and in any action at law, either civil or criminal, every public highway shall be conclusively presumed to be outside of a business or residential district unless its existence within a business or residential district shall be established by clear and competent evidence as to the nature of the district and as to the presence of such signs as are required by this act." Deering's Supp. to Codes and General Laws, p. 710.

We do not think appellant is in any position to raise these objections. An officer of the police department in charge of such work had prepared a photographic diagram of the intersection of Courtland avenue and Mission street which showed, among other things, the width of the streets and the location of the safety zone. This diagram was admitted without objection. Upon cross-examination counsel for appellant brought out the fact that the buildings on both sides of Mission street at this point are all occupied by stores. Another police officer on his cross-examination was likewise interrogated and testified that he had made an examination of the neighborhood and that 50 per cent. of the property was used for business purposes. Moreover, there is other evidence in the record which was not objected to, which shows conclusively that the district was a business one. The photographic diagram was in evidence, and one of the witnesses for defendant testified on his direct examination, in response to questions put to him by counsel for defendant, that "there are all stores in that block there." Then again defendant asked for no instruction upon the subject, and it was a matter upon which there was and could be no dispute or question. See Varco v. Lee, 180 Cal. 338, 181 P. 223. Here no objection is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence, and, if there was any error by reason of the instruction, the error certainly did not result in a miscarriage of justice.

As above recited, there is evidence to show that defendant drove his machine into a safety zone in a reckless manner and at a speed greater than was reasonable or proper, and that he had been drinking. Under these circumstances, it is hard to see how the jury could have reached a different verdict.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COKER. (Crim. No. 897.)

1. Criminal law 🔑564(3)—Evidence as to finding of deceased and instrument similar to one used in killing deceased in particular county held sufficient to establish venue of offense.

Evidence that deceased's body was found in automobile in particular county under circumstances justifying conclusion that car was not driven there by deceased after he was wounded, and that instrument similar to one used in killing deceased was found in defendant's car in same county, held sufficient to establish venue of offense, and to justify conclusion that homicide occurred in such county.

2. Criminal law 🔑404(3).

Blood-stained ice pick, which defendant admitted he used in killing deceased, found to have been mortally wounded by long, sharp instrument, held properly admitted.

3. Criminal law 🔑404(3)—Ice pick, admitted by defendant to have been used in stabbing deceased, held admissible to corroborate defendant's statements as to where it would be found, and how he used it.

Blood-stained ice pick, with which defendant admitted stabbing deceased found dead from wounds inflicted by long sharp instrument, held admissible to corroborate defendant's statements as to where pick would be found, and as to how he used it, but not necessary to establish corpus delicti.

4. Criminal law 🔑404(3), 517(4)—Homicide 🔑228(2)—Finding of person dead from wounds not self-inflicted establishes corpus delicti, which admits statement of defendant and instrument used to commit offense.

Finding of body of person dead or mortally wounded by wounds that he could not have self-inflicted, and his following death, establishes corpus delicti and fact that homicide had been committed, which admits statements of defendant unobjected to and instrument used to commit offense.

5. Homicide 🔑228(2)—Evidence held to establish fact of homicide irrespective of statements of defendant.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was charged by the district attorney of Butte county with the crime of murder alleged to have been committed on the 3d day of August in the county of Butte. The trial resulted in a conviction of manslaughter. The defendant's motion for a new trial having been denied, this appeal is prosecuted from the order denying the defendant's motion and from the judgment of conviction. The points relied upon for a reversal are that the corpus delicti was not established either by circumstantial or direct evidence so as to admit of the statements or confession of the defendant, and also that the venue of the offense was not sufficiently established. The testimony bearing upon these two points set out in the transcript is as follows: Harold Teeter, a witness called by the people, testified:

"I live in Chico. I am 18 years old. I am the son of Mark Teeter. My father was stabbed on Sunday night, August 2d, around 12 o'clock, or on Monday morning, August 3d. It was just about midnight. I knew my father. I saw him after he was dead. I know as a matter of fact that my father is dead. He died in the Enloe Hospital. That is in Butte county, Cal. I last saw my father at the Enloe Hospital. I went to the Enloe Hospital about 10:30 Monday morning. The people at the hospital sent for me. I was living with my father. We were living out on Ninth and La Burnum."

Doctor N. T. Enloe, a witness called by the prosecution, testified as follows:

"My name is N. T. Enloe, and I am a duly licensed and practicing physician and surgeon in this county, and have been for 24 years. During the early morning of August 3d I had occasion to treat one Mark Teeter for certain wounds he had received. Mr. Teeter died as a result of those wounds. The nature of the wounds that he died of were small puncture wounds. There were four around the nipple, and one in the back about half way between the spine and the scapula—the shoulder blade, toward the lower point of the blade, and the other one was on the exterior surface of the left arm. As I remember it, there were four around the left nipple, one in the back, and one in the arm. The wounds were not self-inflicted. I can tell scientifically. In my opinion the wounds were not caused by an accident. I examined the wounds, and treated the man for them. In my opinion the instrument that caused those wounds would be a small sharp pointed instrument and long."

On cross-examination, the doctor further testified:

"I really do not know when I first saw Mark Teeter on the 3d of August. It was early in the morning some time; I do not remember what time. I do not know how many hours that was after he was brought to the hospital. As I remember it, when I examined the wounds, I found four punctures on the left side close to the nipple. As to what I found about those wounds that caused me to say that they could not have been self-inflicted, it would be practically impossible for a man to stand up and jab himself four times in succession, and on the wounds in the back, it would be absolutely impossible for him to get to it. * * * It would be practically impossible for the wounds in front or back to be self-inflicted. I do not know which particular wound caused the death of the man. I don't know if it was the wound on the back that caused the death. It was not the wound in the arm that caused the death. It might have been the wounds on the left chest. The contributing cause of the death of Mark Teeter was the puncture wounds with external hemorrhage. The deceased was intoxicated. As to the question of alcohol having anything to do with his death, his weakened condition made him less able to stand the shock of the puncture wounds. If he had not had the alcohol, I don't know whether he would have survived. No one could say whether he would have survived or not. The fact that the man was intoxicated and in a weakened condition made him more susceptible to the injury. I do not know what particular instrument caused those wounds—only a long sharp pointed instrument. In my opinion those wounds which I found were wounds which were caused by a sharp pointed long instrument. I performed an autopsy. The findings in that regard were a puncture in the left lung, and I do not remember which one of them went through it. His heart was on the right side. The heart is usually on the left side. I don't remember how long I treated Mark Teeter in the hospital, but about half a day I should judge. I have no way by which I could tell which one of the wounds was directly responsible for the puncture. As to any way of my determining which of the wounds was responsible for the puncture found in the autopsy, I say I found it at that time, but I do not remember which one it was. As to the drinking being a contributing cause to his decease, his weakened condition from drinking probably had something to do with it. The wounds were the immediate cause of the death of Mr. Teeter."

The testimony shows that, after the defendant had made his statement to the arresting officer, the arresting officer went to the place indicated by the defendant, and there found the deceased in an automobile, wounded as herein described; that the deceased was taken to the Enloe Hospital, where he died; also that the officers found a certain ice pick in an automobile belonging to the defendant, which was a long pointed instrument.

L. E. Newton, a witness for the prosecution, testified as follows:

"I am constable of Chico township and deputy sheriff of this county. I know the defendant Mr. Coker. I got that ice pick on or about the early morning of August 3d of this year. I got it out of Mr. Coker's car; it had blood stains on it at that time. I saw Mr. Coker on that occasion; that is early on the morning of August 3, 1925. I saw him in the police station in Chico about 12:30 on the morning of August 3d just after midnight. Mr. Coker and Johnnie Boyle were there. It was at the police station. The defendant made a statement that he had had a little trouble out to the house, and to get an ambulance and go out and bring the man in that he had trouble with. He said he thought he had killed him. He said the man was Mr. Teeter.

"Q. Now what else, if anything, Mr. Newton, did Mr. Coker tell you at that time? A. There was not very much more said right at that time because I was in a hurry to go out to the place where the trouble took place.

"Q. Now then afterwards, Mr. Newton, did he say anything further to you? (To which question defendant objected that the corpus delicti had not been proven.)

"The Court: As far as the corpus delicti is concerned, I have stated in regard to that, but that foundation is too late. As far as the corpus delicti is concerned, if that is not proven, the testimony will go out.

"Q. Did he make any other statements to you, Mr. Newton— A. No; I asked him if he killed him, and he said he did not know, but he intended to.

"Q. That is, Coker said that he intended to kill Teeter. A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did you have any further conversation with him, Mr. Newton, at a later time? A. Not until the next morning.

"Q. Do you know whether or not at that time Mr. Coker was informed of his legal rights; that is, that he did not have to say anything? A. He was.

"Q. Will you tell us if you can remember anything that he said at that time? A. He said he expected he would stretch hemp for what he had done."

Johnnie Boyle, a witness, called by the people, testified as follows:

"I am a police officer of the city of Chico. I was on duty as a police officer about midnight August 2d, and early in the morning of August 3d of this year. I have seen that ice pick before. I put that tag on there myself; that is my handwriting. I saw Mr. Newton getting it out of Mr. Coker's car which was across the street from the city hall. I know the defendant, Mr. Coker. I saw him on the night of August 2d or early on the morning of August 3d of this year. No one else was present when I first saw him. It was about 12:30. I was on duty at the desk. The defendant was not under arrest at that time.

"Q. Did you have any conversation with the defendant, Coker, about this time, Mr. Boyle? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Tell the conversation.

"Mr. Goldstein: I will object to it further on the ground that the corpus delicti has not been raised or established, and it is incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant. (Objection overruled.) A. Well, he asked me where the officers were, and I said they were all out on duty, and he then asked me if there was an unwritten law here, and I answered him by saying that I didn't know anything about it, about an unwritten law, and he then said 'You better get an ambulance and send him out to Ninth and La Burnum, and get a man that is out there if he is not dead,' and at that same time he took the knife out of his pocket and laid it up on the counter, and said, 'This is all I have got,' and he said, 'Here I am,' and I told him that that was outside of the city limits, and he would have to get the constable, and so I called Newton up. And in the meantime Tom Hinderman stepped in; he is a police officer of Chico, and in a few minutes Officer Newton came, and I asked him (Mr. Coker) what the trouble was, and he said, 'We had a row out there,' and he said, 'That is the second time this thing has occurred,' and he said, 'I am not going to stand for it.' And, 'that time my family has been broken up, and I ain't going to stand for it any more,' and I asked him, I said, 'Was it a gun fight?' and he said, 'No, I run an ice pick into him,' and he said 'that he ought to have got her too.' And he said, 'The ice pick is over in my car across the street,' and I looked across the street out of the window, and saw the car parked there, and Mr. Newton stepped in in a short time, and he wanted to go out with us, Mr. Coker did, and I said, 'No, you better stay here with Mr. Hinderman until we come back,' and we got into Mr. Newton's car and drove to Ninth and La Burnum, and we turned into the alley. The house was lighted up, and, prior to that —I am ahead of my story—Mr. Coker directed us into the alley. He said the car was just west of the house in the alley, and we turned into the alley, and the car was not there, and we went down the alley 60 or 80 yards, and there we found the car jambed up against a shed or barn. And we drove alongside of it, and on the west side, and Mr. Newton got out of the car, and went around behind Mr. Coker's car, and opened the door. I got out, and Mr. Teeter was in the car, and he was lying with his head to the west and his feet was out over the east door. Mr. Newton went around behind the car, and we both put him in Mr. Newton's car, and we drove to the hospital with him, and there we took him into the hospital. I looked at my watch, and it was 20 minutes after one, and we left the hospital then, and came to the police station, and parked our car, and went over to Mr. Coker's car, and Mr. Newton looked in the front seat, and he found the ice pick lying in the front seat there, and we took it into the police station.

"Q. It was the same ice pick—this is the same ice pick, is it, Mr. Newton (exhibiting ice pick to witness)? A. Yes, that is the same pick.

"Q. And you saw Mr. Newton pick it up? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And you put the tag on it? A. Yes, sir; I put the tag on it, and I put that knife in the envelope, and put it in the safe.

"Mr. Rothe: We will ask to have this ice pick introduced in evidence as People's Exhibit A.

"Mr. Goldstein: To which we will object on the ground that it is incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, and the proper foundation has not been laid, and there is not anything to connect this defendant with the ice pick.

"The Court: The objection will be overruled.

"Mr. Rothe: We will ask to have it marked People's Exhibit No. 1. (The ice pick is admitted in evidence, and marked People's Exhibit No. 1 by the clerk.)

"Mr. Rothe: Q. All you have testified to, Mr. Boyle, occurred in Butte county, Cal., did it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What time was it you say you first got this call, or that you first saw Mr. Coker come into the police station? A. That was about half-past 12. I took some notes on it at the time, and looked at my watch, and it was half-past 12.

"Q. And it was then that he told you that, that he—or said that he had used an ice pick on this man Teeter, is it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That is just a little after midnight that he told you this? A. Yes, sir."

By the testimony of the witness Boyle is shown, not simply the admission or statements of the defendant that he had stabbed the deceased, but that the body or person of the deceased was found in a car in such a condition as to justify the jury in coming to the conclusion that it was physically impossible for the deceased to have driven the car to that place; that the deceased was taken to a hospital in Chico; that the instrument with which the defendant said he had stabbed the deceased was found in the defendant's car, all took place in the county of Butte, not merely, as argued by appellant, that the conversation took place in the county of Butte. In the case of People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 202 P. 51, the court, in passing upon the question of venue, uses language pertinent to the questions we are considering:

> "It is claimed that there was no proof of venue. It is argued that because the venue depends, not upon where the dead body may be found, but upon the place where the mortal wound was inflicted, it may not be inferred that the deceased was killed in Los Angeles county. The objection lacks merit. The venue, like any other fact in a criminal case, may be established by circumstantial evidence. And though no witness testified that Denton was murdered in Los Angeles county, the conviction being based entirely on circumstantial evidence, it is uncontradicted that the body was found in the city of Los Angeles, in the basement of the house that Denton had leased to defendant, many miles from the county line, covered with a mound of dirt, canvas, and other articles, showing that the body had been placed there by someone. This evidence, unexplained, was sufficient to justify the jury in concluding that the homicide was committed in Los Angeles county. In Hawkins v. State, 60 Neb. 380 (83 N. W. 198), it was held that 'evidence of the finding of the headless body of the person alleged to have been murdered in an old well which had been subsequently filled, situate in Frontier county, is sufficient, in the absence of other proof, to warrant the jury in concluding that the homicide was committed in that county.' To the same effect is People v. Kamaunu, 110 Cal. 609 (42 P. 1090). See, also, Wharton on Homicide, pp. 901, 902."

[1] In the instant case the body of a man mortally wounded is found in an automobile, under circumstances which impel the conclusion that the car was not driven by the deceased after the infliction of the mortal wounds, the taking of deceased to a hospital, where an examination disclosed that the deceased had upon his person wounds which could not have been self-inflicted, that the character of the wounds indicated that a long sharp instrument had been used, and that an instrument with which a like wound could be inflicted was found in the defendant's car with blood upon it, all in the county of Butte, we think sufficiently established the venue of the offense, and justified the jury in coming to the conclusion that he had been killed in the county of Butte.

[2-4] It is also argued by the appellant that the court erred in admitting the ice pick in evidence, and cites the case of People v. Hill, 123 Cal. 571, 56 P. 443, as authority for this contention. An examination of the Hill Case shows that there is no evidence identifying the stick which was admitted in evidence as the one with which the defendant in that case struck the deceased. In the case at bar the homicide is fully established by the testimony of Dr. Enloe that the deceased was mortally wounded by a long sharp instrument. It is also shown by the doctor's testimony that the wounds were of such a nature as to be practically impossible of self-infliction; that the deceased came to his death by reason of such wounds. Again, the ice pick is admissible in connection with the defendant's statement as to where it would be found and as to how he had used it. It is corroborative of the defendant's statement, but is not a necessary part of the testimony to establish the corpus delicti. As shown by the cases cited in this opinion, the finding of the body of a person either dead or mortally wounded by wounds that he could not have self-inflicted, and his following death, establishes the corpus delicti, and the fact that a homicide has been committed, which in turn, under the authorities, admits the statement of the defendant, when there are no other objections to its admissibility, and this, in turn, admits the ice pick as a means or instrumentality by which the offense was committed.

In 8 Cal. Jur. 165, in giving a definition of the term "corpus delicti," we find the further statement that—

> "Proof of the corpus delicti does not involve proof that the crime was committed by the defendant or the person charged with committing it. Consequently, mere proof of the defendant's connection with the crime is not sufficient, on the one hand, to establish the corpus delicti, and, on the other, it is not necessary in order to establish the essential elements of the crime to prove the defendant's connection with it. Yet, proof of the criminal agency frequently involves proof of the defendant's guilt."

In section 248, same volume, the rule is stated that the corpus delicti may be established by direct or circumstantial evidence, though it cannot be established by the extrajudicial confessions of the defendant:

> "The corpus delicti may be established by direct or circumstantial evidence. But it cannot be established by the extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the defendant, or, as the rule is frequently expressed, a conviction cannot be had on the extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the defendant unless corroborated by proof aliunde of the corpus delicti. While slight proof of the corpus delicti has in many cases been held to be a sufficient basis for the admission of confessions, it is nevertheless true that all the elements of the crime must be made to appear before a defendant's extrajudicial admissions or confessions are admissible for any purpose, and they cannot be used to establish any necessary element for the commission of the crime. Yet, it is not required that full proof of the body of the crime be made independently of the confession, that is to say, that the evidence, other than the admissions and declarations of the defendant, establish the commission of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. The admission or confession is admissible in support of any element of the crime to which it applies, otherwise it would be useless except to prove the agency of the accused."

In this particular, the appellant relies upon the case of People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 63

P. 1001, where the defendant was convicted of murder and the body of the deceased more or less consumed by fire. The court said:

> "A great deal of his body [the deceased] had been entirely consumed by the fire; still, we think, it was sufficiently identified as the body of the deceased. But the evidence of the other facts necessary to make full proof of the corpus delicti—that is, that his death was caused by criminal means used by another person and not by his own act or by accident—was very slight. We hardly think that any jury would have found that a murder had been committed without certain evidence tending somewhat to connect appellant with the crime charged, and particularly without the testimony of another Indian, named Francisco (who was comparatively a stranger to appellant), to the effect that appellant had made a confession to him that he (appellant) killed the deceased."

This excerpt shows that the circumstances in that case are readily distinguishable from those of the case at bar. Here we have all the elements necessary to show the fact of a homicide, irrespective of any statement of the defendant. In the Tapia Case, the building in which the deceased's body was found by the neighbor was destroyed by fire without evidence as to the origin of the fire. In the case at bar, the testimony is that the deceased was mortally wounded in a manner which was practically impossible to have been self-inflicted, and completely meets the further statement of the rule found in the Tapia Case, where it is said:

> "It is well-settled law that the corpus delicti must be established independently of evidence which merely tends to connect the defendant with the crime charged; and independently of any asserted extrajudicial admissions or confessions of the party charged, and that such admissions or confessions cannot be considered as evidence of the corpus delicti. In People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345 [40 P. 440], this court declared the rule as follows: 'The term "corpus delicti" involves the elements of crime,' and that 'defendant's admissions cannot be used to establish any necessary element in the commission of the crime' "—citing a number of cases.

[5] The testimony further shows all the elements, as we have said, of the crime, to wit, the commission of a homicide without any reference whatever to the admissions or statements or confession of the defendant. We also think the case of People v. Frank, 2 Cal. App. 283, 83 P. 578, relied upon by appellant, is inapplicable to the case at bar. The definition of the term "corpus delicti" there given is substantially as we have herein set forth. The finding of a dead body alone does not establish, as held in that case, the corpus delicti, but, as held in that case, it must be shown that death is the result of criminal agency, which conditions are fully and completely met in the case at bar. See, also, People v. Flores, 34 Cal. App. 393, 167 P. 113; People v. Britt, 62 Cal. App. 674, 217 P. 767.

Under the New York Code of Criminal Procedure, providing that the confession of a defendant shall not be sufficient without additional proof that the crime charged has been committed, the finding of the dead body of a murdered man, with the unmistakable marks of a murder committed, is sufficient additional proof to warrant the conviction of a defendant on his own confession. Kerr on Homicide, § 494; 3 Rice on Criminal Evidence, § 293; People v. Deacons, 109 N. Y. 374, 16 N. E. 676.

Other cases might be cited upon the question of the sufficiency of the proof in this case to establish the corpus delicti, and also show the sufficiency of the proof as to venue, but we think the foregoing sufficient to show that the defendant was justly convicted. The order and the judgment appealed from are affirmed.

1. Corporations ⚷215.

Stockholders' liability under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, is distinct and separate from that of corporation, and cannot be extended by corporation.

2. Corporations ⚷237.

Corporation's payment on debt held not assumption of indebtedness, fixing personal liability on stockholders who acquired stock after debt was incurred, but before such payment.

3. Corporations ⚷269(2).

Assignment of claim against corporation, which was not dated, and did not state that it covered right of action against stockholders, held properly excluded, in action to enforce stockholders' liability.

4. Corporations ⚷268(5)—In action to enforce stockholders' liability for corporate debts, variance between allegations that indebtedness was for goods sold and delivered and proof that debt was for overpayment to corporation held fatal (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470).

In action to enforce stockholders' liability for corporate debts, variance bteween allegations that indebtedness was for goods sold and delivered and proof that debt was for an overpayment to corporation held fatal, where pleading could not be amended, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 469, 470, owing to statute of limitations.

5. Dismissal and nonsuit ⚷58(5).

Material variance is ground for nonsuit, unless pleader obtains leave to amend pleading to conform to proof.

Stockholders' liability held unenforceable by assignee of creditor, where alleged assignment was never offered in evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by Josephine M. Cordes, executrix under the last will and testament of W. F. Cordes, deceased, substituted plaintiff for W. F. Cordes, deceased, against John Paulson. Judgment for defendant on his motion for nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. A. Harrison, Maurice E. Harrison, and Byron F. Stone Jr., all of San Francisco, for appellant.

L. P. Farnham, and Duard F. Geis, both of Willows, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action to enforce stockholder's liability. The defendant had judgment on his motion for nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges the existence of a California corporation known as and called "California Marketing Exchange," having an authorized capital stock of $100,000, divided into 4,000 shares, of the par value of $25 each; that at all times between September 13, 1920, and February 28, 1921, inclusive, the defendant was the owner of 20 shares of the capital stock of said corporation; that between September 13 and September 24, 1920, the number of shares issued was 130, and between September 24, 1920, and February 28, 1921, inclusive, the whole number of subscribed and issued shares of the capital stock of said corporation was 140. The complaint then sets forth five separate causes of action, which causes of action it is alleged were assigned to W. F. Cordes, deceased, and constituted the basis of his action herein. In these several causes of action the plaintiff alleges indebtedness by the corporation, and, by reason of such indebtedness, seeks to hold the defendant for his proportionate share thereof.

[1] Section 3 of article 12 of the Constitution of the state of California and section 322 of the Civil Code provide that each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities, contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation. As set forth in 6 California Jurisprudence, p. 997, § 378:

> "Although the liability of stockholders must have its origin and inception in some act of the corporation, it is distinct and separate from that of the corporation. * * * The corporation has nothing to do with the liability of stockholders after it arises. That is strictly a matter between creditors and stockholders, not as corporators, but as individuals. * * * The corporation is powerless to extend a stockholder's liability by a new promise or by an agreement extending the period of the statute of limitations or by changing the form of indebtedness."

In Ellsworth v. Bradford, 186 Cal. 316, 199 P. 335, the liability of stockholders as distinct from that of the corporation, and also the powerlessness of the corporation after the liability or debt has been created to affect or change the same, is thus set forth:

> "Recognizing, as we must, that the stockholder becomes liable to the corporation's creditors solely as an original debtor, and not in any way as a surety or guarantor for the corporation, and that this liability arises by operation of law from the creation and existence of the debt, not through any power of the corporation to bind him to personal liability for its obligations, it would seem requisite to fixing such liability in an action against the stockholder to prove the facts establishing the corporate debt. The law makes the act of the corporation creating a corporate liability binding on the stockholders, but it does not extend the power of the corporation any further in the matter or authorize it to represent the stockholder in putting up a defense against his personal indebtedness. The limitation of the authority of the corporation to in any way enlarge or extend or renew the stockholder's statutory liability is declared in the decisions of this court holding the corporation powerless to extend such liability by a new promise, or by agreement extending the period of the statute of limitations, or by changing the form of the indebtedness. Hyman v. Coleman, 82 Cal. 650, 23 P. 62, 16 Am. St. Rep. 178; Winona Wagon Co. v. Bull, 108 Cal. 1, 40 P. 1077. In Winona Wagon Co. v. Bull, supra, this court adopts the following language from Trippe v. Huncheon, 82 Ind. 307, as to the relation of the corporation to stockholders' liability: 'The corporation has nothing to do with this liability, nor has it the right or power to represent its members as to this individual obligation. It is a matter between the creditors of the corporation and its members, not as corporators, but as individuals.' "

Other authorities might be cited to the same effect, but the foregoing make it clear that, after the debt or liability is incurred, no subsequent acknowledgment thereof, no subsequent promise by the corporation, no matter what the form of the act by the corporation may take, can extend the liability of the stockholder, or create any new or additional obligation to be kept or performed by the stockholder.

In several of the alleged causes of action, set forth in the complaint, the appellant relies upon letters by officers of the corporation showing the existence of the indebtedness before the defendant became a stockholder and for a considerable period thereafter, and upon this basis seeks to hold the defendant. The authorities which we have cited clearly establish the fact that the liability of the corporation is distinct and separate from that of the stockholder, and while the letters written by officers of a corporation may evidence the circumstances of an indebtedness of the corporation they are immaterial as to the liability of a stockholder. A considerable portion of the briefs of counsel have been consumed in a discussion of the law as to what admissions of indebtedness of corporations made by its officers may be admitted in evidence in an action against a stockholder, but, from a careful inspection of the record, as will hereafter appear, we are satisfied the question of the admissibility of such testimony is not really involved in this case, by reason of the fact that the letters referring to the indebtedness of the corporation do not refer to debts contracted while the defendant was a stockholder, save and except in one instance, where a letter accompanying a check specified that the payment was to be applied upon a particular indebtedness while the defendant was a stockholder, and anything we might say would be unnecessary to a decision of this case, and therefore obiter as to the admissibility of the acknowledgment of an indebtedness of a corporation by the officers thereof.

With this preliminary statement as to the law by which this case is governed, we will consider the various causes of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint, following the order therein, although the proofs as introduced upon the trial did not do so.

[2] For his first cause of action the complaint alleges that "between September 13, 1920, and September 23, 1920, the said California Marketing Exchange incurred an indebtedness and became and is indebted to Rosenberg Bros. & Co., in the sum of $850.95 for goods sold and delivered between said last-mentioned dates to said corporation by said Rosenberg & Co." to the California Marketing Exchange. In support of this allegation the plaintiff offered correspondence between California Marketing Exchange and Rosenberg Bros. & Co., as follows:

A letter, dated September 3, 1920, written by the secretary of the California Marketing Exchange to Rosenberg Bros. & Co., the material portion of which is in these words:

> "We have your letter of August 30th in regard to balance due you for feed stuffs. According to our books we are indebted to you to the amount $1,521.19; statement inclosed."

And a subsequent letter, dated October 9, 1920, written to Rosenberg Bros. & Co., by the manager of the California Marketing Exchange, from which it appears that California Marketing Exchange then and there forwarded to Rosenberg Bros. & Co. a check for the sum of $503.33 payment on account. A few other letters between the respective corporations were also introduced, but none of them show any facts further than indicated by the two letters from which we have quoted.

The appellant's claim that the letter of October 9, 1920, is an assumption of the indebtedness by the corporation, California Marketing Exchange, so as to fix the liability of a stockholder as of that date is without merit. It clearly appears that no indebtedness or liability whatsoever was incurred during the period of time the defendant was a stockholder of the California Marketing Exchange. The indebtedness of the corporation was all incurred before he became a stockholder, and the fact that payment on the indebtedness was thereafter made by the corporation, while he was a stockholder, does not in any wise change or affect his liability. The further correspondence referred to herein relates to a discussion as to the giving of notes payable so many days after date for the remainder due on the account. Whether such notes were or were not given the record does not disclose. What we have said suffices to show that the trial court committed no error in granting a nonsuit as to the plaintiff's alleged first cause of action, irrespective of whether the defendant's objection to the want of a sufficient assignment by Rosenberg Bros. & Co. to the plaintiff of its claim against the California Marketing Exchange was or was not well taken.

[3] For his second cause of action the plaintiff alleges:

> That the "California Marketing Exchange, between September 24, 1920, and February 28 1921, became indebted to Albers Bros. Milling Company in the sum of $5,146.76, and that prior to the beginning of this action Albers Bros. Milling Company sold, assigned, and transferred to the plaintiff all its right, title, and claim to recover for said goods sold and delivered as herein set forth."

In support of its second cause of action the plaintiff introduced testimony to the effect that, prior to the time when the defendant became a stockholder in the California Marketing Exchange, the Albers Bros. Milling Company had sold to the California Marketing Exchange, a considerable quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise, and also between September 30 and November 12, 1920, sold and delivered certain specified articles of merchandise to the California Marketing Exchange, and then attempted to show the plaintiff's right to maintain an action against this defendant on account thereof by reason of the following alleged assignment, to the introduction of which the defendant's objection was sustained:

"Creditor's Assignment of Claim.

"Board of Trade of San Francisco.

"In the Matter of California Marketing Exchange, Willows, California.

"Dated, San Francisco, ———, 192—.

"In consideration of one dollar, and other good and valuable considerations to us severally paid by the assignee next hereinafter mentioned, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, we hereby sell, assign, and transfer to W. F. Cordes, our claims and demands against the first above named in the amounts hereinafter set forth, and we severally authorize said assignee to enforce the payment of the same, by legal remedies or otherwise, for his use and benefit.

"Witness our hands, with the several amounts of said claims and demands placed opposite thereto.

"Albers Bros. Milling Co., $5,256.60.
"[Seal] By Bert M. Denison, Secretary."

No testimony was introduced otherwise as to when said assignment was executed, or whether it did or did not, or was or was not intended to, cover the right of action, if any, possessed by the Albers Bros. Milling Company against this defendant. The alleged assignment simply stands alone in the record, and, without discussing the question as to whether the secretary was or was not shown to have been authorized to execute assignments, it is sufficient to say that the court's ruling in excluding the assignment upon the showing made was not erroneous, and therefore the judgment of nonsuit as to the plaintiff's second alleged cause of action was properly entered.

[4] For his third alleged cause of action, the plaintiff alleged that the California Marketing Exchange, between September 24, 1920 and February 28, 1921, became indebted to the Western Meat Company, a corporation, in the sum of $395.60 for goods sold and delivered between said dates by said Western Meat Company to the California Marketing Exchange, and that said cause of action had been regularly and duly assigned by the Western Meat Company to the plaintiff. The record shows that on or about October 20, 1920, the Western Meat Company purchased from the California Marketing Exchange a certain carload lot of hogs; that on or about the 23d day of October, 1920, the Western Meat Company forwarded a draft in favor of the California Marketing Exchange on account of said carload of hogs in the sum of $1,500, before the arrival of said hogs, under the belief that a full carload of hogs had been shipped. Upon the arrival of the hogs it was found that a full carload had not been shipped, and that the Western Meat Company had overpaid the California Marketing Exchange in the sum of $400. This overdraft, or to recover for money had and received from the Western Meat Company, is the basis upon which plaintiff founds his third cause of action. The defendant objected to the introduction of such testimony, which was produced by way of a deposition and also moved for a nonsuit on the ground of variance between the allegations and the proof.

Upon this appeal, the appellant relies upon cases where one may waive a tort and sue for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, but we do not see the applicability of such authorities to the case at bar. The Western Meat Company had not sold any hogs to the California Marketing Exchange. The California Marketing Exchange had sold a lot of hogs to the Milling Company, and were simply overpaid the value thereof. The record does not show that any particular lot of hogs were sold by the California Marketing Exchange to the Western Meat Company; simply from the record it can only be inferred that the Western Meat Company had ordered a carload of hogs from the California Marketing Exchange, and the California Marketing Exchange delivered a partial carload, and drew upon and obtained from the Western Meat Company some $400 more than it was entitled to. It does not appear from the record that when the defendant's objection was interposed to the variance between the proof and the allegations, or when the defendant's motion for a nonsuit upon such ground was made, the appellant attempted to take advantage of the provisions of either section 469 or section 470 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The reason, therefore, however, is evident from an inspection of the dates appearing in the record, because at the time of the trial, had the plaintiff's claim been otherwise sufficiently well grounded, the statute of limitations had run against the possibility of pleading plaintiff's third cause of action against the defendant on account of the matters attempted to be proven showing the overdraft.

[5] From a reading of the complaint, it is evident that, as to the third cause of action, the defendant, a stockholder and not an officer of the corporation, would be led only to make inquiries as to whether $395.60 worth of goods, wares, and merchandise were actually sold by the Western Meat Company to the California Marketing Exchange during the time he was a stockholder thereof, and, not finding any such testimony, consider the allegations unfounded, and not that the cause of action was really for money had and received by reason of an overdraft. As set forth in section 183, p. 263, 21 California Jurisprudence, such a variance is fatal to one's right of action to recover unless the pleading is amended or the objection waived. "A material variance is ground for nonsuit, even though the evidence was admitted without objection, unless the pleader obtains leave to amend his pleading so as to make it conform to the proof." See cases also there cited. Section 181 of the same volume sets forth the rule that the proof and the allegations must correspond. The pleading cannot be amended in this case, for the reasons we have stated, and it follows that the court's order directing a nonsuit as to the plaintiff's alleged third cause of action was properly entered.

[6] For his fourth cause of action, the plaintiff alleges that the George H. Croley Company, between the 24th day of September, 1920, and the 28th day of February, 1921, sold and delivered goods, wares, and merchandise to the California Marketing Exchange in the sum of $638.60, and that the claim of the said Croley Company, prior to the beginning of this action, was sold and transferred to the plaintiff herein. Passing by all of the defendant's objections to the sufficiency of the assignment by the Croley Company to the plaintiff, we will consider simply the items claimed to evidence the indebtedness upon which the suit is based. The record shows that on the 11th day of October, 1920, seven tons of feed, amounting in value to the sum of $500, were shipped by the George H. Croley Company either to the California Marketing Bureau or to the California Marketing Exchange. Although apparently overlooked by counsel, the record shows that whether said $500 worth of goods, wares, and merchandise were received by the California Marketing Exchange or California Marketing Bureau is wholly immaterial, by reason of the fact that this particular item of indebtedness has been paid. The transcript sets forth the following letter in relation thereto:

> "California Marketing Exchange, Inc.
> "Willows, California, October 30, 1920.
> "Geo. H. Croley Co., 8th & Townsend, San Francisco, Cal.—Gentlemen: Attention. We are inclosing trade acceptance for $500, being the amount of the last invoice for shipment of October 11th. We will mail another check for $500 early next week, and will pay a like sum every week, or, if you would prefer, we could give you trade acceptances for the balance due, paying the balance in four equal payments, 15 days apart.
> "Yours very truly,
> "California Marketing Exchange, Inc.,
> "E. H. Phreaner, Secretary."

The receipt of which is evidenced by a letter of the Croley Company to the California Marketing Exchange, dated November 3, 1920, which letter is as follows:

> "November 3, 1920.
> "California Marketing Exchange, Willows, California—Gentlemen: Attention Mr. E. H. Phreaner. We are in receipt of your letter of October 30th, with inclosed trade acceptance, for which we thank you. If it is the same to you, we would prefer that you give us trade acceptances for the balance due, paying the balance as you suggested—in four equal payments 15 days apart.
> "Respectfully yours,
> "Geo. H. Croley Company, Inc.,
> "By ———, Asst. Secretary."

By the provisions of the first subdivision of section 1479 of the Civil Code, irrespective of the argument of counsel, it must be held that the $500 canceled the item of indebtedness mentioned in the letters set forth. The subdivision of the section specifically sets forth:

> "If, at the time of performance, the intention or desire of the debtor that such performance should be applied to the extinction of any particular obligation, be manifested to the creditor, it must be so applied."

[7] There remains undischarged in the indebtedness alleged in the fourth cause of action of the complaint the sum of $138.60, which would create a liability, if any, against the defendant, as the owner of one-seventh of the issued capital stock, of the sum of $19.14; but even this indebtedness and liability on the part of the defendant as a stockholder is not sufficiently proven. It appears from the record that the Croley Company had been shipping goods to the California Marketing Bureau and also to the California Marketing Exchange during the year 1920, and that some time during the month of July, 1920, the California Marketing Exchange took over the business of the Bureau; but it does not appear whether the $138.60 worth of goods were shipped to the California Marketing Bureau or to the California Marketing Exchange. The transcript shows the following testimony:

> "Q. Mr. Zwart, will you state the amount of goods shipped and delivered to the California Marketing Bureau or the California Marketing Exchange during the year 1920, giving in each case the character of the goods shipped or value of the goods shipped?"

In answer to this question the witness gave a schedule of the dates of shipment and the value of each shipment, but did not say to whom the goods were shipped. The proof is thus insufficient to show facts and liability on the part of the defendant for the said sum of $19.14, and therefore the defendant's motion for a nonsuit as to plaintiff's fourth cause of action was properly granted.

[8] For his fifth cause of action, the plaintiff alleges that the Union Lithograph Company sold and delivered between the 24th day of September, 1920, and the 28th day of February, 1921, to the California Marketing Exchange, certain goods, wares, and merchandise, of the reasonable value of $419.80, and that prior to the commencement of this action the Union Lithograph Company sold, transferred, and set over all its right, title, and claim to recover from said corporation and from the defendant its right to recover, etc.

The testimony shows the following facts: That on July 8, 1920, the California Marketing Exchange received from the Lithograph Company goods valued in the sum of $220.60; that on the 6th day of November, 1920, the California Marketing Exchange received from the Lithograph Company stationery valued at the sum of $150, and aggregating a total sum of $370.60, upon which a payment was made of the sum of $71, on the 11th day of October, 1920, leaving due thereon from the California Marketing Exchange to the Lithograph Company the sum of $299.60.

[9] As the defendant did not become a stockholder in the California Marketing Exchange until the 13th day of September, 1920, the item of $220.60 is automatically eliminated from consideration. It also appears from the record that the Lithograph Company had also delivered certain stationery to the Glenn Hog Growers' Association prior to the time when the defendant became a member in the California Marketing Exchange, and also had taken over the business of the Glenn County Hog Growers' Association. The plaintiff's claim as to such liability on the part of the defendant is based upon the following letter, to wit:

> "Willows, California, December 22, 1920.
> "Union Lithograph Co., 741 Harrison St., San Francisco, Cal.—Gentlemen: Will you kindly send us a statement of the account which you have against us, and also the Glenn County Hog Growers' Association. The amount due from the Hog Growers should be transferred to our account, as we ordered the supplies. Thanking you for your kind attention, we are, "Yours truly, California Marketing Exchange, Inc.,
> "[Signed] L. M. Bedon."

No proof was introduced as to the official character of the writer of the foregoing letter, and, as stated by the trial court at the time of the introduction, it did not appear that the man who wrote the letter was an officer of the company, but simply that the writing appeared on a sheet of paper bearing the letter head of the California Marketing Exchange. Taken at its best, it would only be an admission of the indebtedness by the corporation and does not evidence the time of the incurring of the liability or the creation of the debt so as to charge the defendant as a stockholder.

[10] This leaves only the sum of $150, for which the defendant, if the proof were otherwise sufficient, would be liable, as the owner of one-seventh of the issued capital stock, in the sum of $21.40. The record shows that the alleged assignment of the Union Lithograph Company was never offered in evidence; it was simply marked as Plaintiff's Exhibit 8 for identification. The case was not tried as though the assignments were offered in evidence and had only been marked for identification. For this reason we need not consider the argued question as to the sufficiency of this alleged assignment, and for the reasons which we have stated we need not consider, the sufficiency of any of the assignments, other than calling attention to the fact that the court did not err in its ruling in relation to the sufficiency of the Albers Bros. Milling Company assignment. A considerable portion of counsel's briefs have been devoted to the question as to the admissibility in testimony of admissions made of indebtedness of a corporation to bind a stockholder thereof; but, as it appears from what we have stated that such questions are not involved, any ruling thereon would be simply the expression of an opinion on issues immaterial to a decision of this case.

It appears from what we have heretofore said that the trial court did not err in granting the defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and hence the judgment of the trial court must be and the same is hereby affirmed.

HIGGINS v. MOGAN, Superior Court Judge. (Civ. 5663.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷938(1).

Where respondent in mandamus to require settlement of bill of exceptions made no appearance, it will be assumed that only defense is that tendered trial court in opposition to settlement of bill.

2. Appeal and error ⚷870(2).

Though order setting aside defendants' default is not appealable, it is reviewable on appeal from judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 956.

3. Exceptions, bill of ⚷51—Judge held required to settle and sign bill of exceptions to order setting aside defendants' default (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 649, 650).

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 649, 650, providing that bill containing exceptions to any decision may be presented for settlement within ten days after written notice of decision and after settlement must be signed by judge, judge must sign and settle bill of exceptions to order setting aside default of appearance of defendants which is presented within ten days, though order is not appealable in itself.

Application by A. W. Higgins, trustee in bankruptcy of the Old Mission Kopper Kraft, Inc., bankrupt, for writ of mandate, to be directed to Hon. E. P. Mogan, Judge of the Superior Court, State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, requiring him to settle and allow plaintiff's proposed bill of exceptions. Peremptory writ granted.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Leandro, for petitioner.

Webster, Eggertsen & Gleason, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an original application to this court for a writ of mandate requiring the respondent judge of the superior court to settle and allow the plaintiff's proposed bill of exceptions. The petition alleges that the plaintiff was a duly appointed and acting trustee in bankruptcy of the Old Mission Kopper Kraft, Inc.; that on August 4, 1925, he commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against two defendants, who were regularly served with process and failed to appear therein, and that on November 19, 1925, the default of both of said defendants was duly entered; that thereafter said defendants moved the superior court to set aside said default; and that on January 8, 1926, said motion was granted, and said defendants were given leave to answer plaintiff's complaint; that notice of said order was not given to the plaintiff until March 2, 1926; and that immediately thereafter plaintiff excepted to said order and prepared his proposed bill of exceptions thereto; that said proposed bill was served upon the said defendants within the time prescribed by law and duly presented to the judge of said court for settlement; that no amendments were proposed thereto by said defendants, but that objections were made by them to the settlement of the bill upon the sole ground that the order setting aside said default was not an appealable order, and was, therefore, not an order to which a special bill of exceptions might be filed; that after hearing upon said objections the judge of said court refused, and still refuses, to settle or allow said bill.

[1-3] Upon the return date of the order to show cause issued by this court no appearance was made on behalf of the respondent, and we are left to assume that the only defense to the issue of a writ of mandate as prayed herein is that tendered to the trial court in opposition to the settlement of the proposed bill. The petitioner herein frankly concedes that the order setting aside the default is not an appealable order, but he insists that under the express provisions of section 649 of the Code of Civil Procedure he is nevertheless entitled to a settlement of his proposed bill. This section of the Code provides in part:

> "A bill containing the exception to any decision may be presented to the court or judge, for settlement at any time after the decision is made, but the same must be presented within 10 days after written notice of making such decision, and after having been settled must be signed by the judge and filed with the clerk."

Section 650 of the same Code provides, in part:

> "When a party desires to have exceptions taken at a trial settled in a bill of exceptions, he may, at any time thereafter, and within 10 days after the entry of judgment * * * prepare the draft of a bill." (Emphasis ours.)

Section 956 of the same Code provides that upon an appeal from a judgment the court may review the verdict or the decision "and any intermediate ruling, proceeding, order or decision which involves the merits or necessarily affects the judgment, or which substantially affects the rights of a party."

Thus, though the order setting aside the defendants' default is not an appealable order, it is nevertheless reviewable upon an appeal from the judgment under the provisions of section 956. In the absence of a bill of exceptions covering the hearing, upon the order to set aside the default an appeal from the judgment would bring up the judgment roll alone, and the merits of the decision upon the order would not, therefore, be open to examination by the appellate court. Though it may be that under section 650 these intermediate orders, such as the one involved here, are to be considered a part of the "trial" so that a single bill of exceptions might cover all these intermediate decisions as well as the final hearing itself, and so may be settled after final judgment (a point which we do not deem necessary to decide in this proceeding), it is evident that the Legislature has prescribed a special mode for the settlement of a separate bill of exceptions to any intermediate decision under the terms of section 649.

Though this section is permissive in its terms, the permission is given to the party aggrieved and not to the trial court. By the express terms of the section a party may present for settlement a special bill of exceptions to any decision within 10 days after notice of the decision, and when settled the bill must be signed by the judge. The clear meaning of the section is that when such a bill is presented to the judge within the time prescribed by the section he must both settle and sign the same. There is nothing in the section or in any other portion of the Code which supports the respondent in his argument that the words, "any decision," mean only a decision from which a separate appeal might be taken.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue to the respondent to settle and sign the proposed bill of exceptions as prayed.

McCONVILLE v. SUPERIOR COURT WITHIN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5322.)

1. Judgment 🔑328.

Order amending clerical error in original judgment held not to supersede judgment or incorporate it into order.

2. Judgment 🔑287, 328—Act of clerk correcting original judgment pursuant to order of court and separately entering order was ministerial, not affecting materiality or finality of judgment or order.

Act of clerk in correcting original judgment pursuant to order of court and separately entering and docketing order was ministerial, and did not affect materiality and finality of judgment or order.

3. Judgment 🔑331.

Not every alteration of judgment by court which rendered it will operate as a readjudication of case.

4. Judgment 🔑331—Change materially affecting judgment and rights of parties against whom it is rendered and involving exercise of judicial discretion amounts to new judgment.

Change in judgment materially affecting judgment and rights of parties against whom it is rendered and involving exercise of judicial discretion amounts to new "judgment."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Judgment (In Law).]

5. Judgment 🔑297, 331—Trial court may correct clerical errors in its judgments on own motion, and amendment leaves original judgment otherwise effective and unimpaired.

Trial court has full jurisdiction to correct clerical errors in its judgments even on its own motion, and such amendment leaves original judgment otherwise effective and unimpaired.

6. Judgment 🔑304.

Order directing amendment of judgment to correct judicial error is a nullity, and amendment of judgment is void.

7. Judgment 🔑304—Failure to allow intervener sums not mentioned in findings and conclusions held a judicial error, which could not be corrected by amendment of judgment.

Failure of judgment to allow intervener certain amounts paid to plaintiff recovering judgment in action for negligent injury, but not mentioned in findings and conclusions, was a judicial error, which could not be corrected by order directing amendment of judgment.

8. Judgment 🔑200—Findings and conclusions of court constitute statement of court's decision and supersede minute order of court's decision.

Findings and conclusions of court constitute statement of court's decision as finally made and supersede minute order of court's decision.

9. Judgment 🔑256(5)—Findings held sufficient to support judgment for plaintiff and intervener in action for negligent injury.

Findings as to amount of judgment for plaintiff in action for negligent injury, and amount paid by intervener to plaintiff, held sufficient to support judgment for plaintiff and intervener.

10. Judgment 🔑304.

Remedy for correction of judicial errors in judgment is only by motion for new trial or appeal, or, in proper case, by amendment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1072—Denial of motion for new trial, made after attempted amendment of judgment not affecting rights of defendants, held not prejudicial.

Where attempted amendment of judgment was void and in no way affected rights or obligations of defendant having ample opportunity to present motion for new trial and to appeal from original judgment, he cannot complain of denial of motion for new trial made after attempted amendment.

Mandamus by L. B. McConville to compel the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles and Carlos S. Hardy, as Judge thereof, to act on a motion for new trial. Writ denied.

Mott & Vallee and Culver & Nourse, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Voltaire Perkins, C. B. Conlin, E. R. Simon, and Haas & Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. By this proceeding a writ of mandate is sought to compel the superior court to pass upon a motion for new trial. The facts necessary to a determination of the question involved are as follows: Luther Johnson filed suit against L. B. McConville for damages based upon alleged negligence by the agent of McConville in operating an automobile owned by the latter. The New York Indemnity Company filed a complaint in intervention; its claim was predicated upon the same facts as those alleged in the complaint of Johnson. Issue was joined upon each of these pleadings, and the case was tried by the court without a jury. At the conclusion of the trial the court rendered its decision, a portion of the minute-order entry of which is as follows:

"The court now finds judgment for plaintiff, general damages $3,000, and loss of time $4,000 (20 months at $200), and costs. Intervener to have lien for amounts paid. Stay of execution of ten days from entry of judgment granted. Plaintiff's attorney to prepare judgment and findings."

The findings of the court thereafter made included a finding that the intervener had paid the sum of $178.25 for hospital and medical expenses of the plaintiff, but this was the only finding as to expenditures made by the intervener; and as conclusions of law from the facts found the trial court decided that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in the sum of $7,000, and that the indemnity company was entitled to receive out of such amount $178.25, and to have a lien upon the balance for the amount demanded in the complaint in intervention.

On November 25th judgment was entered based upon these findings, wherein it was adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff have and recover from the defendant the sum of $7,000, together with costs and disbursements, and that the indemnity company be paid out of said sum $178.25, and that it have a lien of $1,317.94 on the balance, which lien should continue up to 245 weeks from February 26, 1924. No notice of entry of this judgment was given. However, on December 4, 1925, the defendant served upon the plaintiff Johnson and filed a notice of intention to move for new trial, but this notice was not served upon the intervener.

On December 8 there was entered an order entitled, "Order amending judgment," which provided that the judgment "filed the 24th day of November, 1925, and entered the 25th day of November, 1925, in book 596 at page 276 of judgments, be and the same is hereby amended by substituting in the third paragraph thereof in the place and stead of the figures '178.25,' the figures '359.77,' and it is further ordered amendment be made nunc pro tunc as of the date of filing and entry of said judgment." On the same date, pursuant to the above order, the clerk amended the original judgment and wrote on the margin, "amended by order of court, entered 12—8—25, Book 601, page 220." The clerk also amended the original docket entry of the judgment and entered the order on a separate page of the record. No notice of the making, filing, or entry of this amendment to the judgment was given to the defendant or to his attorneys, and they had no notice of it until February 2, 1926.

This nunc pro tunc order was made pursuant to a written stipulation between attorneys for the plaintiff and the intervener previously filed, which stipulation appears to have been based upon the fact that during the trial there was uncontradicted evidence to the effect that in addition to the item of $178.25 expended for hospital and medical expenses of the plaintiff, the indemnity company had paid $181.52 as disability compensation.

On January 18, 1926, a motion for new trial was argued and submitted. On February 2, 1926, the defendant served upon the attorneys for the plaintiff and attorneys for the intervener a second notice of intention to move for new trial, and to vacate the judgment as amended. This latter motion came on regularly to be heard on February 4, 1926, and after argument the court ordered the proceedings dismissed for want of jurisdiction. It seems clear that the sole question involved is the date of the entry of final judgment. Was it entered November 25, or on December 8, 1925? Obviously, it was the former date, unless the effect of the court's order made on December 8 was to substitute a new judgment for that already entered.

[1] The petitioner asserts that the amendment refers to the original judgment (which is true), and therefore incorporates the latter in the former, which does not follow. In nearly all cases where a clerical error in a judgment has been corrected by amendment an order was made directing the amendment, and necessarily referring to the judgment to be amended. For example, this was so in Combination Land Co. v. Morgan, 95 Cal. 548, 30 P. 1102. Nevertheless, it was held that the second order merely corrected the first, leaving the first in full force and effect. It was not held that the second order superseded the first and resulted in the first being incorporated in the second, as counsel argues.

[2] Nor is the mere fact, if it be true, that the clerk, in addition to correcting the first judgment upon its face, also separately entered and docketed the second order, determinative of the status of the latter. The clerk's action was of course ministerial. It is of no consequence as affecting the materiality or finality of either the judgment entered on November 25 or the order subsequently made.

[3-5] Not every alteration of a judgment by the court which rendered it will operate as a readjudication of the case. The authorities are clear that a change which materially affects the judgment and the rights of the parties against whom it is rendered and which involves the exercise of judicial discretion amounts to a new judgment. Mann v. Haley, 45 Cal. 63; Estate of Potter, 141 Cal. 350, 74 P. 986. It is equally well settled that the trial court has full jurisdiction to correct clerical errors in its judgments, even upon its own motion, and that such an amendment leaves the original judgment otherwise effective and unimpaired. Egan v. Egan, 90 Cal. 15, 21, 27 P. 22; Homeseekers' Loan Ass'n v. Gleeson, 133 Cal. 312, 65 P. 617.

[6] But under either view of the matter the petitioner is, we think, precluded from the remedy sought. If the amendment be regarded as having been made to correct a mere clerical error, the first judgment stands as the final judgment of the court, and, of course, the second motion for a new trial was properly dismissed. On the other hand, if the correction was of a judicial error, the order of the court directing the amendment was a nullity; the amendment made was void and no motion for a new trial designating such an order as that sought to be set aside need be considered or heard by the trial court.

[7, 8] If the first judgment was erroneous in omitting an allowance of the item of $181.52, we have no doubt that the error was a judicial one. In the findings of fact and conclusions of law no reference is to be found to this matter, or to the claim that the company had paid it as disability compensation. The only basis for the assertion that the court intended to include this sum in its judgment is the fact that by its amendment of the order it was provided, "Intervener to have lien for amounts paid," and also that the evidence that the intervener advanced this money was uncontradicted. We have no means of knowing what amounts the court had in mind except as indicated by the findings, and regardless of the evidence which is mentioned, and of the fact that by omitting such an item from its consideration error may have been committed. For aught that appears in the record, the court may have deliberately intended to leave it out. But, even if the minute order had been specific in mentioning as one of the "amounts" the $181.52, it would be superseded by the findings and conclusions of law. These constitute a statement of the court's decision as finally made. O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 422, 57 P. 225.

[9, 10] The findings are complete and sufficient to support the judgment entered on November 25th. In view of the undisputed testimony it apparently was error for the court to have omitted to find that the intervener had paid out the sum in question on behalf of the plaintiff as well as to have failed to include this item in the judgment. However, for such an error the remedy is by motion for new trial or appeal. Judicial errors such as this may be corrected only through one of these means. First National Bank v. Dusy, 110 Cal. 69, 42 P. 476; Byrne v. Hoag, 116 Cal. 1, 47 P. 775. Perhaps, also, in a proper case by amendment under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Scamman v. Bonslett, 118 Cal. 93, 50 P. 272, 62 Am. St. Rep. 226. It follows that the order of December 8th was beyond the court's jurisdiction and void. It had no effect upon the judgment previously entered, which remains the final judgment of the court.

There is nothing in the cases cited in conflict with the foregoing. They consist of instances in each of which an order was made after judgment correcting a clerical misprision, and not materially affecting the substance of the judgment, and therefore it was held to have remained in full force and effect, or, of cases where a material change was made involving the exercise of judicial discretion, and which were subsequently determined to be amendments correcting judicial errors. Wherever in this latter group the second order was construed as a judgment superseding a former one, the second judgment was made pursuant to a motion for new trial or at a period in the litigation where it was in fieri, neither of which is true in the instant case.

[11] The petitioner has no cause for complaint, for he had ample opportunity to present a motion for new trial based on the judgment of November 25th and to appeal from that judgment. It is also true that there was nothing in the attempted amendment which in any way altered his rights or obligations. Had his contention been sustained to the effect that the order amending the judgment, and the entry and docketing of the former, constituted a new judgment, it would have gained him no advantage except to furnish him a second chance to appeal.

The application for a peremptory writ of mandate is denied.

KAY v. LAVENTHAL et al. (Civ. 5533.)

1. Joint adventures ⚷4(1).

Defendant, agreeing to share profits of business with plaintiff who advanced money, cannot acquit himself of liability to account for profits, by showing that he turned money over to others who conducted business.

2. Joint adventures ⚷5(3).

In action for accounting of profits, evidence that defendant entered on venture and made large number of sales held to warrant denial of motion for nonsuit.

3. Depositions ⚷101.

Plaintiff's deposition taken by defendant is not rendered inadmissible in behalf of plaintiff by defendant's death before trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Julian Kay against Isidore Laventhal and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Harold C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to recover commissions.

In his complaint he placed his claim against three different defendants. The case was tried before the trial court sitting without a jury. At the end of the plaintiff's case the trial court granted separately motions of nonsuit as against each defendant. In accordance with those rulings judgment was rendered in behalf of the defendants. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment, and on this appeal he urges that the ruling granting the nonsuit as to the defendant Isidore Laventhal constituted reversible error.

For some years prior to 1917, Isidore Laventhal had been engaged in transacting a wholesale liquor business in San Francisco under the name of Laventhal Bros. During a part of the time Julian Kay, the plaintiff, was in the employment of Laventhal Bros., but that employment was terminated and later the plaintiff engaged in the cigar business, conducting that business under the name of the Model Cigar Company. In the transaction of the cigar business he had several salesmen and the business was largely confined to making sales in San Francisco. After the plaintiff severed connections with Laventhal Bros., that firm became involved financially and an assignment was made for the benefit of creditors. After that assignment had been made, Isidore Laventhal again engaged in the wholesale liquor business, but in what capacity is one of the questions presented by the record in this case. A place of business was opened up at 554 Mission street. The house was known as Laventhal Mercantile Company. Edward B. Laventhal was generally present and to outward appearances was the bookkeeper. Isidore Laventhal was generally present at the place of business and performing different functions as will herein later appear.

In August, 1917, certain changes had occurred and were about to occur regarding the sale of malt and spirituous liquors. Those changes made it possible to transact a larger amount of business on a smaller capital than theretofore. Appreciating the importance of these facts, the plaintiff conceived the idea of inducing his former employer, Isidore Laventhal, to take advantage of the situation and broaden out his business. Accordingly, a meeting was arranged, and Mr. Kay, Mr. Isidore Laventhal, and one of Mr. Kay's salesmen, Mr. Schwartz, met in the office of the plaintiff in the Monadnock building in San Francisco. At that meeting Mr. Kay proposed that he would turn over to Mr. Laventhal the services of his salesmen and that in conjunction with Mr. Laventhal's organization that an increased effort to make sales of liquor should be made. The plaintiff agreed to finance the business. In return for what he did, Mr. Kay required that his salesmen should receive 25 per cent. of the gross profits on sales made by them; that Mr. Laventhal should receive 50 per cent. of the gross profits on sales made by Kay's salesmen and 75 per cent. of the gross profits of sales made by himself; and that Mr. Kay personally should receive 25 per cent. of the gross profits. The proposition as made was acceptable and the enterprise commenced and continued for a period of about six months. The actors worked out of the house at 553 Mission street. Mr. Kay's salesmen, Schwartz, La Rock, and Israel, appeared at that place of business and turned in orders and received directions. Sometimes Mr. Isidore Laventhal was there directing affairs and sometimes Mr. Kay was present. On nearly all occasions Mr. Edward B. Laventhal was present and was working on the books. Mr. Kay's salesmen personally accompanied Isidore Laventhal and introduced him to the customers of Mr. Kay who were also engaged in handling liquors. Carrying on the business in this method, gross profits to the extent of $20,000 or thereabouts were earned. From time to time, as a salesman became entitled to his commission of 25 per cent., a check was drawn in his favor by Laventhal Mercantile Company, and those checks were delivered to the salesmen by Edward B. Laventhal. For the purpose of financing a bank account was opened with the Donohoe-Kelly Bank. The account was opened in the name of Laventhal Mercantile Company. The bank was authorized to cash checks drawn by Laventhal Mercantile Company signed by E. B. Laventhal. The reference given to the bank was the name of the plaintiff (at that time called J. H. Kominsky). From time to time loans were obtained from the bank, which loans were credited to Laventhal Mercantile Company. The loans were advanced on notes indorsed by I. Laventhal and secured by collateral furnished by the plaintiff. There was evidence that the plaintiff had never been paid any commission or any part thereof. After the action was commenced, I. Laventhal died and later his executor was substituted as a defendant in his place.

[1, 2] In support of the ruling granting the nonsuit against Isidore Laventhal, the respondent contends that the agreement under which the plaintiff claims called for the organization of a new enterprise to be known as Laventhal Mercantile Company and that such company was never formed. However, we find nothing in the evidence that called for the organization of a new company—the business was to be conducted, so far as the record discloses, by Isidore Laventhal. The respondent further shows that the plaintiff advanced money to Isidore Laventhal, who, in turn, delivered the money thus received to his brother, Edward B. Laventhal, doing business under the name of Laventhal Mercantile Company. But whether he did so gratuitously or otherwise did not relieve the responsibility resting on Isidore Laventhal to keep his contract with the plaintiff. The respondent further contends that—

> "The Laventhal Mercantile Co. conducted by Edward B. Laventhal was not the enterprise from which plaintiff was to receive a percentage of the gross profits."

Conceding that to be so, nevertheless Isidore Laventhal was still the principal who was responsible to the plaintiff. The respondents further contend that there is no evidence "that a new enterprise was undertaken by defendant in August, 1917, embodying an idea or plan suggested by plaintiff, nor is there any evidence that such enterprise, if in fact undertaken, ever conducted business or earned any profits." In the first place, the plaintiff was not bound by his evidence to connect all of the defendants, but it would have been sufficient if he connected the defendant Isidore Laventhal. Furthermore, there is an abundance of evidence to show that Isidore Laventhal, acting with others, did enter upon the plan suggested by the plaintiff and did make a large number of sales, and it will be presumed under an attack as by a motion for a nonsuit that at least some gross profits were earned. In different forms the respondent repeats the contention that the evidence was wholly insufficient as showing that any gross profits were earned. The contention is not well founded. True it is that the exact amount of the gross profits does not clearly appear. However, the ruling complained of was a ruling granting a nonsuit. The question is: Does the record show that any gross profits were earned? The reply is that Schwartz was paid a 25 per cent. commission, amounting to $1,700; that La Rock was paid a commission of 25 per cent., amounting to about $500. Moreover, it appears that Isidore Laventhal personally made sales to the same amount or a larger amount than were made by Schwartz. In the face of such a record the amount due the plaintiff could properly be ascertained by a judgment on the merits and not by a motion for a nonsuit.

[3] After the defendants had been served with summons, they caused the deposition of the plaintiff to be taken. At the time of the trial Isidore Laventhal had died and the action stood as one against his estate. During the presentation of the plaintiff's case the plaintiff sought to introduce his own deposition which had theretofore been taken. An objection was made by the defendants and the objection was sustained. The ruling was erroneous. The deposition would have been admissible if Isidore Laventhal had not died, and there is nothing in the statute showing that a different rule obtains because of the subsequent death of Isidore Laventhal. It is hardly necessary to recite the facts, but it is sufficient to remark that there are several matters contained in the deposition which were of considerable importance to the appellant.

McNAB v. MILLS et ux. (Sac. 3730.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1926.)

Partnership ⚿53—Finding of partnership, entitling plaintiff to accounting, held supported by evidence.

Evidence held to support trial court's finding of copartnership in operation of ranch, entitling plaintiff to accounting, though property originally came to parties as tenants in common.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Action by Stewart McNab against W. L. B. Mills and wife. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Abe Darlington and Henry S. Lyon, both of Placerville, and O. G. Hopkins, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Thomas Maul, of Placerville, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. Plaintiff brought this action for the dissolution of a partnership alleged to exist between himself and the defendant W. L. B. Mills, for an accounting of their transactions and dealings, and asking that the property of the alleged partnership be sold to pay the debts, first, of the partnership; second, of the partnership to the plaintiff; and that the surplus, if any, be equally divided between plaintiff and defendant W. L. B. Mills. The defendants answered, denying specifically the allegations of the complaint, with the single admission that plaintiff and defendant W. L. B. Mills owned the property described in the complaint, but alleging that they owned it in common, and that no part of it was partnership property. They denied that a partnership ever existed. On the issues thus joined trial was had, judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

The trial court found that the appellant W. L. B. Mills and his brother, P. L. B. Mills, purchased a ranch in El Dorado county, title to which was conveyed to them. The purchase price was advanced by respondent, as evidence of which he received a promissory note, secured by a mortgage of the property, which he did not record. The ranch was thereafter operated by the brothers until June, 1922, when P. L. B. Mills conveyed to respondent McNab his undivided half interest therein and in the personal property used in its operation. The consideration for the purchase by McNab was a cash payment and cancellation of the note and mortgage as to P. L. B. Mills, but it was not the intention of the parties to this transaction that appellant W. L. B. Mills should be in any manner relieved of his portion of the indebtedness to McNab. The court further found that upon the consummation of this transaction respondent McNab and appellant W. L. B. Mills entered into an agreement by which they formed a partnership, known as the "M & M Ranch"—the terms of the agreement being that the partnership assumed the indebtedness of appellant and his brother to McNab, and that the M & M Ranch was to become the capital of the partnership and was to become partnership property; that after the formation of the partnership respondent was to advance such sums of money as the partners deemed necessary for the development of the ranch, the purpose of the partnership being to carry on the business of conducting, operating, and developing the ranch as ranches were ordinarily operated in the vicinity; that it was further agreed that, before any profits or assets of the partnership should be divided beween the partners, respondent McNab was first to be repaid for all sums advanced by him, together with the original indebtedness of the partnership to him; that after the payment of this indebtedness to respondent the profits of the business were to be divided between respondent and appellant W. L. B. Mills, share and share alike; that respondent and said appellant would assume the joint management of the ranch.

The court further found that the partnership was formed in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and the ranch was operated and conducted by the partners as partnership property and was the property of the partners; that the indebtedness of appellant W. L. B. Mills and his brother, P. L. B. Mills, to respondent McNab, assumed by the partnership at the time it was formed, amounted to $8,433.11; and that in accordance with the terms of the partnership agreement respondent advanced and loaned to the partnership the sum of $21,784.70, which sum the partnership promised and agreed to repay out of its property and assets before there should be any division of profits, properties, or assets. There are other findings, more or less of an evidentiary character, which need not be noted. Further findings are that the relationship between the partners became unfriendly to such an extent that it was no longer possible to carry on the business of the partnership in a profitable manner. The court also found that the defendant Ruby Mills, wife of W. L. B. Mills, had no interest in the property affected by the action; that all of said property is partnership property, and is held by the respondent McNab and appellant W. L. B. Mills as trustees for the partnership existing between them.

Appropriate conclusions of law were drawn by the trial court, which thereupon entered its interlocutory judgment, dissolving the partnership between the respondent and appellant W. L. B. Mills and ordering an accounting. It further ordered that all of the property of the partnership be sold, and the proceeds, after payment of expenses, be applied, first, to the payment of the creditors of the partnership other than its members; second, to the debts of the partnership owing to the partners; and the remainder, if any, to be equally divided between plaintiff and defendant W. L. B. Mills as members of the partnership. From this judgment the defendants appeal, contending that the evidence does not justify the findings. Their contentions are that no partnership agreement was entered into between McNab and W. L. B. Mills to purchase the land described in the complaint; that no partnership agreement or relation was subsequently entered into between them; and that appellant W. L. B. Mills and respondent were in fact merely tenants in common in a joint enterprise, bearing the relation of debtor and creditor to each other.

The sole question to be considered on the appeal is the sufficiency of the evidence, in which appellants admit there is no substantial conflict, to support the findings of the trial court. The only witnesses were those called by plaintiff in support of the allegations of his complaint, except that the defendant W. L. B. Mills testified very briefly in his own behalf. While no written agreement expressing the terms and conditions of the partnership alleged to exist between the appellant W. L. B. Mills and the respondent was entered into, we are satisfied from a careful reading of the evidence that the actions, transactions, conduct, and understanding of the parties amply support the finding of the trial court that they entered into a partnership, which continued to exist. Appellants admit the indebtedness of W. L. B. Mills to the respondent for one-half of the purchase price of the real property, and that respondent advanced the additional sums necessary to carry on the ranch. In the language of the trial court:

> "The complaint sufficiently alleges, and the facts sufficiently support and develop, that there was a joint venture sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to an accounting. The evidence produced, coupled with such inferences as may properly be drawn therefrom, justifies the assumption that the intention of the parties was to operate as a copartnership, and that from a very careful consideration of their actions no other conclusion can be reached; and even though the ranch property in question may have originally come to the parties in the character of tenants in common, this character was destroyed by the parties having farmed and operated it upon joint account and as partnership property, and by their acts thereby made it partnership assets."

For the reason that we have reached the conclusion that the judgment must be affirmed on the merits, it becomes unnecessary to consider the motion to dismiss the appeal and the motion to affirm the judgment, which were made and submitted when the case was called for oral argument.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA BEAN GROWERS' ASS'N v. RINDGE LAND & NAVIGATION CO.

(Sac. 3567.)

1. Agriculture 🔑6—Co-operative association held not liable for delay in selling member's crop, though market price dropped.

That co-operative marketing association delayed selling of crop delivered to it held not to make it liable to a member, notwithstanding crop had dropped in price, in absence of showing that association unreasonably exercised its discretion, especially where member assented to delay.

2. Agriculture 🔑6—Whether accounting by co-operative marketing association selling crop was unreasonably delayed held question of fact.

Where agreement between co-operative marketing association and member provided for commingling of beans, and that returns were to be paid proportionally from sale proceeds, and crop was sold in summer, but no accounting was made until November, whether accounting was unreasonably delayed, held question of fact for trial court.

3. Agriculture 🔑6—Co-operative association's unreasonable delay in accounting for crop returns held no defense to member's prior breach of contract to deliver following year's crop.

That co-operative marketing association unreasonably delayed accounting for crop returns held no defense, in action for member's refusal to deliver following year's crop, where member breached its contract before any considerable part of prior crop had been sold.

4. Agriculture 🔑6.

Co-operative association's unauthorized use of crop proceeds to finance growers held no excuse for member's prior breach of contract to deliver crop to association.

5. Contracts 🔑126—Expenditure to present by fair means merits of measure advocated before legislative body held legal.

It is neither illegal nor improper to expend such reasonable sums as may appear to be necessary to present, by fair and open means, merits of any matter advocated before legislative body.

6. Evidence 🔑60—Means used to present merits of measure before legislative body are presumed fair and open.

In absence of evidence to contrary, it will be presumed that means employed in presenting merits of measure before legislative body were fair and open.

7. Agriculture 🔑6—Co-operative association's expenditure to procure tariff legislation held not to exceed its authority.

That co-operative marketing association expended money derived from outside interests and membership fees, to procure favorable tariff legislation held not in excess of its authority under articles of incorporation.

8. Agriculture 🔑6—That co-operative association permitted owners to withdraw crops from pool after delivery held, in view of agreement, no excuse for another member's breach.

That co-operative marketing association permitted owners to withdraw crop from pool held no excuse for member's failure to deliver following year's crop, where it was not shown that association suffered any detriment, or that withdrawal did not occur at time when members by agreement had right of crop withdrawal.

9. Agriculture 🔑6.

That member of co-operative marketing association had breached contract, and no action had been commenced against him, held no defense to action for another member's breach.

10. Agriculture 🔑6—That co-operative association officer sold crop direct held no defense to another member's failure to deliver crop to association.

That co-operative marketing association officer sold crop direct, and not through association, held no defense to action for another member's failure to deliver crop, where it did not appear that sale was before member's withdrawal right arrived, or that association consented to sale.

11. Contracts 🔑346(8)—Where answer denies general allegation of performance, and specifically states plaintiff's failures, failures not set up therein held unavailable to defendant.

Where answer denies general allegation of performance of contract by plaintiff, and also states the particulars wherein plaintiff has failed to perform, failures not apparent on face of contract, nor embraced in facts alleged in complaint, are not available to defendant.

12. Accord and satisfaction 🔑11(1)—Account stated 🔑6(2)—Statements presented and check tendered by co-operative association to member in full satisfaction of claim, and cashed without objection, held an account stated and accord and satisfaction.

Evidence that co-operative marketing association member demanded settlement, and association sent check with statement that it represented final settlement with slight exception, and later sent second check, with statement that it represented final settlement, and member cashed both checks without objection, held to show an account stated and accord and satisfaction.

13. Account stated 🔑6(4)—Principal must object to account rendered by agent within reasonable time.

When agent has rendered an account to his principal, latter must, if he would object, do so within reasonable time, and failure to do so may be treated as admission that account was true, and principal was willing to be bound by it.

14. Accord and satisfaction 🔑26(2)—Account stated 🔑19(2)—Fact of agency will be considered in determining whether there has been an account stated or an accord and satisfaction.

Fact that parties were principal and agent will be considered in weighing evidence to determine whether there has been an account stated or an accord and satisfaction.

15. Accord and satisfaction 🔑26(1)—Account stated 🔑19(1).

Account stated and accord and satisfaction between co-operative association and member will be presumed to have disposed of controversy concerning credits to which latter was entitled.

16. Monopolies 🔑17(2)—Agreement under which co-operative association was to sell, and members to deliver, entire crop held not to create unlawful trust or combination in restraint of trade.

Agreement between co-operative marketing association and its members by terms of which association was to market, and members to deliver to it, all beans produced by or for them during three successive years held not to create an unlawful trust or combination in restraint of trade.

17. Agriculture 🔑6—Provision for liquidated damages of cent per pound for failure to deliver crop to co-operative association held valid.

Provision for liquidated damages of one cent for each pound of beans disposed of by member of co-operative marketing association, in violation of agreement with association, held valid, in view of difficulty of estimating damages to association resulting from breach.

18. Agriculture 🔑6—Under agreement that member's failure to deliver crop to co-operative association terminated membership, defaulting member was not relieved of liability to deliver subsequent crop.

Where co-operative marketing association member failed to deliver crop for one year, it did not cease to be member, where association took no steps to cancel membership, and was not released from agreement to deliver crop for subsequent year, notwithstanding provision that refusal to deliver automatically terminated membership.

19. Damages 🔑68—Interest on liquidated damages held proper, where amounts could be made certain by mere calculation (Civ. Code, § 3287).

Interest was recoverable on amounts awarded as liquidated damages from breach of contract to deliver crops to co-operative marketing association, under Civ. Code, § 3287, where amounts were capable of being made certain by mere calculation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action for damages for breach of contract by the California Bean Growers' Association against the Rindge Land & Navigation Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, for appellant.

Sapiro & Hayes and Sapiro, Levy & Hayes, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice FINCH, sitting pro tempore for Mr. Justice LAWLOR, is adopted as the opinion and decision of the court.

"The plaintiff is a nonprofit co-operative marketing association, and the defendant is one of its members. The general features of the plaintiff's organization and the agreements which it makes with its members are similar to those considered in Poultry Producers, etc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 208 P. 93; California Canning Peach Growers v. Downey (Cal. App.) 243 P. 679; Poultry Producers, etc., v. Murphy, 64 Cal. App. 450, 221 P. 962; and Anaheim C. F. Ass'n. v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759, 197 P. 959. On the 7th day of August, 1918, the parties hereto entered into a marketing agreement by the terms of which the plaintiff agreed 'to market,' and the defendant agreed 'to consign and deliver' to the plaintiff as 'agent, * * * and not otherwise, all of the beans of every variety * * * produced by or for' defendant 'during the years 1918–20,' with certain exceptions which are not involved herein. The defendant delivered all of its beans produced during the year 1918 to the plaintiff, but refused to deliver those of the years 1919 and 1920. Plaintiff brought this action to recover liquidated damages, as provided for in the agreement, alleged to have been sustained by reason of such refusal. The trial court entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed.

"The complaint alleges the execution of the agreement; that 'plaintiff has performed all of the terms, conditions, and covenants of said agreement on its part to be performed'; that the defendant refused to deliver the beans produced by it in 1919 and 1920 to the plaintiff; that 'it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to fix and determine the actual damages suffered by plaintiff herein as the result of defendant's failure to deliver said beans'; that the agreement provides that, 'inasmuch as it is now and ever will be impracticable and extremely difficult to determine the actual damage resulting to the association should the grower fail to so consign and deliver his beans, the grower hereby agrees to pay to the association one cent for each pound of beans sold, consigned, or marketed by or for him other than in accordance with the terms hereof, as liquidated damages for the breach of this contract, all parties agreeing that this contract is one of a series dependent for its value upon the adherence of each and all of the contracting parties to each and all of the said contracts'; and stating the amount of such liquidated damages.

"The answer is too long to be set out at length. In addition to copies of the articles of incorporation and the by-laws of the plaintiff and the agreement between the parties, it contains about thirty pages of typewritten matter. Some of the allegations are of evidentiary matters and other are immaterial to the questions raised by the appeal. It is alleged that the defendant was induced to become a member of the association and to execute the agreement by certain false representations and promises made by the plaintiff, that the plaintiff negligently failed to take proper care of defendant's beans of 1918 and allowed a part of them to be damaged by moisture and by rats and mice and that 'excessive expenses' were charged against defendant, but the evidence does not support such allegations. The answer 'denies that plaintiff has performed all or any of the terms or conditions or covenants of said agreement on its part to be performed'; states the quantities of beans produced by defendant in 1919 and 1920; alleges that it 'agreed to deliver to plaintiff all of said beans * * * in accordance with the terms of said agreement * * * and would have done so, had plaintiff prior thereto and at that time kept and performed its agreement'; that 'plaintiff did not keep and perform its said agreements, as hereinafter appears.' In subsequent parts of the answer it is alleged that during the year 1918 the defendant delivered to the plaintiff, under the agreement, 11,231 bags of beans of the aggregate weight of 1,004.000 pounds; that the fair market value thereof was 6 cents a pound; that in November, 1918, plaintiff paid the defendant on account thereof the sum of $4,300; that no other substantial payment was made until November 29, 1920, when $22,744.73 was paid; that 'there was neither excuse nor occasion either for the delay in marketing plaintiff's beans or for the delay in reporting, accounting, and paying therefor'; that 'said beans could have been sold before the bean harvest of 1919 and one year was under the then circumstances a fair and reasonable time in which to market and pay therefor'; that 'plaintiff sought to have a tariff placed by Congress on beans not produced in the United States, and, without right or authority, expended about $15,500 to that end prior to March 31, 1920'; that 'it financed the 1919 growers out of credits from the 1918 crop, and for that reason $1,262,012.90 of the proceeds of the 1918 crop were unavailable for distribution at March 31, 1920, and only $71,506.02 was available for that purpose'; that 'some directors took their own 1918 beans out of plaintiff, and sold them directly and individually, and not in or by the association; that one of the present directors did not deliver his 1919 crop of beans to the association; that no action has been commenced against him; that the chief officer of plaintiff sold 1918 beans and 1919 beans to private dealers direct, and not through the association.' By way of set-off, counterclaim, and cross-complaint the defendant set up a claim against the plaintiff for the difference between the alleged value of its 1918 crop of beans and the amount it had received from plaintiff on account thereof. The defendant also prayed for an accounting.

"The following facts are taken from the evidence: The plaintiff was organized in the early part of 1918, and by the end of that year it had about 1,500 members, who had delivered to it up to that time, under agreements essentially the same as that between the plaintiff and the defendant, about 1,000,000 sacks of beans. Due to the activities of the national food administration, the bean crop of California in 1918 'was the largest crop ever raised, almost double * * * the average crop.' Other food products were 'abnormally large.' The warehouses of the state did not have sufficient capacity to take care of all food products. In the fall of that year 'there was more rain damage than had ever been known before. * * * Heavy rains came early in September.' The bean crop was damaged by these rains. 'A large percentage of them were so badly damaged they could not be made into choice recleaned beans.' 'The grower was permitted to deliver to any public warehouse that he selected.' The warehouses handled them 'just as they handled beans of other persons * * * that were delivered there.' The association endeavored 'to get for those beans the best treatment in the warehouses that was possible.' Large quantities of damaged beans were placed on the market. With the termination of war conditions, the 'government * * * went out of the market, * * * and it was impossible to find any buyers who could take such a large quantity of beans. * * * The sale of a large quantity of beans for export was made impossible because of the fall in foreign exchange.' There was no speculative market. 'There was a carry over from 1917. * * * There was such a tremendous supply of beans, which in reality took about three years to handle, that it was virtually impossible to sell any quantity of beans outside of orders to the government.' One witness testified: 'If we had offered such a tremendous quantity of beans at any time to the home trade, it would have sent the market down probably 2 or 3 cents.' The evidence clearly shows that the plaintiff made every reasonable effort to care for the beans under its control, and to market them at a fair price, but was unable to sell the bulk thereof until the summer of 1920.

[1] "Appellant contends that at any time during the period of six months commencing November 1, 1918, the beans could have been sold at a price higher than that which was finally received for them. If the contention be conceded, it does not follow that the plaintiff is liable for its failure to sell during the earlier period. The plaintiff was clothed with a reasonable discretion in the marketing of the beans under its control, and it is not to be held accountable for an honest mistake of judgment, if the course pursued by it was apparently warranted by conditions then existing. There is nothing in the record to show that the plaintiff did not reasonably exercise the discretion with which it was vested. It further appears that the defendant consented to the delay of which it now complains. The agreement provides: 'The grower further agrees that the association shall, if possible, dispose of the beans delivered hereunder during the season of their delivery, and that they shall not be stored beyond April 1st of any year by the association for his account or otherwise, without his express written consent.' March 10, 1919, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff an instrument reading as follows: 'The undersigned * * * hereby expressly consents and hereby expressly authorizes and directs the said association to hold, * * * until further orders from us, * * * the beans heretofore delivered by him to the association beyond April 1, 1919, and to market them when, in the discretion of the management of said association, the most advantageous terms may be secured by the sale thereof.' No further order or direction was given by the defendant.

[2, 3] "The plaintiff sold the bulk of the beans of 1918 during the months of June, July, and August, 1920. In September of the latter year it offered to pay defendant the net proceeds of the sales of its beans upon the defendant's accounting for its crop of 1919, and on the 29th of November, 1920, plaintiff paid defendant for all the latter's beans which had been sold, without any deduction on account of defendant's failure to deliver its 1919 crop. The agreement provides: 'The association shall market and sell the beans of the grower, mingled with the beans of like variety and grade delivered by other growers named in contracts similar to this contract, at the reasonable and fair value thereof; and the grower agrees that his beans shall be so handled and mingled and that the returns therefrom, less brokerage and all other costs and charges and the association charge, as set forth in paragraph 2 hereof, shall be credited and paid to him on a proportional basis out of the amounts received by the association during the season from the sale of all such beans of each variety and grade.' It is apparent that, with 1,500 members, and 1,000,000 sacks of beans of different varieties and grades, an elaborate system of accounting was required in order to carry out the foregoing provisions of the agreement. It could not have been contemplated that the plaintiff should go to the heavy expense of making a separate distribution of the proceeds of every sale made by it, regardless of the amount thereof. Under all the circumstances, it was a question of fact for the trial court to determine whether the plaintiff unreasonably delayed accounting to defendant. In any event, such delay is not available as a defense to this action, because the defendant had breached its contract by refusing to deliver its 1919 crop of beans before the plaintiff had sold and received payment for any considerable part of the 1918 crop.

[4] "In May, 1919, the plaintiff sold 250,000 sacks of beans, but 'the final delivery and payment therefor was not made until some time in the early part of 1920. There were several smaller orders in between.' The minutes of March 27, 1920, recite that the association made certain payments to the Bank of Italy on account of money borrowed from that bank with which, apparently, to finance the bean growers of 1919, among the payments being one of '$250,000 paid on account subject to renewal. That the $250,000 so paid was borrowed temporarily from the proceeds of sales of 1918 crop. * * * That the security for said $250,000 is in the hands of the Bank of Italy, and said $250,000 will be reborrowed from the bank when actually needed to make distributions.' The respondent contends that the proceeds of the 1918 crop were not ready for distribution at the time this money was borrowed temporarily, and that the 1918 growers were the gainers by the transaction, because they were credited with interest on the money borrowed. One of the officers of the association testified: 'The directors * * * tried to be guided by good judgment in making these distributions. * * * The amount of clerical work that has to be done in charging a large amount of accounts and charges * * * made it necessary for us to go slow for a month or so in making this final distribution. I know it was done as rapidly as possible. We increased our office force at the time.' Of course, the association was without authority to use the proceeds of the 1918 crop to finance the growers of 1919, but it does not appear that the defendant was injured thereby, and, since the defendant had breached the contract prior to the unauthorized use of such money, plaintiff's misuse of the money at a subsequent time was not an excuse for the defendant's breach, if it be conceded that such temporary misuse of the money would have justified a refusal by the defendant to perform in any event.

[5-7] "The plaintiff expended the sum of $15,449.75 in an effort to have the tariff rates on beans increased. It appears that of this sum $9,684.35 was contributed to the association by outside interests, and that the remainder of $5,765.40 was taken from the amount collected as membership fees, and was not charged to the growers as an expense of marketing their beans. No attempt was made to show the particular purpose for which the money was used, or that it was illegally or improperly expended. It is neither illegal nor improper to expend such reasonable sums as may appear to be necessary to present, by fair and open means, the merits of any matter advocated before a legislative body. 6 Cal. Jur. 126, and cases there cited. It is to be presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that such means only were employed. Fites v. Marsh, 171 Cal. 487, 488, 153 P. 926; Schweppe v. Sandberg, 50 Cal. App. 507, 511, 195 P. 454. The articles of incorporation provide that one of the purposes of the association is 'to do each and every thing necessary, suitable, or proper, for the accomplishment of any of its purposes or attainment of any one or more of the objects herein enumerated, or which shall at any time appear conducive to, or expedient for, the interests or benefit of this association, in its proper activities, and to contract accordingly.' Under such broad powers, it cannot be said that the association exceeded its authority in the proper expenditure of a reasonable sum to procure favorable tariff legislation.

[8-10] "Appellant complains that the court refused to permit it to prove its allegations to the effect that some of the officers and members of the association withdrew from the pool the beans which they had delivered to it in 1918; that one of the directors did not deliver his 1919 crop of beans to the association; and that the chief officer of the association sold his bean crops of 1918 and 1919 directly to dealers and not through the association. In its opening brief the appellant says: 'Of course, the fact that others breached their contracts by not delivering beans would not of itself and alone furnish excuse for defendant to breach its contract. * * * The objectionable thing is plaintiff's permitting: Delivered 1,918 beans to be withdrawn for sale by the owner; its directors to violate their duties as well as contracts; and nondirector member contractors to do likewise.' It is not alleged that the association or its members suffered any detriment from the alleged withdrawal of beans which had been delivered to it. Should a member withdraw his beans from the pool at a time after the association had sold the bulk of the beans under its control at higher prices than that prevailing at the time of, and subsequent to, such withdrawal, then, no detriment from other considerations appearing, the other members would be the gainers thereby, because the withdrawing member would thereby lose his right to share in the distribution of the proceeds of the beans sold at the higher prices and the other members would receive a greater proportion of the proceeds of sales at the higher prices. The testimony shows that a withdrawal of beans 'was treated the same as a sale'; that is, the member who withdrew his beans was charged the same proportion of the association's expenses as those whose beans were sold by it. The offered proof was not directed to any issue raised by the answer. It is not alleged that any beans were withdrawn from the 1918 pool prior to April 1, 1919. The agreements between the association and its members provide that the beans of a grower 'shall not be stored beyond April 1 of any year by the association for his account or otherwise, without his express written consent.' The reasonable construction of this provision is that the grower had the right to withdraw any of his beans held by the association after April 1st of any year, unless he consented that they be held after that date, because, if the association was unable to sell the beans on or before April 1st, and could not hold them thereafter, its right to possession and control thereof must have terminated with that day. There is evidence to the effect that the beans held by the association could not have been sold earlier than they were sold, and the court found that 'it is not true that said beans could have been sold before the bean harvest of 1919.' The allegation that one of the directors 'did not deliver his 1919 crop of beans to the association,' and that 'no action has been commenced against him' does not state a ground of defense. The order in which actions may be commenced against defaulting members is immaterial. There is no allegation to the effect that the plaintiff does not intend to bring an action against such director, or that it was a party to such default or in any manner consented thereto. For like reasons the allegation that 'the chief officer of plaintiff sold 1918 beans and 1919 beans to private dealers direct and not through the association' does not state a defense. Whether they were sold before or after April 1st of the respective years mentioned does not appear and it is not alleged that the plaintiff consented to their sale in the manner alleged.

[11] "The complaint alleges that 'plaintiff has performed all of the terms, conditions and covenants of said agreement on its part to be performed.' The answer denies this allegation. If it be conceded that under the issue so raised, if nothing further in that connection appeared in the answer, the defendant would have had the right to introduce evidence of the facts which it attempted to prove, it limited such right by its subsequent specific allegations of failure to perform. Where a plaintiff alleges performance of a contract on his part in general language, 'the general allegation will not save the complaint where, in addition, plaintiff sets out what he has actually done, and such facts fall short of due performance.' 13

C. J. 727; McNulty v. New Richmond Land Co., 44 Cal. App. 744, 747, 187 P. 97. The same rule should apply to an answer which denies a general allegation of performance by the plaintiff and, in addition, sets out the particulars in which the plaintiff has failed to perform. In Eucalyptus G. Ass'n. v. Orange C. N. & L. Co., 174 Cal. 330, 163 P. 45, an action for damages for breach of a contract to plant trees and care for them for a given time, the complaint alleged 'that the said plaintiff has generally and specifically complied with and performed each and all the conditions on its part to be performed and contained in said written agreement.' The answer denied this allegation in general language, and alleged certain defaults of the plaintiff as an affirmative defense. It appeared from the findings of the court that, 'under the terms of the contract, * * * the plaintiff was to furnish pumping plants, including the wells, of capacity sufficient to obtain the water that would be required to enable the nursery company to carry out the contract. Plaintiff was also to do the leveling of the land necessary for that purpose.' Plaintiff did not properly level or grade the land nor did it install pumping plants of sufficient capacity to flood and irrigate it. The court said that such failures of performance by plaintiff 'fall within the category of excuses for nonperformance, and they are excuses not apparent on the face of the contract, nor embraced within the facts alleged in the complaint. They are, therefore, matters of defense, and to be available to the defendants they must be set up in the answer.'

"In answer to the defendant's cross-complaint, which contains the same matters set up as a set-off and as a counterclaim, the plaintiff, in addition to denials of such matters, alleged, and the court found, that there had been an account stated between the parties and an accord and satisfaction as to the proceeds of the 1918 crop of beans. In ruling upon the admissibility of evidence in support of such alleged set-off, counterclaim, and cross-complaint, the court stated that, because of such account stated and accord and satisfaction, 'the question of recoupment or question of damages by the defendant cannot be inquired into and considered in this action. * * * But for the purpose of absolving the defendant from further compliance, that is a different question. In other words, if you can show the plaintiff breached its contract so as to absolve you from further compliance with the contract, that is a complete defense, but does not entitle you to any damages. You took your money—cash—and had your settlement. That was a final settlement.'

"During the time the beans were held in storage the plaintiff from time to time sent the defendant statements of sales made and of charges debited to the defendant's account, such as insurance, cleaning, and resacking beans, patching sacks, etc., and the defendant often replied with complaints that the charges were excessive. September 16, 1920, defendant wrote plaintiff, demanding a settlement, and, among other things, saying: 'Your auditor's report which was submitted to us some time ago made the amazing statement that the money realized from the 1918 beans was actually used to finance the 1919 crop. This seems to us incredible. If true, the directors have made themselves personally responsible, as they undoubtedly did by refusing to sell the beans when a good price was offered early in 1919. We shall be obliged to take legal steps along these lines if a check is not promptly sent to us. We shall also take very decided exceptions to your expense accounts as they are extravagant beyond all reason. You have no right under the agreement to deduct more than $1.00 per ton for such expenses, and section 4 provides for the return of any unused portions of the $1.00 per ton.' Thereafter the plaintiff furnished the defendant with a complete statement of all receipts and disbursements in connection with the defendant's 1918 beans, showing that all of such beans, except 3,500 pounds which were damaged, had been sold, and that the defendant had been credited with a net balance on account of beans sold in the sum of $22,744.73. Damaged beans were not entered into the pool, as there would be no basis for the distribution of the proceeds thereof among the growers, the selling price thereof depending upon the extent of the damage thereto, but they were sold separately, and the net proceeds thereof credited to the individual growers. November 29, 1920, the plaintiff sent the defendant a check for $22,744.73, inclosed with a letter reading as follows: 'We have pleasure in inclosing herewith our check No. 2525 for $22,744.73 representing a final settlement of the 1918 account with the exception of two small lots which remain unsold, these were enumerated on a statement which we recently forwarded to you.' On the following day the defendant acknowledged receipt of the check in a letter reading as follows: 'We are in receipt of your letter of November 29th, inclosing your check No. 3536 for $22,744.73.' February 24, 1921, plaintiff wrote defendant, inclosing statement of sale of the damaged beans and a check for the net proceeds thereof, amounting to $66.51, and saying: 'This amount represents the final settlement on your 1918 account.' The defendant cashed the first check November 30, 1920, and the second one February 26, 1921. The record does not show that the defendant made any objection to the settlement until its answer was filed herein August 18, 1921.

[12-14] "The foregoing evidence is sufficient to support the finding of the court to the effect that there was an account stated between the parties and an accord and satisfaction. Berger v. Lane, 190 Cal. 443, 447, 213 P. 45; Lapp-Gifford Co. v. Muscoy Water Co., 166 Cal. 25, 27, 134 P. 989; Creighton v. Gregory, 142 Cal. 34, 39, 75 P. 569; Schneider v. Oakman Con. Min. Co., 38 Cal. App. 338, 342, 176 P. 177; Johnston v. Burnett, 17 Cal. App. 497, 120 P. 436; 34 A. L. R. 1036, note. The fact that the relation of principal and agent existed between the parties does not change the rule. 'When the agent has rendered an account to his principal, it is open to the latter to object either to the fullness or the accuracy of the account; or, on the other hand, to agree to it as a full and accurate account of the agent's transactions. If he expressly agrees to it, the account will then have ordinarily all the characteristics of an account stated. But it is not necessary that the principal's acquiescence shall be express; it may be implied from the facts and circumstances as in other cases. The essential thing is that the facts and circumstances relied upon, as constituting acquiescence, must be such as reasonably lead to the inference that the principal assents to the account as correct. If an agent * * * renders to his principal an account of his transactions, the principal must, in general, if he would object to it, do so within a reasonable time, and, if he does not, the agent is justified in treating the principal's silence as an admission by the principal "that the account as rendered was just and true and that he was willing to be bound by it."' Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 1351; Crane v. Stansbury, 173 Cal. 631, 161 P. 7; Johnston v. Burnett, supra. The fact that the relation of principal and agent exists between the parties, of course, is to be considered in weighing the evidence to determine whether there has been an account stated or an accord and satisfaction. Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 1352. That fact was given weight in Egan v. Crowther (Cal. App.) 241 P. 900, 902.

[15] "The fourth paragraph of the agreement provides: 'The association charge shall be used for meeting the expenses of the association. If, at the end of the year's operations, any surplus remains out of the said charge, the association may use the same for any purpose of common advantage or profit to the growers or may refund the surplus, or any portion thereof, to the growers, in proportion to their shipments to or through the association.' It does not appear whether there was any such surplus from the 1918 beans. If so, it was one of the matters in dispute between the parties. In defendant's letter of September 16, 1920, it said: 'You have no right under the agreement to deduct more than $1 per ton for such expenses, and section 4 provides for the return of any unused portions of the $1 per ton.' It must be presumed, therefore, that the settlement disposed of that controversy. The payments of November 29, 1920, and February 24, 1921, were made expressly as 'a final settlement of the 1918 account,' and it must be presumed that the settlement included all credits to which the defendant was entitled. The stated account and the accord and satisfaction are not attacked on the ground of fraud or mistake in the procurement thereof.

[16, 17] "The contentions that the agreements between the association and its members create an unlawful trust or combination in restraint of trade, and that the stipulation in the agreement for liquidated damages is invalid, are sufficiently answered contrary to appellant's contentions, in the decisions first cited in this opinion. The clause providing for liquidated damages recites that 'it is now and ever will be impracticable and extremely difficult to determine the actual damage resulting to the association should the grower fail to consign and deliver his beans.' The complaint alleges, and the court found, to the same effect. From the nature of the association and its agreements with its members it is apparent that it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage resulting from such a breach of the agreement by a member. The agreement contemplates that the association may sell the beans of a grower prior to the delivery thereof to the association. It provides: 'The grower agrees to ship directly to any person under contract with the association such percentage of his shipments as the association may direct, packed as the association may instruct.' If growers refuse to deliver their beans to the association, it may find it impossible to fulfill its own contracts for the sale of beans and thereby become liable in damages to the buyers thereof. If large quantities of beans are withheld by the growers, and sold directly by them, the market for beans may be undermined to the detriment of all members of the association. Such conduct on the part of the growers may well imperil the very life of the association or destroy it and defeat the purposes for which it is organized.

[18] "The by-laws of the association provide: 'If any member shall cease, fail, neglect, or refuse for any reason whatsoever to market all or any of the beans grown or owned by him as provided by the said crop sale agreement, then his membership shall ipso facto cease and determine, and his certificate and his membership in this association and all of his rights and interest therein shall by that act be automatically canceled, and such member shall not, nor shall any one in his behalf, be entitled to any appraisement or share in the property or good will of the association.' The question arises whether, upon defendant's refusal to deliver its beans of 1919, it ceased to be a member, and, if so, whether it was thereby released from its agreement to deliver its beans of 1920. The association took no steps to cancel defendant's membership, but insisted that the defendant was under obligation to deliver its crops of 1919 and 1920 under the terms of the agreement. In Central Oil Co. v. Southern Refining Co., 154 Cal. 165, 97 P. 177, there was involved a contract for the sale by the plaintiff to the defendant of not less than 5,000 barrels of oil a month for a period of one year. The agreement provided: 'The violation of any of the terms or conditions thereof by either party hereto shall work a forfeiture thereof, and this agreement shall thereupon become void and of no effect.' The defendant took oil as provided by the contract for a time, and then refused to take any oil during the remainder of the year. Plaintiff thereupon sued for damages consisting of lost profits for the remaining months of the year. Plaintiff was given judgment, and the defendant appealed. The court said: 'Appellant's first and principal contention is that by force of the terms of the contract itself, when defendant violated it, the agreement became "void and of no effect"; that this provision means that the violation terminated the contract, and that consequently plaintiff had no right of recovery under it. Clearly appellant misconstrues the force of the language upon which it relies. The language means that by a violation of the terms of the contract the rights of the party violating it cease, and, as to that party and to that extent, the agreement becomes void and of no effect. It would be an extraordinarily unreasonable construction to give the language the meaning for which appellant contends.' That case is decisive of the question here under discussion.

[19] "Appellant contends that the judgment is erroneous, in that it allows interest upon the amounts awarded as liquidated damages from the respective dates upon which the defendant refused to deliver his crops of 1919 and 1920. Such amounts were capable of being made certain by mere calculation, and interest thereon, therefore, was properly allowed. Civ. Code, § 3287.

"A careful examination of the voluminous record does not disclose any error to the prejudice of appellant's rights."

The judgment is affirmed.

LANTZ v. VAI et al. (L. A. 9146.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1926. Rehearing Denied August 26, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑113(2).

Order setting aside judgment destroyed it, and motion for new trial could not be predicated thereon, and appeal from such judgment will be dismissed.

2. Appeal and error 🔑82(3).

Order vacating judgment is reviewable on appeal in same manner as special order after final judgment, and on bill of exceptions prepared according to Code Civ. Proc. § 649, in view of section 663a.

3. Appeal and error 🔑627(2).

Considering that Supreme Court rule allows 40 days for filing transcript on appeal after perfection of appeal, where 77 days elapsed without filing transcript, motion to dismiss appeal will be granted.

4. Exceptions, bill of 🔑40(4).

Where plaintiff applied for extension of time to prepare bill of exceptions 12 days after 10 days allowed to prepare bill, by Code Civ. Proc. § 650, extension was ineffective and conferred no authority to settle bill.

In Bank.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Charles Lantz against Victorine Vai and others, in which Victorine Vai filed a cross-complaint. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeals. Appeals dismissed.

Winslow P. Hyatt, Frederick C. Huber, and Chas. Lantz, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. F. Culver and Earl E. Johnson, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. Respondent Victorine Vai has moved to dismiss the appeals noticed by appellant. As plaintiff in the court below, the appellant brought an action to quiet title to real property. Certain of the defendants, including the respondent Victorine Vai, answering, traversed the allegations of the complaint, and Victorine Vai, by way of cross-complaint, sought to quiet her title to the same land, but under a different description, as against the claims of the plaintiff. The trial court found that both the plaintiff and the defendant Victorine Vai had failed to establish title, or right of possession, and entered judgment that neither plaintiff nor defendant Victorine Vai was the owner of the property.

Judgment was entered on August 19, 1925. On September 8 the defendant Vai served on plaintiff notice of the entry of this judgment. On September 15 she served on plaintiff, and filed, notice of intention to move for a new trial, and on the same day gave notice of motion to have the judgment vacated and set aside and another and different judgment entered. The motion was granted. The court set aside and vacated the judgment of August 19 and rendered another, by which it was decreed merely that the plaintiff Lantz is not the owner, or entitled to the possession, of the real property in dispute. The substituted judgment was entered on October 14, 1925, and on October 27 the defendant Vai served on plaintiff notice of its entry. Plaintiff excepted to the order granting the motion for another judgment, and prepared a bill of exceptions thereto, which was served on October 31, and settled, allowed, and filed on November 19. On the last-named date plaintiff obtained an order from the court extending for 30 days his time within which to prepare a bill of exceptions to the substituted judgment. This second bill of exceptions was presented to the trial judge and was refused settlement on January 14, 1926.

Reference has been made to the fact that on the 15th day of September, 1925, the defendant Victorine Vai served and filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial. On the 19th day of September the plaintiff also served and filed like notice of intention. On November 9, 1925, the motions for a new trial appear to have been denied, although the record in the court below is indefinite as to what actually occurred. On November 24, 1925, plaintiff filed a notice of appeal from that portion of the judgment entered on August 19 in favor of the defendant Victorine Vai and against plaintiff and also from the substituted judgment of October 14.

[1] The respondent Victorine Vai has moved to dismiss the appeals upon the ground that the notice of appeal was not filed within the time allowed by law, and that the transcript was not prepared and filed within time. Appellant conceded at the time of the oral argument that his appeal from the judgment of August 19, 1925, was not properly taken, and might be dismissed. As no formal order of dismissal was entered at the time, he now requests that he be allowed to withdraw the concession. But we are of opinion that no appeal lies from the judgment of August 19. The effect of the order vacating and setting aside the judgment was to destroy it. See Mantel v. Mantel, 135 Cal. 315, 67 P. 758. There can be no appeal from a judgment which has been set aside; neither can a motion for a new trial be predicated upon a judgment which does not exist. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the contention of the appellant that valid proceedings on the motions for a new trial heretofore noted were pending. The appeal from the judgment of August 19 must be dismissed.

[2, 3] The order granting the motion to vacate the judgment of August 19 was one properly reviewable on appeal in the same manner as a special order made after final judgment and on a bill of exceptions to be prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 649 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Code Civ. Proc. § 663a. Such a bill was prepared and filed on the 19th day of November. Therefore, when appellant filed his notice of appeal on the 24th day of November, his appeal was perfected and his record made. The time within which to file his transcript commenced to run on that date, and the 40 days expired on the 3d day of January, 1926. No extension of time for the preparation or the filing of the transcript as to this appeal was obtained, and the plaintiff was not relieved of his default. At the time this notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was given, plaintiff had not only failed to file his transcript within 40 days (Supreme Court rule 2), but 77 days had in fact elapsed. These facts entitle the respondent to an order dismissing the appeal from the order vacating and setting aside the judgment of August 19, 1925.

[4] Notice of entry of the substituted judgment was served on the 27th day of October, 1925, and plaintiff, under section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then had 10 days to prepare and serve a draft of his proposed bill of exceptions. The 10 days expired on November 7. He did not apply for an extension of time to prepare this bill until the 19th day of November, which was 12 days too late. The order of the judge granting the extension after the expiration of the statutory period within which to prepare the bill was ineffective and was properly ignored by the lower court as conferring no authority upon it to settle the bill subsequently presented. In re Clary, 112 Cal. 292, 295, 44 P. 569. See also, Cameron v. Arcata, etc., R. Co., 129 Cal. 279, 61 P. 955, and Rath v. Vaughan, 45 Cal. App. 38, 187 P. 44.

No transcript having been prepared and filed within the time required by law, and it not appearing that the plaintiff below who is seeking to appeal was relieved from his default, it is ordered that the appeals be and they are dismissed.

1. Executors and administrators ⚷314(11)—Court had power in considering administrator's petition for distribution to determine heirs and next of kin, notwithstanding absence of statutory proceeding to determine heirship (Code Civ. Proc. § 1664).

Where certain parties claiming to be heirs filed petition for partial distribution to them, and subsequently administrator filed petition for distribution to alleged father and only heir of deceased, court, in determining petition had power to decide who were next of kin and heirs and to distribute to persons entitled thereto, notwithstanding absence of proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine heirs.

A decree of distribution is conclusive as to rights of heirs, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1666.

3. Executors and administrators ⚷314(12)—Orders determining heirs on petition for distribution held unappealable in advance of decree for distribution, but reviewable on appeal from decree (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3).

Minute order determining heirs and next of kin and subsequent written order on same subject, made in determining petition for distribution when there had been no proceeding to determine heirship, held not appealable in advance of decree of distribution, but reviewable on appeal from such decree, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 3.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Petition by the administrator of the estate of John Wilson, deceased, for distribution. From a decree determining heirship, John Wilson, alleged father and heir of deceased, appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Siemon & Garber, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondent administrator.

I. F. Chapman, of San Francisco, and H. Ray Bailey, of Bakersfield, for other respondents.

SHENK, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal in a probate proceeding. The motion is made on the ground that the order is not appealable and on the further ground that the appeal was not taken within the time provided by law.

By order duly made on March 18, 1924, the public administrator of Kern county was appointed administrator of said estate. In the petition for letters of administration it was stated that the heirs of the deceased were unknown. On May 8, 1924, notice was served on the administrator that Alfred Edward Stay, Frederick Charles Stay, Mary Victoria Robbins, and Ada Stay Penney claimed to be heirs at law of the deceased, and requesting that notice of certain designated proceedings during the course of the administration of the estate be given to them. On October 2, 1924, the said alleged heirs filed a petition for partial distribution of the estate to them. On February 20, 1925, the administrator filed his first and final account, report, and petition for distribution, in which he alleged, among other things, that the next of kin and only heir at law of the deceased was John Wilson, father of the deceased. On the same day, to wit, February 20, 1925, John Wilson served notice on the administrator that he was the sole heir of the deceased, and requested special notice of certain proceedings thereafter to be taken in connection with the settlement of the estate. By stipulation of all the parties the first and final account, report, and petition for distribution was continued to and set for hearing on the 15th day of June, 1925, the same to be submitted and determined upon depositions theretofore taken and then on file. The matter was heard, and on July 11, 1925, the court caused to be entered a minute order, wherein it was "ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the next of kin and only heirs of said deceased are Alfred Edward Stay, Frederick Charles Stay, Mary Victoria Stay Robbins, and Ada Stay Penney; that the petition of the administrator to distribute the property to one John Wilson, alleged father of said deceased, be denied"; and the matter of the settlement of the account and distribution of the estate was thereupon continued pending the ascertainment and payment of the inheritance tax. The order concluded as follows: "If findings are necessary, let attorneys for the above heirs prepare findings and order to be signed by the court."

No findings were prepared or presented by counsel, whereupon the trial judge of his own motion prepared and filed, on November 10, 1925, a document denominated, "Decree establishing heirship," wherein it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the heirs of the deceased were as determined in the minute order of July 11th, and likewise that the said John Wilson was not the father of deceased nor entitled to share in the estate. On November 20th the said John Wilson served and filed his notice of intention to move for a new trial. The motion was heard and denied on January 18, 1926, and on the same day the said John Wilson filed his notice of appeal from the written order of November 10th. It is the appeal from that order that is now sought to be dismissed.

[1-3] It is obvious from the foregoing facts that neither the minute order of July 11th nor the written order of November 10th were made and entered pursuant to proceedings taken under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure. No petition to determine heirship was filed after the expiration of one year from the appointment of the administrator nor at all except as such relief was sought in the petition for distribution which is still pending. Nor was there any order made by the court directing service of notice on persons interested, as required by said section 1664. There was not even an attempt to proceed under that section. All the parties were, however, properly before the court on the petition for distribution. In determining that petition the court had full power to decide who were the next of kin and heirs at law of the deceased and to distribute the estate to the persons entitled thereto. Estate of Schmierer, 168 Cal. 747, 145 P. 99; More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 495, 65 P. 1044; The William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 48 P. 323; 12 Cal. Jur. 186, and cases cited. The decree of distribution is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal. Section 1666, Code Civ. Proc. The minute order of July 11th and the written order of November 10th were both made pursuant to issues relating to heirship involved in the petition for distribution. They were determinations necessarily incident to that petition when, as here, there had been no proceedings taken under section 1664. In advance of the decree of distribution those orders were therefore not appealable. But the same matters were and are subject to review on appeal from any decree of distribution which may hereafter be made pursuant to the petition therefor (subdivision 3, § 963, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Allen, 175 Cal. 356, 165 P. 1011; Estate of Wittmeier, 118 Cal. 255).

In support of the second ground of the motion it is urged that the minute order of July 11th, in probate practice, was a final order from which an appeal, if any, must have been taken, and that it was unnecessary for the court to enter a second order on the same subject in order to set the time running for an appeal. There is merit in the contention (sections 1704, 1715, Code Civ. Proc.; Tracy v. Coffey, 153 Cal. 356, 95 P. 150), but in view of our conclusion that neither the order of July 11th nor the order of November 10th was an appealable order it becomes unnecessary to further consider or pass upon the second ground of the motion.

The motion is granted, and the appeal is dismissed.

MURPHY v. BUCKE'S DEPARTMENT STORE. (Sac. 3702.)

Appeal and error ⚷443—Retention of jurisdiction by trial court over parties and subject-matter to secure to owner of unissued corporate stock issuance of shares held valid.

Where plaintiff owned unissued shares, judgment that corporate directors proceed to obtain permit for issuance, and on failure to so proceed then court clerk should make application, and that retained jurisdiction until application should be determined, held valid; hence appeal while trial court was so proceeding did not oust it of jurisdiction.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by E. P. Murphy against Bucke's Department Store, a corporation, for money had and received. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Duard F. Geis, of Willows, for appellant.

R. M. Rankin, of Willows, and W. E. Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in his favor. He brought the action against the defendant corporation, setting forth three counts in the complaint. The first count related to $6,000, alleged to be due as the value of his interest in a stock of merchandise assigned to defendant corporation; the second was for the recovery of $5,000 paid in cash to the corporation upon its formation on account of the purchase by the plaintiff of 50 shares of stock of the corporation, of the par value of $100 each; the third was for money had and received, and embraced the total of the two previous counts, or $11,000. The answer denied any liability on the part of the defendant corporation, and by affirmative allegations set forth the facts as found substantially by the court.

John Bucke had conducted a general merchandise store in Orland, Glenn county. In 1920 he met with financial reverses. In behalf of his creditors the business was taken over by the San Francisco Board of Trade, and was conducted for a brief period by a representative of that board. Mrs. I. M. Bucke, wife of John Bucke, J. J. Lachenmyer, a brother of Mrs. Bucke, and the plaintiff, E. P. Murphy, entered into an agreement with the Board of Trade whereby Murphy, acting in behalf of himself, Mrs. Bucke, and Lachenmyer, purchased the business for a certain cash consideration, and, in addition, gave promissory notes for $19,000 signed by himself and indorsed by Lachenmyer. The business was then conducted by the three for a short period as a copartnership; each partner owning an undivided one-third interest. On October 20, 1920, they incorporated under the name of Bucke's Department Store, with a capital of $50,000. The three copartners were the only stockholders and directors. Lachenmyer was elected president, Mrs. Bucke vice president, and Murphy secretary. In addition to the transfer of the merchandise, valued at $18,000, to the corporation, each of the parties contributed $5,000 in cash, with the understanding that each was to receive capital stock representing his one-third interest in the merchandise and his $5,000 cash contribution. In February, 1921, the board of directors passed a resolution directing the secretary and attorney to prepare the necessary application to the commissioner of corporations for permission to issue its stock. The application was prepared by Murphy as secretary, but, according to the court's finding, was held in abeyance by agreement of the board of directors, and was never filed. This was the status in April, 1922, when plaintiff left the business, moved to Los Angeles, and ceased to act as secretary, although he did not resign from that office. Raymond Lachenmyer, son of J. J. Lachenmyer, became the acting secretary, and the minute book and other records of the corporation remained in Orland.

In December, 1922, plaintiff made written demand upon the corporation to issue to him 50 shares of its capital stock to represent his $5,000 cash contribution. The corporation made no reply, nor did it take any steps to secure permission to issue its capital stock. On December 13, 1922, plaintiff made demand upon the corporation that it return to him the sum of $5,000 previously paid in. On March 1, 1923, the complaint in this action was filed. After trial before the court sitting without a jury, it was adjudged that plaintiff was the owner of one-third of the capital stock of said corporation; that the defendant make application to the commissioner of corporations for permission to issue $25,000 par value of capital stock; that one-third of not to exceed $25,000 par value of whatever amount of stock might be authorized be issued and delivered to plaintiff; that the directors proceed to obtain such permit prior to April 12, 1924; that, in the event of their failure to do so, the clerk of the court be appointed a commissioner to do so, and that the court retain jurisdiction until such time as plaintiff should receive his stock.

The plaintiff contends that the judgment was not responsive to the issues, and did not afford him the relief to which he was entitled. On the issues raised by the complaint and the denials and affirmative allegations of the answer the court found facts which clearly entitled the plaintiff to the issuance of the stock of the corporation to the extent of his one-third interest. In fact, the defendant concedes that the plaintiff is entitled to the issuance of the stock, and the plaintiff concedes that he could not be legally aggrieved if the said stock were issued to him. But he complains that the form of the judgment was not in the alternative, in this, that it did not provide that he would be entitled to the reasonable value of the stock, in the event of the nondelivery thereof to him within a reasonable time.

The issues presented by the pleadings and the proof may properly be deemed of equitable cognizance. In the consideration of the evidence presented thereon, the court provided for a proper remedy—the issuance of the stock to the plaintiff. To that end it was provided that the necessary preliminary steps be taken to obtain authority to issue the stock to which the plaintiff was entitled. This authority could only be granted by the filing of an application for a permit to issue the stock with the commissioner of corporations, and the judgment provided that this should be done. The judgment was rendered, served on the defendant, filed and entered on March 26, 1924. It was therein provided that the directors of the defendant proceed in the manner provided by law to obtain a permit for the issuance of said stock prior to April 12, 1924, and, in the event that the directors failed to so proceed, then the clerk of the court as a commissioner on behalf of the defendant should make the application. The judgment further provided that the court retain jurisdiction of the cause until such time as the application for the permit to issue the stock be heard and determined by the commissioner of corporations. The judgment was therefore interlocutory in character. It contemplated further action on the part of the court in the event the permit be issued and necessarily such further action as might be deemed proper in the event the permit be not issued. But the plaintiff filed his notice of appeal on April 5, 1924, or seven days before the expiration of the time within which the defendant was required to file the application for the permit. Assuming that the judgment was appealable, the trial court was ousted of its jurisdiction by the appeal before the defendant was in default under the judgment, and before any showing was made that the issuance of the permit and the stock could not be brought about as required by the judgment. Under the circumstances the plaintiff was not aggrieved at the time the appeal was taken. We do not deem it necessary to decide whether or not the judgment was appealable. In either event the court retained jurisdiction over the cause to see that the plaintiff obtained what he was entitled to under the facts. There is nothing particularly unusual or contrary to good practice for the court, in the exercise of its equity powers, to retain jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter of the action, when the circumstances of the case warrant the same, until the appropriate remedy may be finally accorded by the judgment in the action. The plaintiff had paid in full for, and was the owner of, the stock in question, and he was therefore entitled to the aid of the court in obtaining the issuance to him of a certificate representing such ownership. Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 117, 28 P. 110; Cortelyou v. Imperial Land Co., 156 Cal. 373, 104 P. 695; 6 Cal. Jur. 754, and cases cited. This the trial court was proceeding to do when the notice of appeal was filed herein.

Having concluded that the court still has jurisdiction to proceed in the manner contemplated by the judgment, it is unnecessary to pass upon other questions raised on this appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the Railroad Commission to assume jurisdiction of a complaint against the Southern California Telephone Company, filed by petitioner herein.

The complaint lodged with the commission showed substantially the following facts: Petitioner is a private corporation which is, and for several years has been doing business in the city of Los Angeles. The Southern California Telephone Company is a "telephone corporation" within the definition thereof given in the Public Utilities Act, and is a "public utility" within the terms of said act. Stats. 1919, pp. 491, 493, § 2 (t), (dd). The telephone company operates a telephone line in the city of Los Angeles, and in connection with its telephone business in that city, and to facilitate telephonic communication by such of the public as wish to use its telephones, it annually issues to, and distributes among its subscribers telephone directories. In these directories are listed the names and telephone numbers of its subscribers. For some years past the telephone company has permitted a large number of persons who are among the number of its subscribers, including the petitioner here, to insert advertising matter in the classified business section of the directories issued by it. It has based its charges for this advertising upon a schedule of rates and charges which were established by it for the purpose. For a number of years past it has printed in heavy, black, bold-faced type the names of such of its telephone subscribers as would pay a fixed and established charge for the privilege of having their names so printed. Petitioner is one of those whose names were thus printed. Prior to 1925 the telephone company's charge to all such advertisers for inserting advertising matter in the classified business section of its directories was $50 a month for each half page of advertising, and for printing the names of subscribers in heavy, black, bold-faced type $1 per month for each name printed in this distinctive manner. In each of several years prior to 1925 petitioner and the telephone company entered into a contract under which the telephone company undertook to, and did, insert in the classified business section of its directories five half pages of advertising matter for petitioner, and also caused petitioner's name to be printed in bold-faced, black type in the place where it occurs in the listed names of the telephone subscribers; and petitioner agreed to, and did, pay for this advertising at the above-mentioned rates. When preparing to print and issue the directories for 1925, the telephone company notified petitioner that it intended raising the rates theretofore fixed by it for the advertising which it previously had done for petitioner, and informed the latter that the rates which it previously had charged for such advertising as petitioner had caused to be inserted in the classified business section of the directories would be increased from the former rate of $50 per month to the rate of $100 per month for each half page, and that the rates for printing all subscribers' names in bold-face, black type would be increased from $1 to $5 per month. Other advertisers were given the privilege of advertising in the classified business section of the new directories at the old rate of $50 per month. The increased rates were established by the telephone company without the order or authorization of the Railroad Commission.

In the complaint which petitioner filed with the respondent commission, that body was asked to assume jurisdiction over the matters set forth in its said complaint, and conduct a hearing thereon, and grant to the petitioner such relief as the facts developed upon such hearing required, and as were just and equitable in the premises. The commission declined to entertain the complaint upon the ground that the law had not vested it with jurisdiction so to do. Hence this proceeding.

It is claimed by petitioner that a telephone directory is a constituent part of the company's "telephone line" within the definition of that term as given in subdivision (s) of section 2 of the Public Utilities Act, and that therefore, the additional charges are void, because the increases were not authorized by the Railroad Commission. It likewise is claimed that the increase in the rate charged petitioner for advertising in the classified business section of the directories as compared with the rates charged other like advertisers constitutes an unlawful discrimination, and therefore void.

[1-3] The single question presented in this proceeding is as to whether the Railroad Commission has, and should, assume jurisdiction over the telephone directories of the Southern California Telephone Company, a public service corporation, and over the matter of the form and content of such directories, and over the matter of the charges and receipts of said corporation connected with, and accruing from, the publication, distribution, and use of such directories. A telephone directory is an essential instrumentality in connection with the peculiar service which a telephone company offers for the public benefit and convenience. It is as much so as is the telephone receiver itself, which would be practically useless for the receipt and transmission of messages without the accompaniment of such directories. The form which such directories conveniently took with the inception of this modern method of message transmission was that of an alphabetical list of the names of the subscribers to the service, and there can be no question as to the right of the regulatory body over this form of public utility to regulate the form, content, and cost thereof to subscribers who had entitled themselves to the convenient use of such service. If, for example, the corporation should undertake to put forth a directory which was not alphabetically arranged, the Railroad Commission would doubtless have the right to prescribe such arrangement, or, if the corporation should essay to issue its directory with the names therein printed in a type too small or too dim for comfortable use, or should attempt to issue its directory in an inconvenient or perishable form, the regulatory body doubtless would have power to order remedied these defects in this instrumentality, and, if it should become manifest that the public convenience would be the better subserved by the provision therein of a classified list of subscribers, we do not doubt the power of the regulatory body to require that the telephone companies include such a classification in their directories as are at present provided in the form of a gratuity. In the development of this form of public service telephone companies have found it practicable and profitable to diminish the cost and increase the profits of operation by making use of its directories as a means and form of advertising available to its subscribers. The activities of these companies in this direction have taken on two forms: First, that of the insertion of advertising matter in connection with its classified list; second, in the printing in the alphabetical list of its subscribers the names of those who are willing to pay for such preference in boldface type, or, in other words, in a better and clearer type than that employed in printing the names of subscribers not paying extra for such preferment. Granting the right of these public service corporations to employ this instrumentality for such profitable purposes, we cannot do other than regard its use for such purposes as a mere incident in the operation of its public service over which the regulating body ought to have full control. We think this is made manifest by a consideration of that one of the above-mentioned forms of advertising which these corporations indulge in, viz. the printing for a consideration of the names of certain of its subscribers in black-faced type. We can well conceive that, if the telephone company is to be free of control to select such of its subscribers as it may choose to assess or to favor in this regard, it would be in a position to so juggle with this particular form of advertising as to give a minimum of efficiency to those who did not so advertise, or whom it did not, for any reason, see fit to favor in the foregoing regard, or to discriminate in other respects among its customers, and thus subject this particular instrumentality of its service to serious inequalities and abuses. With respect to the insertion of display advertisements in its directories, while the opportunity for abuse may not be so manifest, the petitioner herein sets forth facts which show that this telephone company is engaged in the exercise of a discrimination as between this petitioner and others of its subscribers in the direction of doubling the rates formerly charged the petitioner for such advertising, while permitting other subscribers to have like space at the former rates. The employment of this instrumentality of its public service as a means for making such discriminations among its subscribers ought not to be tolerated, and can only be permitted upon the theory that the telephone company, in making use of its directory for advertising purposes, is engaged in a strictly private enterprise, and hence in that respect is not subject to public regulation and control. We cannot subscribe to this theory for the foregoing reasons, but there are also other reasons why we think we ought not to do so. The telephone service in its relation to the public, and in its general and practical operation, is, or at least tends to be, a natural monopoly; and, this being so, it is, in an especial sense, the proper subject of public regulation and control. If in the employment of one of its essential instrumentalities it undertakes to so manipulate its form and use as to make a considerable profit out of that portion of the public which it is thus enabled to serve, we are of the opinion that such profit should be taken account of by the regulating body as are the other earnings of this public utility in determining what just and reasonable rates should be allowed and paid by the public for the service it provides.

In reaching the foregoing conclusions, we have given due consideration to the briefs of the respondent and amici curiæ and to the authorities therein referred to. We are cited to no case which immediately touches the question before us, nor do we think that the cases to which counsel refer have application to the situation presented in the instant case. In deciding to issue the writ herein, we do not undertake to determine the scope of the inquiry of the Railroad Commission, but only that it should entertain the complaint of the petitioner with a view to an investigation of the subject over which we think it has full jurisdiction and control.

Let the writ issue requiring the Railroad Commission to take and exercise jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the petitioner's complaint.

YUBA INV. CO. v. YUBA CONSOL. GOLD FIELDS (MARIGOLD DREDGING CO., Intervener). (Sac. 3500.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1097(1).

Where there is no material change in pleadings and material facts on second trial, judgment of appellate court reversing and remanding judgment at first trial is law of the case.

2. Quieting title 🔑19.

Action to quiet title authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 738, is to determine any adverse claims of defendant to land in controversy.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1201(3).

Amendment of pleadings in action to quiet title to conform to determinations of appellate court which reversed and remanded first judgment held unnecessary and did not change form of action.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1214.

Where main contention in action to quiet title was whether deed conveyed fee or easement, appellate court's statement of rights of parties held law of case in second trial, and evidence tending to detract from plaintiff's rights, as thus declared, was properly excluded.

5. Deeds 🔑143—Where, under reservation in deed, plaintiff was entitled to possession, rents, and profits of land until "demand" was made for them, defendant held not entitled thereto before making such demand.

Where, under reservation in deed, plaintiff was entitled to possession, rents, and profits of land until "demand" was made for them, defendant held not entitled thereto before making such demand regardless of whether it would have been complied with if made, "demand" being notice requiring surrender of possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by the Yuba Investment Company against the Yuba Consolidated Gold Fields, in which the Marigold Dredging Company intervened. From the judgment defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles W. Slack and Edgar T. Zook, both of San Francisco, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, and J. E. Ebert, of Marysville, for respondent.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for intervener and respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an action to quiet title. Both the plaintiff and the defendant deraign title through a common source. Judgment in favor of plaintiff at a former trial was reversed (Yuba Inv. Co. v. Yuba Consol. G. Fields, 184 Cal. 469, 194 P. 19). Upon a retrial judgment was again rendered in favor of the plaintiff from which the defendant appeals, presenting the record in a bill of exceptions.

By act of Congress of March 1, 1893 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 10004–10029), the California Débris Commission was created. The purpose of its creation among other things was to make examinations and surveys along the tributaries of the Sacramento river in order that the storage of mining and other débris might be provided for. During the year 1900 the commission desired to acquire certain lands in Yuba county owned by James O'Brien and others for a settling basin to clear the waters of the Yuba river of detritus caused by hydraulic mine dredging and to prevent the detritus from finally reaching the Sacramento river and obstructing its navigable channel. To that end O'Brien, under date of December 6, 1901, executed a deed of conveyance to the United States of America of certain lands in townships 15 and 16 north, range 5 east, M. D. B. & M. The deed described the lands in three parts. The lands first described are called the South Settling Basin and include the lands in controversy located in sections 4, 5 and 8 in township 15 and are 1,000 acres and more in area. The lands secondly described comprise some 800 acres lying between the official banks of the Yuba river and are called the North Settling Basin. The lands thirdly described comprise and are called "Dredging Ground" or the "442-acre tract." For a more extended outline of the terms of said deed reference is made to the opinion of this court on the former appeal. The lands in controversy were acquired by the federal government for the purpose of establishing a settling basin, but as time went on the plans of the federal authorities were changed and the said lands were not used for that purpose. For the reason that said lands were no longer needed by the federal government for the purpose intended or for any purpose they were offered for sale and were described in a deed dated October 30, 1911, purporting to convey the same from the United States to the defendant Yuba Consolidated Gold Fields, a corporation.

A deed dated April 10, 1912, described and purported to convey the said lands from James O'Brien to the plaintiff Yuba Investment Company, a corporation. On April 12, 1912, this action was commenced. The litigation involves mainly the construction of the deed from O'Brien to the United States dated December 6, 1901. As the pleadings were framed and the proof offered on the first trial the plaintiff proceeded on the theory that it was the owner of said lands in fee simple under the deed of grant from O'Brien dated April 10, 1912; that the deed of December 6, 1901, from O'Brien to the United States conveyed to the latter an easement only; that as the purpose for which the easement was created had not been accomplished, and as the plan of establishing a settling basin on said lands had been abandoned, the easement no longer existed. In order to prove its case on that theory, the plaintiff produced evidence of circumstances surrounding and transactions leading up to the execution of said deed as tending to show that it was the intention of the parties that the fee was not to be conveyed but an easement only created. This proof was necessarily offered and received on the supposition that the deed was ambiguous or uncertain in its terms and required judicial construction and the aid of extrinsic evidence to ascertain the intention of the parties. The theory advanced on behalf of the defendant was that the title to the land in fee simple was transferred by O'Brien to the United States; that the original deed was plain and certain; and that parol evidence was inadmissible for the purpose of limiting or qualifying the estate thereby created; and that, as the grantee of the United States, the defendant was possessed of the title in fee. At the former trial the defendant objected to the introduction of evidence of circumstances surrounding and negotiations leading up to the execution of the original deed. The court overruled the objection, and, in the light of the evidence thus admitted, the court rendered its judgment to the effect that the plaintiff was the owner in fee simple of the lands in question; that the deed of December 6, 1901, intended to and did confer upon the United States and that the United States intended to and did acquire only the right to an easement to use and the privilege of using said real property for the purpose of constructing thereon and using the same as a settling basin, and that the defendant had no right, title or interest in said real estate except the right to deposit thereon detritus resulting from dredging operations on the 442-acre tract as provided for in said deed.

On the former appeal this court decided, in accordance with the defendant's contention, that the deed from O'Brien to the United States conveyed the fee, and that parol evidence was inadmissible to explain its terms or aid in its interpretation for the reason that its provisions were clear, plain, and unambiguous. It was also decided on conflicting claims of the parties that the reservations in that deed of the precious metals in the lands therein described necessarily included the incidental right on the part of the plaintiff to extract such precious metals and to such possession of the premises as was necessary to the full enjoyment of that right so long as its exercise did not interfere with the plans and purposes of the United States. It was also decided that, although under the deed the defendant had the right to deposit on the lands of the plaintiff the detritus resulting from dredging operations on the 442-acre tract, the said right of deposit was limited to the reasonable necessities of the defendant in connection with its dredging operations on that tract. It was also decided that the defendant's claim for compensation for the rents and profits of the lands in question as alleged in its cross-complaint was without merit for the reasons that it had not been shown that the United States or its grantee, the defendant herein, had ever demanded possession as a prerequisite to its right to compensation.

In preparation for the second trial the plaintiff amended its complaint to conform to the determinations of this court on the former appeal. The defendant amended its answer and filed an amended and supplemental cross-complaint in which it again set forth its claim for rents and profits from the 12th day of April, 1912, and alleged that any demand on its part for the possession of the premises or for the rents and profits thereof would have been refused by the plaintiff and would have been useless.

On the second trial the court adhered closely to what it deemed to be the law of the case as established on the former appeal. It ruled that by reason thereof the only issue for determination on the retrial was whether the servitude existing in favor of the defendant to deposit detritus from its dredge mining operations on the 442-acre tract should still be imposed upon the lands in controversy, in view of the holding of this court that the defendant was limited in the imposition of said servitude to its reasonable requirements. Accordingly, the trial court received evidence in support of the allegations of the amended complaint, which evidence was substantially the same as that produced by the plaintiff on the former trial, excepting, however, the evidence of circumstances surrounding and negotiations leading up to the execution of the original deed. In harmony with its conception of the law of the case, the court excluded evidence offered in behalf of the defendant, the purpose of which was to show that it was the intention of the parties to the original deed that the reservation to the grantor of the precious metals in the lands in controversy did not include the right to extract and remove the same. It also excluded evidence offered by the defendant, the purpose of which was to show that the dredge mining of the land in controversy was inconsistent with the use of said lands for the purpose of a settling basin. It likewise excluded evidence to show that the defendant had been damaged by the withholding on the part of the plaintiff of certain of the lands in question.

It is the contention of the defendant that the trial court extended the doctrine of the law of the case beyond the point warranted by the decision of this court on the former appeal. It is earnestly insisted that the only issue before this court on that appeal was as to whether the deed of December 6, 1901, conveyed the fee or an easement; that the issue of the right of the plaintiff to extract and remove the gold from the lands in controversy and the further issue of the defendant's dumpage rights were not involved in the former appeal; and that, therefore, the declarations of this court relating to those matters do not constitute the law of the case. On the other hand, it is the contention of the plaintiff that the controlling issues of the controversy were before the court on the former appeal, and it but remained on the retrial to determine, as a question of fact, the reasonable necessity of the continuance of the defendant's dumpage privileges.

[1] We are satisfied that the position taken by the plaintiff and by the trial court should be sustained. There is no dispute between the parties as to what legally constitutes the law of the case. It is only upon the application of the established rules to this particular case that their argument diverges. It is well settled that when the judgment or determination of an appellate court is rendered on a certain state of facts it ceases to be of binding force if the material facts presented upon the subsequent appeal are essentially different or if on the second trial there are material changes in the pleadings or in the evidence. In either case the decision on the former appeal would not be binding on the second appeal as the law of the case. Conversely, if there be no material change in the pleadings and the material facts appear under essentially the same circumstances as on the former appeal, the doctrine of the law of the case does apply (2 Cal. Jur. 944 et seq. and cases cited).

[2] With the foregoing rules in mind it is remembered that the present action is one to quiet title. Such an action, as authorized by statute (section 738, Code Civ. Proc.), is brought by the plaintiff for the purpose of determining any adverse claim that may be asserted by the defendant in and to the lands in controversy.

> "The object of the action is to finally settle and determine, as between the parties, all conflicting claims to the property in controversy, and to decree to each such interest or estate therein as he may be entitled to" (Peterson v. Gibbs, 147 Cal. 1, 5, 81 P. 121, 109 Am. St. Rep. 107).

[3] While it appears that the pleadings herein were amended to conform to the determinations of this court on the former appeal, it is obvious that such amendments did not change the form of the action as an action to determine adverse claims, nor were the amendments necessary in order that the rights of the parties be fully considered and their claims be fully settled on the retrial.

[4] On the former appeal it was decided that the terms of the deed of December 6, 1901, were plain and unambiguous and that parol evidence was for that reason inadmissible to add thereto or detract therefrom or to indicate the intention of the parties. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.; section 1625, Civ. Code; Beall v. Fisher, 95 Cal. 568, 30 P. 773; Riley v. North Star Mining Co., 152 Cal. 549, 93 P. 194; Fitzgerald v. County of Modoc, 164 Cal. 493, 129 P. 794, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1229. It is true that the main contention at the former trial was as to whether the deed conveyed the fee or an easement, but the other issues were inherent in the action and were discussed. It was specifically stated by this court on the appeal that in view of the necessity of a retrial the rights and claims of the parties, under what were necessarily deemed to be the plain and unambiguous terms of the deed, should be stated. The court, therefore, proceeded to and did declare the rights of the parties under the deed. After a careful examination of the record on the former appeal and a careful consideration of the contentions made by the parties on that appeal, including those made by the defendant in its petition for a rehearing, it must be said that this court was justified in considering that the terms of the deed relating to the right of the plaintiff to remove the precious metals from said lands and relating to the plaintiff's right of possession and relating to the extent of the dumpage privileges of the defendant were so plain and certain as not to be subject to modification by parol evidence. The court therefore held, as matter of law appearing on the face of the deed, that the reservation to the plaintiff of the precious metals in the lands in controversy necessarily reserved to it the right also to extract and remove the same; that the plaintiff's right of possession of the land and to the rents and profits therefrom was also reserved unto it until demand had been made therefor; that the dumping privileges acquired by the defendant did not merge in the fee acquired from the United States; and that said dumpage rights extended only to what was reasonably necessary for its mining operations on the 442-acre tract.

With the foregoing determinations before us the conclusion seems impelled that the only issue of fact before the court on the retrial was as to the extent to which the defendant's dumpage rights had survived. On this issue the court found on competent and sufficient evidence that the said rights had been reduced to nothing by reason of the practical completion of all possible mining operations on the part of defendant on the 442-acre tract. It would then be apparent that the evidence offered by the defendant, which was intended to detract from the plaintiff's other rights under the deed as declared by this court on the former appeal, was properly excluded by the trial court. In this state of the case it would necessarily follow that the admissible evidence, with the one exception noted, was substantially the same on the second trial as on the first.

[5] It was decided on the former appeal that, under a proper construction of the language of the O'Brien deed, the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the lands in controversy and to the rents and profits thereof until "demand" therefor had been made by the defendant, and it appeared that no such demand had been made. By amended pleadings the defendant averred that such a demand, if made, would not have been complied with and would have been useless. It is contended that this averment was admitted by the plaintiff by its failure to deny the same; that the "demand" referred to in the former decision must, therefore, be deemed to have been waived; and that, in any event, the court should modify the judgment herein so as to allow the defendant the rents and profits established by the evidence from the 12th day of April, 1912, to the 6th day of December, 1920. Prior to the last-mentioned date, the possession of the premises was surrendered to the defendant with the exception of such possession as was necessary to carry on the mining operations of the plaintiff Many cases are cited by the defendant to the proposition that a demand is deemed waived when it is alleged and proved or admitted that such demand if made would not have been complied with and would have been useless. Such undoubtedly is the law in cases where it is properly applicable, but in the case at bar it has no application. In holding that under the reservations contained in the O'Brien deed the plaintiff was entitled to retain possession of the land and the rents and profits thereof until demand for the same should be made, it is obvious that the term "demand" was used in the sense of "notice requiring surrender of possession." Under the reservations contained in the deed the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the land and to the rents and profits thereof until such notice was given, and no right to possession or to the rents and profits accrued to the defendant prior to such notice. The trial court, therefore, properly denied the relief which the defendant sought on this branch of the case.

[6] Subsequent to the decision of the court on the former appeal the plaintiff entered into an agreement with the intervener, Marigold Dredging Company, a corporation, pursuant to which the intervener agreed to remove the precious metals from certain lands in the South Settling Basin. Under this agreement the intervener dredge mined the lands in a portion of section 5 within said basin. By its complaint in intervention the intervener sought to make common cause with the plaintiff and against the defendant in the litigation. In its cross-complaint the defendant claimed damages against the intervener for the alleged wrongful withholding and dredge mining of the said lands. The trial court excluded evidence of said alleged damages and its ruling is specified by the defendant as error. It cannot be so regarded. The plaintiff had the right to remove the precious metals from said lands, and no good reason has been advanced by the defendant why the plaintiff could not, by contract, vest the intervener with the same right. In its answer to the plaintiff's amended complaint the defendant alleged that the intervener had notice and knowledge, at and prior to the date of said agreement, that the defendant claimed that the plaintiff had no right to extract the precious metals from the lands in the South Settling Basin without the consent of the defendant. Notwithstanding the recital in the agreement of the pendency of this action and in general the issues involved the court found said allegation to be untrue. This finding, as urged by the defendant, is unsupported by the evidence, but this we deem unimportant and not prejudicial to the rights of the defendant for the reason that the intervener had the right to acquire, with full knowledge of the defendant's claim, the same rights to dredge mine the said lands as the plaintiff itself possessed. The advent of the intervener in the litigation created no issues not involved or determinable as between the original parties to the action.

Numerous other points are made by the parties, but in view of the conclusions above expressed we deem further notice of them unnecessary.

PEAK et al. v. KEY SYSTEM TRANSIT CO. (S. F. 11904.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑345(1).

Appeal, taken within 30 days after order denying applicant's motion for a new trial, but not within 60 days after entry of judgment, held proper, if new trial proceeding was duly initiated, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

2. Appeal and error 🔑345(1).

Failure to serve notice of intention to move for new trial on one of two plaintiffs held not to present case, where there was no initiation of new trial proceeding, so as to prevent appeal within 30 days of order denying it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by U. H. Peak and another against the Key System Transit Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. On motion by plaintiff State Compensation Insurance Fund to dismiss defendant's appeal. Motion denied.

Donahue, Hynes & Hamlin, of Oakland, for appellant.

Frank J. Creede, T. W. M. Slaven, and W. J. O'Connor, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] Motion to dismiss appeal. Plaintiff and respondent Peak brought an action to recover damages from defendant and appellant, Key System Transit Company, a corporation, on account of personal injuries, alleged to have been inflicted by the negligence of said Key System Transit Company. Respondent state compensation insurance fund, the carrier of the insurance policy issued to Peak's employer, by virtue of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, and, as such insurer, having paid compensation on account of the injuries received by Peak, also filed an action against said Key System Transit Company to recover the damages which it had sustained and had been compelled to pay by reason of its contract of insurance. Section 26, Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1917 (St. 1917, p. 854), as amended by Stats. 1919, p. 920, § 8. On the second day of the trial the court granted said state compensation insurance fund's motion to intervene as a plaintiff in said action. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiffs in the sum of $2,500. Within the statutory period defendant served upon respondent Peak and filed with the court a notice of intention to move for a new trial, but did not serve said respondent state compensation insurance fund, or its attorneys, with said motion. Within 30 days after the termination of the proceedings upon the motion for a new trial, which was denied, appellant gave to both respondents a notice of appeal and prepared its record on appeal. Respondent state compensation insurance fund, in due time, filed in this court a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal which is now before us. The grounds of the motion, as therein stated, are, first, that the notice of appeal was not filed within the time allowed by law; and, second, that no notice of intention to move for a new trial was served at any time upon it, respondent state compensation insurance fund. Respondent Peak does not join in this motion. The notice of intention to move for a new trial as served upon Peak was within the time allowed by law and the motion having been heard by the court was denied. It is true that the appeal was not taken within 60 days after the entry of judgment, but it was taken within 30 days after the entry of an order denying applicant's attempted motion for a new trial, which was in time if such proceeding was duly initiated. Code Civ. Proc. § 939; Estate of Nutt, 180 Cal. 419, 181 P. 661. Assuming, as we must, that it was erroneous not to serve the state compensation insurance fund with notice of intention to move for a new trial, "it does not follow that no new trial proceeding was duly initiated." Service upon Peak within the time prescribed by statute conferred jurisdiction upon the trial court to determine the motion. Estate of Nutt, supra. This proceeding does not, as pointed out in the Estate of Nutt, supra, present a case wherein there was no initiation of a new trial proceeding as to any adverse party.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

C. J. KUBACH CO. v. McGUIRE, President of Board of Public Works. (S. F. 12179.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑58.

"Charter" is not only organic law of city, but also law of state within constitutional limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Charter.]

2. Municipal corporations 🔑58.

City charter, being enactment of lawmaking power of state, is subject to recognized rules of statutory construction.

3. Statutes 🔑233.

State and its agencies are not bound by general words of statute limiting rights and interests of citizens, unless expressly or impliedly included within limitation.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑666.

City charter provision, limiting height of buildings in certain district to 150 feet, in absence of express language to that effect, held not to restrict height of buildings erected by city.

5. Municipal corporations ⚿666—City hall held not subject to height limitation.

Though neither overwhelming vote of electors in favor of new city hall 400 feet in height, nor construction of other public buildings in excess of general charter limitation of 150 feet on height of buildings, is conclusive as to scope of such provision, they shed some light on question whether Legislature and people intended that city itself should be subject to limitation thereof.

In Bank.

Application by the C. J. Kubach Company for peremptory writ of mandamus against Hugh J. McGuire, as President of the Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles, to compel him to sign a certain contract for construction work on the City Hall. Writ granted.

Richard J. O. Culver, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Lucius P. Green, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. At a special election held in 1923 in the city of Los Angeles, the electors thereof authorized the issuance of bonds in the sum of $5,000,000 for the construction of a new city hall. By a vote of more than two to one said electors have expressed a preference for the construction of the new building on a plot of ground 400 feet wide and 800 feet long on North Main street between First and Temple streets, and to consist of a 28-story structure approximately 400 feet in height. The main portion of the building, as designed and approved by the voters, will, if constructed, be 200 feet wide by 400 feet long to the height of four stories, then 150 feet wide by 250 feet long for an additional six stories, and the balance of the building will be in the shape of a tower 110 feet square.

The city has expended in excess of $2,500,000 for the acquisition of the land upon which to construct the building as proposed. The necessary excavations have been made, and the foundations have been constructed. Contracts have been let for the steel construction, and other contracts, not included within the general contract, hereinafter mentioned, have been awarded. After proceedings duly taken pursuant to the requirements of the city charter, a contract was awarded to the petitioner for furnishing all necessary labor, materials, equipment, and appliances for the construction of that portion of the new building embraced within the plans and specifications for the general contract for the sum of $2,852,700. The contract was duly prepared, and by proper resolution the board of public works directed its president, the respondent herein, to sign the same on behalf of said city as provided by the charter. The respondent has refused to sign the contract on the ground that it calls for the construction of a building in excess of 150 feet in height, and therefore in alleged violation of section 3 (11) (a) of the Charter, which provides:

> "No building, structure or any part thereof of a height exceeding one hundred fifty feet shall be erected within that portion of the city described as follows, or within one hundred fifty feet of the exterior boundaries of said district.
> "Bounded on the north by Temple street, and the easterly prolongation thereof; on the east by San Pedro street, and the northerly prolongation thereof; on the south by Pico street and on the west by Figueroa street."

This proceeding in mandamus is to compel the respondent to sign said contract, notwithstanding his predilections as to the alleged violation of the provision of the charter above quoted. The application for a peremptory writ had been submitted on a general demurrer to the petition setting forth generally the foregoing facts.

It is the contention of respondent that the said charter provision is applicable alike to the city in the construction of its public buildings as to the inhabitants of said city in private enterprises. It is the contention of the petitioner that the city is not so bound unless the language of the limitation is clear and unmistakable, to the effect that the city itself should be so bound, and that such language does not here appear.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that the contention of the petitioner should be sustained. Under the Constitution, the charter of the city is not only the organic law of the city, but it is also a law of the state within the constitutional limitations (Ex parte Sparks, 120 Cal. 395, 399, 52 P. 715; Dalton v. Lelande, 22 Cal. App. 481, 487, 135 P. 54; Stern v. City Council of Berkeley, 25 Cal. App. 685, 688, 145 P. 167). Being an enactment in the exercise of the law-making power of the state, it is subject to the recognized rules of statutory construction. In the interpretation of a legislative enactment it is the general rule that the state and its agencies are not bound by general words limiting the rights and interests of its citizens unless such public authorities be included within the limitation expressly or by necessary implication. Marin Municipal Water Dist. v. Chenu, 188 Cal. 734, 207 P. 251; Balthasar v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 187 Cal. 302, 202 P. 37, 19 A. L. R. 452; Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, 89 Cal. 110, 26 P. 646, 23 Am. St. Rep. 451; Wittaker v. County of Tuolumne, 96 Cal. 100, 30 P. 1016.

[4, 5] The rules laid down in the foregoing cases would seem to apply to the city in its present situation, and to justify the conclusion that it was not intended that the city should be so restricted in the construction of its public buildings. This conclusion is fortified by the showing also made by the petition herein, that, since the adoption of said charter provision, a public library building and a new hall of justice, both in excess of 150 feet in height, having been constructed within said district without objection. While neither the overwhelming vote in favor of a new city hall of this particular height and design at the location mentioned, nor the construction of the other public buildings within said district in excess of the general charter limitation, is conclusive as as to the scope of said provision, nevertheless those facts shed some light on the question as to whether it was intended by the people of the city and by the Legislature in adopting and approving the charter provision that the city itself should be subject to the height limitation prescribed in said section 3. We think there is not in that section such a clear and definite expression of the intentions so to limit the city in the construction of its public buildings as would remove the provision from the operation of the general rule contended for by the petitioner.

Let a peremptory writ issue requiring the respondent to sign said contract as directed by the board of public works and as prayed for herein.

We concur: WASTE, C. J.; SEAWELL, J.; RICHARDS, J.; CURTIS, J.; TYLER, Justice pro tem.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by May H. Moody and another against I. G. Zumwalt. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick and R. W. Palmer, all of San Francisco, and Alva A. King, of Colusa, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Justice Lawlor, is adopted as the opinion and decision of the court:

"This action was instituted by the plaintiffs to recover of the defendant the sum of $6,604.68 alleged to be owing as accrued interest under an option granted to the defendant to purchase certain real property owned by the plaintiffs and situate in the county of Colusa, for the further sum of $493 asserted to be due for taxes on said land for the year 1921, for a balance due for rent of said realty, and for interest on the above sums. The defendant admitted the amount due for rent and offered to permit entry of judgment for that amount. After trial, however, the court entered judgment for the plaintiffs for the full amount as prayed for, whereupon the defendant appealed particularly from that portion of the judgment which related to the recovery of the alleged accrued interest under the option and the tax item mentioned.

"It appears that the respondents owned a tract of 960 acres in the said county of Colusa which they had let to one W. H. O'Hair for a period of six years from November 1, 1916 at a rental of $960 per year. The lease to said O'Hair contained a covenant granting to said lessee the right and option within one year after the date of the lease to purchase the said premises at a price of $60 per acre. On December 12, 1917, the said lessee assigned his lease to the appellant, whereupon the respondents executed a document of even date therewith by which they ratified and consented to said assignment and in which, among other things, they granted to the appellant 'the exclusive option of purchasing the said land on or before the 1st day of November, 1919, at the price of $60 per acre. * * *' At subsequent dates the respondents by written agreements granted to the appellant five extensions of time within which he might exercise the option to purchase, these extensions being dated October 28, 1919, November 25, 1919, February 24, 1920, April 22, 1920, and December 28, 1920, respectively.

"The first of the foregoing enumerated written agreements between the parties to mention the payment of interest and taxes by appellant is that of February 24, 1920, which served to extend appellant's option sixty days from March 1, 1920. The pertinent part of said written agreement reads as follows: 'It is understood that said I. G. Zumwalt shall pay us 7 per cent. interest on the amount called for and due under said option from date hereof and also the taxes or other assessments levied on said land.' The extension of April 22, 1920, reads in part: 'I, G. Zumwalt must pay interest at 7 per cent. per annum for balance now due and also advance for us $900.00 due George Strickland for interest, which said $900.00 and $5,000.00 heretofore paid shall be deducted from the purchase price.' The last of the extensions above-mentioned, being that dated December 28, 1920, contains this declaration: 'Zumwalt to pay interest at 7 per cent. per annum as above stated. * * *'

"The appellant did not purchase the land as provided for in the option and the various extensions thereof. It is the appellant's contention that the quoted declarations touching the payment of interest and taxes by him and found in the later extensions of the option did not amount to an unconditional promise on his part to pay said sums but that said interest and tax sums were payable by him only in the event he exercised the option and purchased the realty in which case the sums mentioned were to constitute a part of the purchase price. On the other hand, the respondents urge that the agreements between the parties show an unconditional promise on the part of appellant to pay the interest and tax items regardless of whether or not he exercised the option and purchased the land.

[1-3] "A solution of the question presented involves an interpretation of the several extensions of the option granted by the respondents to the appellant and in which these sums are referred to. In our opinion, the above quotations taken from the agreements extending the option show an intention on the part of appellant to pay the interest and tax sums irrespective of his purchase of the premises covered by the option. There is nothing in the above agreements which restricts or even tends to restrict the payment of said sums by the option holder. His promise to pay said interest and taxes is not in express language confined to the event of his purchase of the realty. Nor is there a want of consideration to support this unconditional promise made by appellant. In addition to the consideration which the written agreements import there was a continuous extension of the time within which the option might have been exercised. This latter, in the absence of everything else, would be sufficient consideration to support the appellant's promise."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FREDERICK et al. v. LANDFIELD.
(Civ. 5133.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 17, 1926.)

Brokers ⚷49(3)—Salesmen held entitled to agreed commissions for sale of stock, notwithstanding unauthorized provision for deferred payments, where neither corporation nor its fiscal agent objected thereto.

Salesman, who obtained from purchaser binding contract to purchase stock, which purchaser was both financially able and willing to comply with, and to which neither corporation nor its fiscal agent ever objected by reason of deferred payments provided therein, contrary to terms of salesman's contract, until after other salesmen obtained additional subscription from purchaser, held entitled to agreed commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by A. Frederick and another against Philip E. Landfield. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Erwin C. Easton, of San Francisco, and E. B. Taylor, of Martinez, for appellant.

Sullivan, Sullivan & Theo J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action was one brought by plaintiffs to recover the sum of $1,875 against defendant, a stock and bond broker, for services rendered in procuring a purchaser for 150 shares of the capital stock of the Golden Gate Ferry Company, a common carrier. Defendant Landfield was the fiscal agent of the company in the sale of an issue of its capital stock, and plaintiffs were employed by him as salesmen for the sale of these and other securities. As compensation for their services in selling the stock, defendant Landfield agreed to pay plaintiffs 12½ per cent. of the selling price of $100 a share. Under his agreement with the company, Landfield was authorized to accept 25 per cent. of the amount of each subscription, the balance to be paid at the office of the company. From this 25 per cent. Landfield was entitled to deduct his full commission. Under their employment with Landfield, plaintiffs were instructed as to the terms upon which sales could and would be made, and with this understanding they entered upon their duties as salesmen. In the month of October, 1921, and prior to the transaction in question, plaintiff Frederick, as broker in the employ of Landfield, had sold to one R. M. Horn, of Cloverdale, 40 shares of the capital stock of the ferry company. Subsequently, and on the 7th day of January of the following year, the plaintiffs called at the office of Landfield together, and asked him for the names of some persons who were likely to subscribe for or buy stock in the ferry company. They were informed by Landfield that, in his opinion, the Cloverdale district had not been properly canvassed, and that there was a good opportunity for business in that locality.

Acting upon this suggestion, plaintiffs repaired to the place in question and called upon Mr. Horn, to whom plaintiff Frederick had previously sold the amount of stock above mentioned. They succeeded in inducing Horn to subscribe for 150 shares of the stock. Plaintiffs requested him to pay one-quarter of the purchase price they were required to obtain. This was agreeable to Horn, but at this particular time he did not have the ready cash, but explained to plaintiffs that he was the owner of $33,000 registered Liberty bonds, and had a few days previous mailed a portion of these securities to Washington to be converted into coupon bonds, and he asked if it was possible to wait for at least 10 days until the bonds could be returned to Cloverdale, at which time he would mail a sufficient amount of the bonds direct to the company in payment of the required 25 per cent. Plaintiffs assented to this proposition, whereupon Horn signed the subscription agreement. Indorsed thereon was a memorandum of this agreement. Plaintiffs thereafter fully explained the transaction to defendant Landfield, and delivered to him the subscription agreement. There is testimony to show that Landfield was pleased with the transaction and complimented plaintiffs for their success in obtaining the business. The subscription agreement was thereupon turned over to the Golden Gate Ferry Company. The vice president of that company, at the suggestion of defendant Landfield, in a letter to Horn expressed his pleasure at the sale effected by plaintiffs. No question was raised at this time that plaintiffs were not entitled to their commissions by reason of the failure of Horn to make the actual initial payment of the customary 25 per cent. but, on the contrary, defendant Landfield caused to be delivered to plaintiffs a "pending slip" for their commissions, which was to be paid when the bonds were received.

On January 18, 1922, just two days before the date on which Horn agreed to make his part payment, two salesmen, one named Rosenberg, and the other Lichtman or Light, both of whom were employed by defendant, called upon Horn at his home in Cloverdale and demanded the bonds or money which Horn had agreed to pay upon his purchase of the 150 shares as above narrated. They represented to Horn that they had been sent by an officer of the company to make the collection. Horn informed them that he did not have the particular bonds with him, but if they would call the following day he would deliver other bonds to them. Rosenberg kept the appointment, and, accompanied by Horn, the two proceeded to the latter's bank where the bonds were deposited. Rosenberg, discovering that Horn possessed a larger amount of bonds than that called for by the agreement, proceeded to induce him to purchase an additional 50 shares. He succeeded in doing so, and left the bank with an agreement signed by Horn to purchase 200 shares of the stock, of the value of $20,000, and $5,000 in bonds; the same being 25 per cent. of the price which Horn agreed to pay for the same. The bonds were indorsed to the Golden Gate Ferry Company. Rosenberg delivered the application to the company and it was accepted by it. Horn had signed this new agreement under the distinct understanding that 150 shares of stock already subscribed for by him in his transaction with plaintiffs were included in the new subscription of 200 shares. There is testimony to show that defendant attempted to conceal from plaintiffs that payment upon the stock had been made by Horn in accordance with his agreement with them. Upon ascertaining that Horn had made the payment, plaintiffs demanded from defendant their earned commission. Defendant refused to pay the same, giving as his reason that they had not actually received the 25 per cent. of the purchase price of the stock at the time of its sale, and therefore were entitled to no commissions. This action followed, and plaintiffs recovered judgment for the amount of their claim.

We are asked to reverse the judgment upon the ground that the evidence shows that respondents did not comply with their contract by reason of their failure to actually procure the partial payment at the time of the sale. The testimony shows without conflict that respondents obtained from Horn a perfectly valid and binding contract, and one that Horn was both financially able and willing to comply with. It further shows that neither appellant nor the ferry company ever objected to the contract as procured, but, on the contrary, they were fully satisfied with and accepted the same, and defendant never made any objection to it, by reason of the deferred payment, until after Rosenberg and Light obtained the additional subscription mentioned. This variance in the terms of the sale, under such circumstances, cannot relieve appellant from his liability to pay the agreed commission, as he must be deemed to have assented to such variance. California Land Security Co. v. Ritchie, 40 Cal. App. 246, 180 P. 625; Borton v. Barnes, 48 Cal. App. 589, 192 P. 307; Merzoian v. Papazian, 53 Cal. App. 112, 199 P. 826. The case does not warrant further discussion.

Judgment affirmed.

In re OGDEN'S ESTATE.

HOOK et al. v. OGDEN et al.

(Civ. 3148.)

1. Wills ⚷671—Will leaving residue to testatrix's nephews, to be paid interest until they reached 27, when they were to be given their share, held not to create trust.

Will leaving residue to testatrix's nephews, to whom interest was to be paid until they reached 27, whereupon each was to be given his share, created no trust, and court erred in directing distribution to executor as trustee for nephews, instead of directly to them.

2. Wills ⚷669.

Court has no power, independently of will, to create trust in executor for beneficiaries.

3. Wills ⚷440.

Question for court is not what testatrix intended to declare in will, but what she intended by what she did declare.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Final account and petition for distribution of the estate of Harriett C. Ogden, deceased, by G. W. Ogden and another, as executors. From so much of the decree as ordered distribution to G. Edward Hook as trustee for E. Ogden Hook and another, the latter appeal. Reversed with direction.

Donald McKisick, of Sacramento, for appellants.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The last will of the above-named decedent, after disposing of certain property, provided as follows:

> "I leave all the rest of my estate money in bank—bonds & real estate to my two nephews. E. Ogden Hook & Robert A. Hook the interest to be paid them until they have reached the age of—27—years—at the age of 27. each one is to be given his share— * * * I appoint my brother G. W. Ogden & my brother-in-law G. Edward Hook as executors of the estate without bonds—in case of their death I appoint my nephew—Ogden Hook."

In due course of administration, the executors named in the will filed their final account and petition for distribution of the estate. A decree was entered distributing certain property in accordance with the terms of the will, and then providing as follows:

> "Unto said G. Edward Hook, as trustee, for the use and benefit of E. Ogden Hook and Robert A. Hook, nephews of decedent, all of the rest, residue, and remainder of said estate, as described herein, and all other property of said estate, whether described herein or not; each of said beneficiaries to receive one-half the interest and revenue derived from the said trust property until he shall reach the age of 27 years, and, at the age of 27 years, each shall be given his one-half share of said trust property. * * * No bond shall be required of said trustee for performance of his duties in this behalf."

E. Ogden Hook and Robert A. Hook have appealed "from so much of said decree of distribution * * * which orders and decrees that the distributive shares in said estate of said E. Ogden Hook and Robert A. Hook, legatees, be distributed to said G. Edward Hook, as trustee, for the use and benefit of said E. Ogden Hook and Robert A. Hook."

[1-3] Respondents concede that the part of the decree from which the appeal is taken is erroneous. It is manifest that a trust was not created by the terms of the will. As was said in McCloud v. Hewlett, 135 Cal. 361, 368, 67 P. 333, 336, the court had no "power or jurisdiction to carve out a trust from anything to be found in the will and, independent of the will, it had no power to create the trust." It may be that the testatrix intended to create a trust, but the question for the court to determine is not what she intended to declare in her will, but what she intended by what she did declare therein. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Duffill, 191 Cal. 629, 642, 218 P. 14. The facts of this case are unlike those in Estate of Shaw (Cal. Sup.) 246 P. 48, where it was held that the terms of the will there in question were sufficient to create a trust, even though the word "trust" or "trustee" was not used. The property described in the residuary clause of the will herein should have been distributed directly to E. Ogden Hook and Robert A. Hook.

The parts of the decree appealed from are reversed, with direction to the trial court to distribute said residue of the estate in accordance with the views herein expressed.

1. Brokers ⟹4—Statute requiring bond of broker, conditioned upon faithful compliance "with provisions of law," held not to make bond liable for loss suffered by plaintiff by reason of broker's refusal to accept and pay for balance of stock ordered purchased for his account (Corporate Securities Act, § 5, subd. 3, as amended by St. 1923, p. 90, § 2).

Corporate Securities Act, § 5, subd. 3, as amended by St. 1923, p. 90, § 2, providing that broker's bond shall be conditioned upon faithful compliance "with the provisions of law" by applicant, and on failure to so comply he shall be liable "to any and all persons who may suffer loss," was enacted to prevent fraud in sale of securities, and hence did not make bond liable for loss suffered by plaintiff by broker's refusal to accept and pay for balance of stock ordered purchased for his account.

2. Statutes ⟹181(1), 190.

Statute is to be construed according to intent of lawmaking body, and if statute is plain and unambiguous there is no room for construction.

3. Statutes ⟹189—Mere literal construction of statute ought not to prevail, if opposed to Legislature's intention apparent by act itself.

Mere literal construction of statute ought not to prevail, if it is opposed to intention of Legislature apparent by act itself, and if words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction it should be adopted to effectuate the intention.

*Superseded by opinion 251 P. 241.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Charles J. Blumenthal, doing business under the name and style of the A. E. White Company, against J. W. Larson and others. From an order dismissing the action as against the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Harry O. Bocchio, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Horace W. B. Smith and P. R. Lund, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from an order dismissing an action against a surety on a bond given under the Corporate Securities Act.

There is no dispute as to the facts. The complaint contained two counts arising out of the same transaction. The first is an open book account for securities bought and sold by plaintiff for the account of the defendant Larson, under which it is sought to recover the sum of $620. The second is for a breach of a contract for the sale and purchase of securities, sold by plaintiff and purchased by the defendant, and it alleges that by reason of such breach plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $620. The complaint further alleges in each count thereof that defendant Larson was an investment securities broker, duly licensed as such by the commissioner of corporations; that on the 30th day of June, 1924, the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company executed to the commissioner of corporations the bond required by the Corporate Securities Act to be filed by all applicants for certificates authorizing them to act as investment securities brokers at the time of filing their application therefor; that said bond was in the sum of $5,000 and was executed by defendant Larson, as principal, and by the defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as surety, said bond being given to guarantee the faithful compliance with the provisions of law on the part of defendant Larson, and on the part of his salesmen, agents, and employees; that said bond was renewed on the 15th day of February, 1925, by said principal and surety, and during all the times mentioned in the complaint was in full force and effect. Defendant Surety Company interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, alleging that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against it. The court sustained the demurrer, and upon plaintiff's failure to amend entered judgment dismissing the action as to said defendant Surety Company. This is an appeal from the ruling on demurrer and from the judgment of dismissal.

The action in so far as it affects the Surety Company is bottomed upon subsection 3 of section 5 of the Corporate Securities Act as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 90). The subdivision reads as follows:

> "At the time of filing an application for a broker's certificate, the applicant shall deliver to the commissioner of corporations, a good and sufficient bond for $5,000.00 payable to the state of California, to be executed by said applicant, together with a surety company, and to be approved by the commissioner of corporations. Said bond shall be conditioned upon the faithful compliance with the provisions of law by said applicant and by all agents representing the said applicant, and shall provide that upon failure to so comply the applicant shall be liable to any and all persons who may suffer loss by reason thereof."

The sole question here presented is the meaning to be given to two phrases contained in the above-quoted paragraph of the act in question, reading as follows: "Said bond shall be conditioned upon the faithful compliance with the provisions of law by said applicant, * * *" and "upon failure to so comply the applicant shall be liable to any and all persons who may suffer loss by reason thereof." It is appellant's contention that the phrase, "with the provisions of law," should be so construed as to include the transaction in question, and that, this being so, the bond is liable for the loss suffered by plaintiff by reason of defendant Larson's refusal to accept and pay for the balance of the stock ordered purchased for his account.

[1-4] While the phrase, "provisions of law," is a very broad and general one, we are of the opinion that it only refers to the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act. There are numerous rules of statutory construction to guide courts in ascertaining the true meaning of a statute. A statute is to be construed according to the intent of the lawmaking body. The intent is the vital part, and the primary rule of construction is to ascertain and give effect to that intent. If a statute is plain, certain, and unambiguous, so that no doubt arises from its own terms as to its scope and meaning, a bare reading suffices, and there is no room for construction. The mere literal construction, however, ought not to prevail if it is opposed to the intention of the Legislature apparent by the act itself, and if the words are sufficiently flexible to admit of some other construction, it should be adopted to effectuate the intention. The intent prevails over the letter, and the letter will, if possible, be so read as to conform to the spirit of the act. The language of an act should be construed in view of its title and its purpose. It is indispensable to a correct understanding of the statute to inquire first what is the subject of it and what object is intended to be accomplished. When this is ascertained the answer is found to all its intricacies. General words or phrases may be restrained to it, and those of narrower import may be expanded to effectuate the intent. Guided by these rules, it seems plain to us that the phrase in question relates solely to the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act and not to all laws generally. The title of the act in question declares it to be one for the regulation and supervision of companies, brokers, and agents, to prevent fraud in the sales of securities, and it provides for the enforcement of the act and punishment for violation of its provisions. The manifest and declared purpose is to prevent fraud in the sale of securities. Here no fraud was alleged in the sale of any security. The defendant Larson did not fully comply with the terms of his contract of purchase. In a broad sense he may be said to have violated the law in breaching his contract of sale, but this is not the violation of the law for which the bond was given. To so construe the phrase would create a right of action under innumerable circumstances and conditions. The bond, in our opinion, was not given to insure on the part of Larson his proper adherence to all laws, substantive and otherwise, but rather for a compliance with the provisions of the statute, which was enacted for the purpose of preventing the formation of corporations and the sale of their stock without supervision of the corporation commissioner. This is the manifest intent and purpose of the act, and the bond beyond question was given for the purpose of securing compliance with its provisions. People ex rel. New York, etc., R. Co. v. Willcox, 200 N. Y. 423, 94 N. E. 212.

[5] There is nothing in the act to indicate any intention on the part of the Legislature to extend its meaning so as to include acts of the character in question. If it had been its purpose it would have been a simple matter for the Legislature to have so declared. In an amendment to the act in the year 1925 (St. 1925, p. 962), the Legislature did broaden its provisions, but, of course, the present controversy is not affected thereby, as the alleged cause of action arose long prior to this amendment.

PEOPLE v. ROSNER. (Cr. 921.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 22, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑981(2)—Trial court must exercise "legal discretion" in passing upon motion to submit question of defendant's sanity to jury (Pen. Code, § 1368).

Trial court, upon motion under Pen. Code, § 1368, to submit question of defendant's sanity to jury, must exercise legal discretion, which means discretion founded upon facts and circumstances presented to court, drawing a conclusion governed by law which requires that defendant is entitled to an unbiased, unprejudiced, and considerate judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Legal Discretion.]

2. Criminal law 🔑981(2)—Motion to submit question of defendant's sanity to jury need not show facts establishing insanity, but doubt must arise in mind of court as to defendant's sanity (Pen. Code, § 1368).

Under Pen. Code, § 1368, where motion to submit question of defendant's sanity to jury was supported by affidavits, it was held that Code did not require that facts presented shall establish the insanity of defendant, but only required that a doubt must arise in mind of court as to defendant's sanity.

3. Criminal law 🔑1147.

Where trial court exercised its discretion, a clear case of abuse must appear before appellate court will disturb the conclusion.

4. Criminal law 🔑981(2).

Refusal to submit to jury question of sanity of one accused of issuing fictitious check held not abuse of discretion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Don R. Rosner (true name Wayne D. Parkinson) was convicted of issuing a check without sufficient funds, and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. L. Hart and H. W. Rich, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of issuing a check without sufficient funds in the bank upon which the check was drawn to meet the same, with intend to defraud, etc., and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction entered in said cause. The questions presented for consideration do not really affect anything other than certain proceedings taken and had between the time of conviction and the pronouncing of sentence thereon. The record shows that, when the defendant was arraigned upon the information charging the offense above referred to, the defendant appeared in court without counsel, and apparently without means to obtain counsel, and the court thereupon appointed one William Carragher, an attorney at law, to represent the defendant in all subsequent proceedings. Upon arraignment, the defendant pleaded not guilty, and the cause was duly set for trial. Upon the day set for trial, the defendant appeared in court with his counsel, and at that time the defendant objected to being represented by the counsel theretofore appointed by the court, stating in open court that he discharged him, and that he did not want "to go to court with Mr. Carragher." The jury having been excused, the following proceedings and colloquy took place:

"Mr. Carragher: If the court please, there is in my mind a question as to the sanity of this defendant.

"Defendant: I object, your honor; this man is crazy.

"The Court: You sit down.

"Defendant: I am not trying to pull anything; he is accusing me of insanity, and I say he knows it isn't true, and he knows it isn't so.

"The Court: Don't try to put any of that stuff over here.

"Defendant: I am not trying to put any stuff over on you; you are trying to put something over on me.

"The Court: You think you are smart, trying to pull that stuff around here. You may have got out of other penitentiaries in pulling that kind of stuff, but you can't pull that kind of stuff around here.

"Defendant: I am not interested in that at all, your honor.

"The Court: Proceed.

"Mr. Carragher: I am placed in a very embarrassing position. I talked with the defendant. He gave me an idea as to what his defense—he gave me a statement upon which I predicated his defense, and only yesterday, in talking with him, he just turns the reverse, and again this morning I talked with him and find him off both propositions. I have been given to understand that he has been examined; I don't know whether it was by a commission or not, but at least doctors have examined him, and, if there is some question as to his sanity, it seems to me that he had ought to be examined. If he is sane, he should not be forced to go on with me, because his ideas of a defense and my ideas of his defense don't coincide at all. I have been appointed to look out for his legal rights and propose to do so and will do so, to the best of my ability, and—however, he should at least enjoy my confidence and I should enjoy his, and, if your honor is satisfied that he is sane and should go along, some other counsel ought to be brought in to represent him, some one whom he would respect and listen to and be counseled by.

"The Court: Well, I appreciate your position, Mr. Carragher, but your client will not follow your directions. I am perfectly satisfied that you will properly protect his rights and give him a good defense, but, if he is one of those individuals that knows more than his lawyer, or thinks he does, I appreciate your embarrassing position, when he says that he doesn't wish you to defend him. You want to go to trial without an attorney?

"Defendant: I think that would be very unfair, your honor, but, if necessary, I will do it.

"The Court: It is not unfair, at all. The court appointed—Judge Pullen appointed Mr. Carragher to represent you.

"Defendant: And he advised me against my best thoughts.

"The Court: Very well, then; if you know better than your attorney, and you want to go to trial without an attorney, why, the court will release Mr. Carragher—if you know more about law and more about your defense than Mr. Carragher does. The court doesn't think you do. Mr. Carragher will protect your legal rights, but, if you are not satisfied with counsel the court appoints,—you are a pauper and unable to employ counsel; beggars should not be choosers—but, since you are dissatisfied with Mr. Carragher and do not desire him, if you desire, the court will release him, and you can proceed with your defense.

"Defendant: Will you give me an opportunity to get an attorney of my own and pay them?

"The Court: You had an opportunity to do that, and you haven't done it, and you said you couldn't do it, and the court appointed counsel to represent you, and it was not this court either; it was Judge Pullen appointed Mr. Carragher to represent you, and he appointed able counsel to represent you. Now, then, if you are not willing to follow his advice and feel you desire to dismiss him and to conduct your own defense—

"Defendant: He is fired. * * *

"The Court: Very well, then. Mr. Carragher, you are released from further service. The court desires to protect the defendant, but, if he does not want the service of counsel and is ready to proceed without counsel, why the case has been regularly set down for trial at this time, and we will proceed with the trial.

"Defendant: All right; I ask for a continuance.

"The Court: The motion is denied.

"Mr. Carragher: I subpœnaed the witnesses on behalf of this defendant.

"The Court: Very well. Proceed with the examination of the jurors."

The trial was then had, with the defendant conducting his own case. On the day set for pronouncing judgment, the defendant appeared with counsel representing him upon this appeal, and moved the court to submit to a jury the question of defendant's sanity, under the provisions of section 1368 of the Penal Code, which reads:

> "If at any time during the pendency of an action up to and including the time when defendant is brought up for judgment on conviction a doubt arises as to the sanity of the defendant, the court must order the question as to his sanity to be submitted to a jury; and the trial or the pronouncing of the judgment must be suspended until the question is determined by their verdict," etc.

This motion was supported by two affidavits, one made by V. E. Parkinson, an attorney at law, stating that she was present during the trial of the action against the defendant and observed the demeanor of said defendant during a part of said trial; that during said time defendant conducted himself in a most jovial and boisterous manner, and showed a total ignorance of the fact to be determined at said trial, and acted as though the trial was not a real trial but a mock trial and occasion for merriment; that the defendant spoke of himself as a comedian and of the trial as a show; that, by way of argument to the jury, defendant sang a song that had no bearing upon the case, and announced that he had a better mind and more intelligence than any person in the court; that affiant therefore is of the opinion that the defendant was insane.

The second affidavit was made by H. W. Rich, a practicing attorney, who set forth that at the request of Mrs. V. E. Parkinson he interviewed the defendant at the county jail in Sacramento, and from that interview concluded that the defendant was mentally unbalanced; that the defendant had no understanding of the seriousness of the offense with which he was charged or the gravity of his situation, and was wholly incapable of consulting properly with counsel; that for the foregoing reasons affiant was of the opinion that at the time of the trial the defendant was incapable of defending himself either in person or by counsel, etc.

[1] It is urged upon this appeal that the court abused its discretion in not submitting to the jury the question of the defendant's sanity. With this in mind, we have read the entire transcript, first, for the purpose of determining whether there was not presented to the jury all that it could properly consider in determining the guilt or innocence of the defendant in relation to the offense for which he was being tried, and also for the purpose of reaching a conclusion as to whether the court had exercised that sound discretion with which it was charged in determining such matters, or whether the court had acted either capriciously or arbitrarily, as urged upon this appeal. The law is well settled that a trial court is not given an arbitrary discretion, but a discretion governed by certain fixed and well-established rules. These rules set forth that a court must exercise a legal discretion, which means a discretion founded upon the facts and circumstances presented to the court, from which it must draw a conclusion governed by the law which requires that the defendant is entitled to an unbiased, unprejudiced, and considerate judgment of the tribunal determining the issues presented. It would serve no useful purpose and would lengthen this opinion beyond all reasonable limits were we to set forth the evidence contained in the transcript and the trial as it took place following the colloquy which we have set forth, and, while the words used, which have been called to our attention with considerable earnestness, were not happily chosen, the entire trial thereafter shows a complete want of any really objectionable occurrences or anything whatever that would indicate that the defendant was not receiving a careful, conscientious, and proper determination, so far as the court and jury were concerned, of all the issues tendered concerning the guilt or innocence of the defendant and also of his alleged mental condition. That the defendant acted at times as though he did not fully appreciate his condition, or did not care what happened to him, or assumed an attitude of indifference and levity, does appear from the transcript. There is, however, impressed upon the reader the thought that the defendant to a considerable degree assumed an indifferent demeanor or attitude more for effect than from any mental aberration. So much for the trial.

[2-4] The court had abundant opportunity to study the defendant and come to a conclusion as to his mental condition. The two affidavits which we have set forth in substance contain really no facts upon which any one might predicate a conclusion that the defendant was insane. Section 1368, Penal Code, of course, does not require that the facts presented to the court shall establish the insanity of the defendant before such issue should be submitted to a jury, but only requires that a doubt must arise as to the defendant's sanity. This doubt, of course, arises in the mind of the court before which the cause is being tried, and if, upon the facts and circumstances, the court has no doubt as to the defendant's sanity, the issue tendered should not be submitted to a jury simply because the attorney making the motion or the parties signing the affidavits are of the opinion or think that the defendant is insane. And, when the court has exercised its discretion, a clear case of abuse thereof must be made to appear before an appellate court will disturb the conclusion reached by the trial court. The cold record presented to us does show that the defendant was wanting in his regard for the rights of others, that he had passed several checks and obtained some money in an easy manner, and also that the fact of being charged with a criminal offense made no very great impression upon his mentality, but we are not unmindful of the fact that there are several thousand persons, as shown by the criminal statistics of this state, who have exhibited the same traits, and respect neither the rights of persons nor property, and are little abashed when charged with crime. All these matters are evidences of criminality but not necessarily of insanity, and the record in this case shows as well an indifferent and criminal nature as anything else, and the court, having had an opportunity of studying the defendant personally, could better determine the question as to whether the defendant was simply indifferent and criminal in his instincts or influenced by such mental defects as justify submitting the question of his sanity to the jury. The colloquy set forth in this case between the court, defendant, and counsel, while it might, in part, have properly been omitted, does not establish, as argued by counsel, that the court was prejudiced against the defendant, or did not, when the issue was finally presented, use that legal discretion incumbent upon a court in passing upon the defendant's motion.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

LANE v. LANE. (Civ. 5573; L. A. 8285.)

1. Divorce ⚷184(6).

In action for divorce, power to reconcile conflicts in evidence rested with trial court.

2. Divorce ⚷184(10).

In action for divorce, findings of trial court against defendant on charges of cruelty were conclusive on reviewing court.

3. Divorce ⚷184(6).

In action for divorce, weight of evidence was for trial court, whose conclusion may not be disturbed by reviewing court, unless trial court has abused its discretion.

4. Husband and wife ⚷278(1)—Agreement for settlement of property rights between husband and wife held void, as contrary to good morals, and as obtained by actual fraud (Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159, and section 1572, subd. 4).

Agreement for settlement of property rights between husband and wife, not authorized by Civ. Code, §§ 158, 159, but leaving husband free to inflict on wife marital wrongs, such as would compel her to obtain a divorce, secure in protection of his contract that $5,000 would satisfy all her claims against him, held void, as contrary to good morals, and as obtained through actual fraud, in view of Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4. (Supreme Court, in denying petition for hearing, expresses no opinion as to whether agreement was void, as contrary to good morals.)

5. Divorce ⚷184(12)—Any error in excluding evidence of estoppel of plaintiff to deny validity of agreement for settlement of property rights held harmless.

In action for divorce, any error in exclusion of evidence, setting up an estoppel of plaintiff to deny validity of agreement for settlement of property rights, held harmless, where evidence, if received, would not have constituted an estoppel against cause of action which wife had pleaded for divorce.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul Burks, Judge.

Action for divorce by Ona E. Lane against Percy A. Lane, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Meserve & Meserve and Porter & Sutton, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John E. Biby and Harry C. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against her husband to obtain a decree of divorce. The trial court made findings in her favor, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed, under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

After the defendant was served with process, he appeared and filed an answer, putting in issue the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and at the same time he filed a cross-complaint. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, and the trial in the lower court covered all of the issues made by all of the pleadings.

[1] The first point made by the appellant is that the plaintiff's charges were not sustained, were not true, and were not corroborated. In reply it is sufficient to state that in her complaint the plaintiff stated 11 specifications of cruelty, and that some of the specifications contained numerous different acts. No reason appears why any one of said allegations should be quoted. It is sufficient for the purposes of this opinion to state that some of the charges were charges of mental cruelty, and some of the charges were charges of physical cruelty. In presenting her case, the plaintiff introduced some evidence touching every one of the charges pleaded. She did not introduce corroboration regarding each and every charge, but she did introduce corroboration as to some of the charges of mental cruelty and some of the charges regarding physical cruelty. The trial court made findings in her favor. The utmost that can be said in behalf of the appellant is that there was a conflict as to some of the evidence. However, the power to reconcile the conflicts in the evidence rested with the trial court, and the appellant has not called our attention to any instance where the trial court abused its power.

[2] The appellant complains because the trial court ruled against him regarding the allegations contained in his cross-complaint. Before proceeding further, it is proper to state that the parties were married on the 9th day of August, 1921. This action was commenced by the filing of plaintiff's complaint on August 22, 1923. The cross-complaint was filed on the 28th day of September, 1923. In that paper, among other things, the defendant alleged that on the 25th day of November, 1921, the plaintiff commenced an action in divorce against him, and in her complaint set forth a large number of charges of extreme cruelty, which the appellant proceeded to quote, and then he followed with the allegation that said allegations were false and untrue. The appellant then asserts that the very act of one spouse, filing a complaint in divorce against the other, when the complaint consists of vile, improper, and false charges, is in and of itself an act of cruelty. Thereupon appellant contends that the cross-complaint should have been sustained.

The vice contained in this argument rests in the fact that, so far as this record is concerned, the charges appear to be true and not to be false. As stated above, the earlier action was one pleading a cause of action as for divorce based on the ground of cruelty. The complaint specified the acts. That action was dismissed. However, when this action was commenced, the plaintiff again pleaded the same allegations which she had inserted in her former pleading, and added some others. A trial was had in which proof was introduced both in support of all of those allegations and in contradiction of them. In so far as appellant's pleading was concerned, the trial court made findings against the appellant, which in effect was a holding that the allegations were true, and not false, and in the second place the trial court made findings on the allegations contained in the main complaint, in which the trial court held that the allegations in that pleading were true, and not untrue, as contended by the appellant. Regarding the allegations set forth in the cross-complaint, the most that can be said in favor of the appellant is that the evidence was conflicting. But, as the trial court made findings against the appellant, those findings are conclusive in this court.

[3] As to the allegations and denials contained in the respondent's pleadings, the appellant contends that they are not worthy of belief. In support of this contention the appellant has printed many passages from many letters written by the respondent. However, those letters are not conclusive evidence. Assuming that they were of great weight, the weight of the evidence was for the consideration of the trial court, and the conclusion of that court may not be disturbed by this court, excepting in those instances where the trial court has abused its discretion. There is nothing in the record before us showing that the trial court abused its discretion in any respect whatsoever.

[4] After one of their numerous difficulties, the parties were living separate and apart. While so living, certain conversations were had between the husband and wife regarding their property rights. Later the husband's attorney prepared a formal written instrument on that subject. Still later that written instrument was exhibited to the wife's attorney. Still later it was executed by both parties. By the terms of that instrument the husband agreed to pay the wife $5,000.

> "It is understood and agreed by and between the parties hereto that the payment of the sum hereinbefore mentioned shall be in lieu and place of any other support which the party of the second part [wife] might be entitled to by virtue of the marital relations existing between the parties hereto. * * * The party of the second part agrees that all property now owned by said party of the first part is his separate property, and she does hereby relinquish all claims or right to said property, to all future earnings of the party of the first part, and to all property which he may hereafter acquire in any manner, and said earnings and said property shall be and remain the separate property of said party of the first part. * * * It is further understood and agreed by both parties hereto that the provision hereby made for the party of the second part shall constitute a full and complete satisfaction of all claims and demands of the party of the second part against the party of the first part."

The instrument is entirely silent as to whether the parties were living together, or were living separate and apart, and is likewise silent as to whether said parties in the future intended to live together, or intended to live separate and apart. In framing her complaint the wife set forth the execution of said document, and pleaded the whole thereof in hæc verba. In connection with those allegations she set forth that, at the time the instrument was executed, the parties were living separate and apart without her consent, and that the husband promised, if she would execute the instrument, that thereupon he would return to her, and that thereafter they would live together continuously as man and wife; she further pleaded that said promise was so made by him without any intention of performing it, etc. All of the allegations made by the plaintiff were by the trial court found to be true, and as a conclusion of law that said agreement should be set aside. Thereafter the trial court, as a part of its interlocutory decree, made its order that the appellant should thereafter pay to the respondent "$500 when this judgment is entered, and the further sum of $500 quarter-annually thereafter." The appellant earnestly challenges the findings and judgment, in so far as they affect the validity of said agreement, and earnestly contends that said agreement should be upheld and enforced.

The respondent calls to our attention many of the facts recited above, and thereupon advances the contention that the written instrument was not that kind of a contract that is authorized by sections 158 and 159 of the Civil Code, but that the instrument left the husband free to inflict upon his wife the most grievous marital wrongs, such as would compel her to obtain a divorce, secure in the protection of his contract that $5,000 would satisfy all her claims against him of a pecuniary nature, or in relation to his property, and that contracts of that kind are contra bonos mores. Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 4, 103 P. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107. In this behalf we think the contention of the respondent is well founded. Moreover, the respondent cites the allegations of her pleading, her proof introduced in support thereof, and the findings of the trial court that the allegations are true—that the property settlement was made upon the promise of the appellant that the husband and wife should come together, and thereafter continue to live together as husband and wife, and that said promise was made by the husband without any intention of performing it. Thereupon the respondent advances the further contention that, if she is in error in relying upon the doctrine stated in Pereira v. Pereira, supra, nevertheless that the property agreement was invalid and unenforceable, because it was obtained through an act of actual fraud. Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 4. We think the second contention so advanced is also supported by the facts contained in this record.

[5] The appellant relies on certain facts as constituting an estoppel. The alleged property settlement was signed January 6, 1922. This action was commenced August 22, 1923. On October 1, 1923, the trial court made an order pendente lite, directing the husband to pay the wife $200 per month. Thereafter, commencing January 4, 1924, the trial was had. On April 24, 1924, the appellant filed a cross-complaint, purporting to plead the alleged estoppel. Said pleading was as follows:

> "That, since the filing of his cross-complaint, defendant and cross-complainant has paid to plaintiff the sum of $1,500 under that certain agreement referred to in paragraph V of cross-complainant's cross-complaint; that said sum of $1,500 was paid in installments at the following times and following amounts, to wit: October 1, 1923, $500; November 1, 1923, $200; December 1, 1923, $200; December 31, 1923, $200; February 1, 1924, $200; March 19, 1924, $100; April 1, 1924, $100; that defendant and cross-complainant has made payment in full of the $5,000 called for by said agreement; that said payment of $100 made on the 19th day of March, 1924, as aforesaid, and said payment of $100 made on the 1st day of April, 1924, as aforesaid, were expressly made as payments on said agreement, and were accepted and received by said plaintiff and defendant to cross-complaint with full knowledge of all the facts alleged in her complaint and in her answer to defendant's cross-complaint, and are still retained by said plaintiff and cross-defendant; that said plaintiff and cross-defendant, by so accepting, receiving, and retaining said payments, and also the payments theretofore made on said agreement, is estopped from denying the validity of said agreement."

Thereafter, on the 19th day of May, 1924, the appellant in open court attempted to introduce letters and checks in support of the allegations of his supplemental cross-complaint. On the objection of the respondent, the proof was excluded. The appellant assigns that ruling as error. In support of the ruling the respondent cites and relies on the case entitled Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irrigation District, 173 Cal. 668, 161 P. 116. Turning to page 673 (161 P. 119), respondent quotes as follows:

> "Furthermore, since a supplemental pleading is proper only in aid of the case made by the original complaint, relief cannot be granted upon a supplemental complaint, where the proof shows that the plaintiff had no cause of action when his original complaint was filed. 'If a party has no cause of action at the time of the institution of his action he cannot maintain it by filing a supplemental complaint found on matters which have subsequently occurred.'"

Thereupon respondent argues that for the same reason the appellant had no cause of defense, based on the alleged estoppel, when he filed his cross-complaint, and that he could not better his condition by waiting until after the cause had been tried and submitted, and then file a supplemental cross-complaint. We do not think it is necessary to pass on the point. Conceding, without deciding that an estoppel was pleaded, we are of the opinion that the proof offered in support did not in law support the pleading. The payment evidenced by a check dated February 1, 1924, was forwarded to respondent's attorney by appellant's attorney, together with a letter as follows:

> "Find inclosed herewith Mr. Lane's check in favor of your client, Mrs. Lane, $200. The order made in reference to alimony contains a provision that these payments of $200 were to be made up to only the time of the trial, so that Mr. Lane does not consider that he is under any legal obligation to pay Mrs. Lane at this time anything on account of alimony. However, we desire it distinctly understood that, in the event the property agreement is approved by Judge Burks, this $200 will apply as a payment on said agreement, and it is on this condition that we are making you this payment."

The conditions stated never arose. On March 19, 1924, Mr. Lane drew a check in favor of Mrs. Lane for $100. His attorney sent it to her attorney, with a letter as follows:

> "I have just received from Mr. Lane a check in favor of Ona E. Lane for $100 on account. I also inclose you herewith a copy of the letter he sent us."

In the Lane letter, a copy of which is referred to, the appellant states:

> "I am very much surprised to learn from you that, through her attorney, Mrs. Lane is asking for more money from me at this time, as heretofore I have advanced her some $300 more than is as yet due under our agreement of January 6, 1922. * * * However, I am inclosing herein check to Mrs. Lane for $100, and trust that on the 1st of next month I will be in a position to pay the balance then due her under our said agreement. * * *"

On April 1, 1924, appellant sent his check to his attorneys in a letter, and they in turn sent a check, with a copy of the letter, to respondent's attorney. That letter was:

> "Inclosed please find check to Mrs. Ona E. Lane for $100, being balance of the $5,000 which I agreed to pay her under our agreement of January 6, 1922."

If the evidence which was rejected had been received, such evidence would not, under the facts recited above, have constituted an estoppel against the cause of action which the wife had pleaded on August 22, 1923.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for hearing herein is denied. In denying said petition, we withhold our approval from that portion of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal wherein it is held that the agreement in question was void, as contra bonos mores, upon the authority of Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 P. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107. As to that question we express no opinion.

NASH v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 5295.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟹220(8)—Party seeking to recover salary must allege method of appointment prescribed in charter was followed, and cannot recover on quantum meruit.

Where city charter prescribes civil service system for appointments and assignments, party seeking to recover salary for position within civil service must allege that prescribed method was followed, and, where prescribed method was not followed, no action on quantum meruit will lie, notwithstanding he performed services of such position.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹220(1)—Right to salary of municipal position is attached to legal title to position and not to its occupation and exercise.

Right to receive salary annexed to position under municipal government is an incident which attaches itself to the legal title to the office and not to its occupation and exercise.

3. Municipal corporations ⟹249.

Where charter prescribed manner of making contracts involving expenditure of $500 or more, there could be no recovery against city on theory of implied contract, where contract was not made in prescribed manner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action for personal services by C. E. Nash against the City of Los Angeles and Charles H. Treat and others, as and comprising the Board of Public Works of said City. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Fuller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Lucius P. Green, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. This is an action against the city of Los Angeles and the members of its board of public works, to recover the sum of $7,781.34 upon three rejected claims for personal services alleged to have been performed by plaintiff for the city. A demurrer to the complaint, and to each of the five counts set forth therein, upon the ground of insufficiency of facts, was sustained, with leave to amend, and, plaintiff having declined to amend, judgment of dismissal was entered. Plaintiff appeals.

In the first two counts it is alleged that between October 1, 1918, and December 1, 1922, plaintiff performed the duties and rendered the services of "senior cost accountant" of said city, for which he was entitled to compensation in the sum of $9,716.80; the only difference between the causes of action stated in these counts being that, in the first one, the claim for compensation is based upon a classification of employment established by municipal ordinances enacted pursuant to authority granted by the civil service provisions of the city charter, standardizing the salaries of the city employees, and in the second count the claim for such compensation is based upon a quantum meruit. In the third and fourth counts it is alleged that during the same period of time specified in the first two counts plaintiff performed duties and rendered services of "chief cost accountant," which entitled him to compensation in the sum of $11,040; the same distinction existing between the causes of action set forth in these latter counts as exists between the first and second counts. It further appears, however, from each of the four counts mentioned, that, during the particular period of time plaintiff claims to have rendered services as senior cost accountant and chief cost accountant, to wit, between October 1, 1918, and December 1, 1922, he was, and for several years prior thereto had been, employed in the engineering department of the board of public works of said city, for which employment he was regularly paid a salary aggregating $7,870. By the present action, therefore, so far as the first four counts are concerned, plaintiff seeks to recover only the difference between the sum already received by him and the greater sums claimed to be due under the higher classification of employment. It is further alleged that the claims sued upon were duly presented for payment to said board of public works, and were by said board rejected.

The charter of the city of Los Angeles prescribes a system of civil service for the employment and promotion of the greater number of the city employees, the provisions of which expressly include those employed in the engineering department. Article 23, Los Angeles Charter. Provision is made therein for promotional examinations and the creation of certified lists of those passing such examinations and the rating to be given to the same, from which lists selection must be made for appointment to positions which are from time to time created. Sections 229 to 254, inclusive, Charter of Los Angeles. In this regard section 237 declares in part as follows:

> "The commission shall by its rules provide for the promotion in such classified civil service on the basis of ascertained merit and seniority in service and examination, and shall provide in all cases where it is practicable that vacancies shall be filled by promotion. All examinations for promotion shall be competitive among such members of the next lower rank as desire to submit themselves to such examination; and it shall be the duty of the commission to submit to the appointing power the names of not more than three applicants for each promotion having the highest rating. * * *"

Said charter also provides that:

> "The auditor shall not, nor shall any auditing or accounting officer of the city, approve any demand for the salary or wages of any person subject to the provisions of this article, for services as an officer or employee of such city, before the appointment of such person to the classified civil service has been certified. * * *" Section 252, Charter of the City of Los Angeles.

The complaint nowhere alleges, nor does plaintiff claim, that he was appointed, certified, or promoted, in the manner prescribed by the civil service provisions of the charter, to the positions to which are annexed the salaries he is seeking to recover; it being alleged in this respect merely that said services were rendered with the "full knowledge, acquiescence, and consent" of said city and "at the request of" said city and of the officers in charge of said department. Defendants therefore claim that, because of the absence of such allegations, the first four counts of the complaint are fatally defective. Answering this proposition, plaintiff contends that, regardless of provisions of the law of the municipality prescribing the method of appointment and promotion, "if plaintiff performed services * * * for which the compensation is greater than paid plaintiff, defendant (the city of Los Angeles) is bound in law as well as in conscience and good morals to pay plaintiff the reasonable value and worth of that service to defendant. * * *" In furtherance of this theory, plaintiff asserts that the law of implied contracts as it relates to private corporations applies with equal force to municipal corporations, citing in support thereof the cases of Argenti v. City of San Francisco, 16 Cal. 256, San Francisco Gas Co. v. City of San Francisco, 9 Cal. 453, and Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670.

[1, 2] This same theory was advanced and adversely ruled upon in the cases of Shaw v. City and County of San Francisco, 13 Cal. App. 547, 110 P. 149, and Burke v. Edgar, 67 Cal. 182, 7 P. 488, and we are of the opinion that the doctrine of those cases is controlling here. The substance of that doctrine is that, where the charter or the statute prescribes the method by which appointments or assignments to particular positions provided for under municipal government shall be made, it is an essential condition to a recovery of the salary annexed to such positions that the prescribed method of appointment or assignment be followed; and, where it is not followed, no action on quantum meruit will lie against the municipality upon the theory that the party seeking to recover said salary acted in the capacity and performed the services of such position. See, also, Murtagh v. City of New York, 106 App. Div. 98, 94 N. Y. S. 308; Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) vol. 1, p. 426, citing cases. The rule is grounded mainly upon the proposition that the right to receive the salary is an incident which attaches itself to the legal title to the office and not to its occupation and exercise. People ex rel. Dorsey v. Smith, 28 Cal. 21; Ward v. Marshall, 96 Cal. 155, 30 P. 1113, 31 Am. St. Rep. 198. In Shaw v. City & County of San Francisco, supra, it was said that to permit a liability to be imposed upon a municipality to pay for services rendered under appointments made contrary to the explicit provisions of the law "would be to fritter away the entire scheme for civil service appointments contained in the charter"; and it was further stated that those seeking to recover the salaries "were bound to see that their appointments were made according to the requirements of the charter. If they neglected this, or chose to take the hazard of accepting a void appointment, they were mere volunteers, and suffer only what they should have anticipated." The case of Argenti v. City of San Francisco, supra, upon which plaintiff strongly relies, is referred to in the Shaw Case, and, for the reasons therein stated, cannot be considered as an authority here. In the instant case the fact that the positions plaintiff claims to have occupied were created by ordinance enacted pursuant to civil service provisions of the charter rather than by the charter itself does not affect the situation, for, as already pointed out, the positions in question were promotional ones, which could be filled only in the manner prescribed by the charter, and this was not done. We conclude, therefore, as defendants contend, that, in the absence of allegations of an appointment or promotion of plaintiff, in conformity with the charter provisions, to the two positions mentioned in the first four counts of the complaint, each of said counts failed to state a cause of action, and consequently the demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

[3] The fifth count declares upon an implied contract for the payment to plaintiff of the sum of $2,764.54, claimed to be the balance due for services rendered by him as civil engineer in making for the city, during the period of time he was employed in other capacities in the engineering department, an appraisal of a reduction plant. Section 207 of the charter provides, in substance, that every contract involving an expenditure of more than $500 shall be made only after certain preliminary proceedings which are specified in said section have been followed. There is no allegation in the complaint of a compliance with these requirements of the charter, nor does plaintiff make any pretense that an attempt was made to comply with them, his claim for compensation being based entirely upon the theory of an implied contract. The case of Gamewell Fire Alarm Tel. Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 45 Cal. App. 149, 187 P. 163, is decisive of this point, it being expressly held that, unless the charter provisions above mentioned, regarding the making of contracts, be observed, the city is not liable, and recovery cannot be had on a quantum meruit. The case of Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., supra, upon which plaintiff places much reliance, is not in point, as is clearly demonstrated by the decision in the case of Reams v. Cooley, 171 Cal. 150, 152 P. 293, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1260, wherein the court said, in discussing the inapplication of the rule of quantum meruit against municipalities:

"This rule of implied liability is applied only in those cases where the board or municipality is given the general power to contract with reference to a subject-matter and the express contract which it has assumed to enter into in pursuance of this general power is rendered invalid for some mere irregularity or some invalidity in the execution thereof, where the form or manner of entering into a contract is not violative of any statutory restriction upon the general power of the governing body to contract nor violative of public policy. In the absence of such restriction on the mode or manner of contracting, the same general rule applies to such inferior political bodies as to individuals, and the former will be held responsible on an implied contract for the payment of benefits it receives under an illegal express contract not prohibited by law. This is the effect of the cases cited by appellant and relied on by him, notably Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 P. 824, 50 P. 670, Sacramento v. Southern Pacific Co., 127 Cal. 217, 59 P. 568, 825, and Contra Costa Water Co. v. Breed, 139 Cal. 432, 73 P. 189. But, while the doctrine of implied liability applies where general power to contract on a subject exists and the form or manner of doing so is not expressly provided by charter or statute, the decided weight of authority is to the effect that, when by statute the power of the board or municipality to make a contract is limited to a certain prescribed method of doing so, and any other method of doing it is expressly or impliedly prohibited, no implied liability can arise for benefits received under a contract made in violation of the particularly prescribed statutory mode. * * * Where the statute prescribes the only mode by which the power to contract shall be exercised, the mode is the measure of the power. A contract made otherwise than as so prescribed is not binding or obligatory as a contract and the doctrine of implied liability has no application in such cases"—citing the case of Zottman v. San Francisco, 20 Cal. 97, 81 Am. Dec. 96, and many others.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, we are of the opinion that the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LUCAS. (Cr. 916.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 17, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 16, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑177—Overruling demurrer to first indictment prior to mistrial thereon, and thereafter sustaining demurrer and resubmitting case to grand jury, held not to bar another prosecution for same offense (Pen. Code, § 1008).

Court's action in overruling defendant's demurrer to first indictment prior to mistrial thereon, and after second indictment was filed in changing ruling and sustaining demurrer to first and second indictment, and ordering case to be resubmitted to grand jury, being in accordance with Pen. Code, § 1008, held not a bar to another prosecution for same offense.

Defendant is not in jeopardy, unless indictment or information is sufficient to sustain a conviction.

3. Criminal law 🔑1137(2)—Defendant, whose demurrer to first indictment was finally sustained, cannot contend that such indictment was sufficient, contrary to ruling he procured below, thereby placing him in jeopardy by mistrial thereunder.

Defendant, whose demurrer to first indictment was finally sustained by court, cannot, contrary to ruling which he procured below, be heard to contend that such indictment was sufficient, and that therefore he was placed in jeopardy by mistrial thereunder; it being immaterial that, when court changed its ruling, defendant objected on ground that court had no jurisdiction to make any order concerning original indictment, where he made no attempt to withdraw demurrer or to have it stricken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

B. F. Lucas was convicted of making false entries in the books of a state bank, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. June 23, 1925, the defendant was indicted for the crime of making false entries in the books of a state bank. His demurrer to the indictment was overruled, and his motion to dismiss it was denied. He was duly placed on trial, but the jury impaneled in the case was discharged, because of inability to agree upon a verdict. October 30, 1925, a second indictment was presented and filed, charging the defendant with the same acts alleged in the first indictment and, in addition thereto, four acts of embezzlement. This was a new indictment, and did not purport to be an amendment of the first. The defendant made a motion to dismiss the indictment, and demurred thereto. Upon the submission of the motion and the demurrer, the court made the following order:

> "The motion to dismiss indictment is sustained, and the demurrer is sustained; the district attorney to go before the grand jury and amend the former indictment and bring in a second indictment as to the charges of embezzlement. * * * The court now orders that the order heretofore made, overruling the demurrer to the original indictment, be set aside; the demurrer to the original indictment is now sustained, and the original indictment, together with the second indictment, is now resubmitted to the grand jury. The court orders that the whole matter of the two indictments be referred to the grand jury for consideration."

Two indictments, purporting to be amended indictments, were thereafter presented by the grand jury and filed. One charged the making of the same false entries, and the other charged the embezzlements set forth in the second indictment. The defendant pleaded that he had been once placed in jeopardy on the charge of making the false entries. At the trial the court instructed the jury to find against the defendant on that plea. He was convicted of the crime of making the alleged false entries, and this appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

Counsel for appellant says in his brief:

> "The defendant relies for a reversal of the judgment upon the sole proposition that the court erred in instructing the jury to return a verdict for the people on the pleas of once in jeopardy."

He contends that the first indictment was not defective in the respects set out in his motion to dismiss and his demurrer thereto. He conceded at the oral argument that, if the second trial had been had upon the first indictment, the plea of once in jeopardy would not have been available to defendant, and there are many decisions in this state to that effect. Why a different rule should prevail in a case such as this does not appear.

> "A nolle prosequi entered after a disagreement and discharge of the jury will not bar another prosecution for the same offense." 16 C. J. 249.
> "A defendant is placed in apparent jeopardy when he is placed on trial before a competent court and a jury impaneled and sworn. His jeopardy is real, unless it shall subsequently appear that a verdict could never have been rendered by reason of the death or illness of the judge or a juryman, or that after due deliberation the jury could not agree, or by reason of some other like overruling necessity which compels their discharge without the consent of the defendant." People v. Hunckeler, 48 Cal. 331, 334.

See, also, In re Harron, 191 Cal. 457, 466, 217 P. 728; People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 26, 50 P. 15.

In People v. Kerrick, 144 Cal. 46, 48, 77 P. 711, 712, after a disagreement and the discharge of the jury, the action was dismissed, on motion of the district attorney, on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to convict. Thereafter another information was filed, and the defendant entered a plea thereto of once in jeopardy. It was held on appeal that the second information charged a different offense from that alleged in the first. The court said, however:

> "Another reason * * * is found in the fact that each of the prosecutions was for a felony, and a judgment of dismissal on motion of the district attorney does not bar a second prosecution in case of a felony—even assuming that there was but one offense, or that the one offense was included in the other."

In People v. Disperati, 11 Cal. App. 469, 475, 105 P. 617, 619, after a disagreement and discharge of the jury, the information was dismissed on motion of the district attorney, and another complaint was filed, charging the defendant with the same offense. He was held to answer, and another information was filed, to which he entered a plea of once in jeopardy. The court said:

> "If there had been a conviction of the defendant upon the first information, it would indeed have been a bar to another prosecution, unless it had been set aside at his instance; but the case is entirely different where the jury disagree and are discharged by the court. Then the status is the same as though there had been no trial at all."

> "If a demurrer [to the indictment] is sustained and an amendment is not allowed, or if allowed, is not made, within such reasonable time as the court may fix, the court shall give a judgment of dismissal, which shall be a bar to another prosecution for the same offense. The defendant shall thereupon be discharged, unless the court directs the case to be submitted to the same or another grand jury."

As stated, the court overruled the defendant's demurrer to the first indictment prior to the mistrial thereon. Thereafter, and after the second indictment was filed, the court changed the ruling, and sustained the demurrer to the first indictment, as well as that to the second, and ordered the case to be resubmitted to the grand jury. This action of the court was in accordance with the provisions of section 1008, and is not, under the terms of that section, a bar to another prosecution for the same offense.

[2, 3] A defendant cannot be said to have been in jeopardy, unless the indictment or information is sufficient to sustain a conviction. The defendant demurred to the first indictment, and the court finally sustained the demurrer. He cannot, therefore, be heard to contend, contrary to the ruling which he procured, that such indictment was sufficient and that therefore he was placed in jeopardy by the mistrial thereunder. 7 Cal. Jur. 947; People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 220, 76 P. 1028; People v. Terrill, 133 Cal. 120, 128, 65 P. 303. It is true that, at the time the court changed the ruling upon the demurrer to the first indictment, the defendant objected "to this at this time, on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction to make any order concerning the original indictment at this time"; but he made no attempt to withdraw the demurrer, or to have it stricken from the files.

> "It is a common occurrence for a trial court to change its rulings upon questions of law during the progress of a trial, and a ruling on demurrer occupies no better position in this regard than any other ruling from which an appeal cannot be taken." 21 Cal. Jur. 124; De La Beckwith v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 496, 80 P. 717.

In any view of the case, the instruction of which complaint is made was properly given.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. AVILA. (Cr. 908.)

1. Criminal law 🔑829(9, 18)—Refusal of instructions on reasonable doubt and presumption of innocence, covered by court's given instructions, held not error.

Refusal of instructions that, if any juror entertained a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, it was his duty not to vote for a verdict of guilty, and relating to presumption of innocence attending defendant in a criminal prosecution, held not erroneous, where same subject-matter was covered by court's given instructions.

2. Criminal law 🔑369(6)—Admitting evidence of finding of liquor on defendant's premises prior to commission of offense charged in information held error.

In prosecution for possession of intoxicating liquor, admitting evidence of finding of liquor on defendant's premises prior to commission of offense charged in information, and which liquor was not shown to have been lawfully or unlawfully possessed, held error.

3. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Error in admitting evidence of finding intoxicating liquor on defendant's premises prior to commission of offense charged in information held not prejudicial, in view of defendant's admission (Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 33 [U. S. Comp. St. Ann. § 10138½t]; Const. Cal. art. 6, § 4½).

In prosecution for possession of intoxicating liquor under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 33 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. § 10138½t), error in admitting testimony of finding of liquor on defendant's premises prior to commission of offense charged in information held not prejudicial, within Const. Cal. art. 6, § 4½, where defendant admitted possession of such liquor and its intoxicating character prior to admission of objectionable testimony.

4. Criminal law 🔑742(1).

Credibility of witnesses is for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Joe Avila was convicted of the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

V. F. Gant, of Modesto, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of unlawfully having in his possession intoxicating liquor, and sentenced to pay a fine of $600; this being a second offense. The information charges the commission of the offense on or about the 23d day of May, 1925. The information also contained a second count, charging the offense of maintaining a nuisance. This count, however, was dismissed. Upon this appeal the appellant urges two specific errors as grounds for reversal: (1) That the court erred in refusing certain instructions requested by the defendant; (2) that the court erred in admitting evidence of a prior search of the premises occupied by the defendant. The evidence in the case tended to show that the place of the commission of the offense was occupied by the defendant as his private dwelling. The intoxicating liquor, for the possession of which the defendant was prosecuted, was found in the bathroom of the premises occupied by the defendant, contained in a jug wrapped with a newspaper, and concealed behind the bathtub in the bathroom. The instructions requested by the defendant and not given by the court are as follows:

> "If, after a consideration of the whole case, any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, it is the duty of the juror so entertaining such doubt not to vote for a verdict of 'guilty,' nor to be influenced in so voting, for the single reason that a majority of the jury should be in favor of a verdict of 'guilty.'"

"In this case, as in every criminal case, the guilt of the defendant must be established to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, before he can be convicted, and the burden of proof rests upon the people to prove the defendant guilty, as charged in the information, to a moral certainty, and beyond a reasonable doubt, and, unless the people so prove every material allegation in the information, you must find the defendant not guilty. Each defendant is by law presumed to be innocent of the crime charged, and this presumption remains with every defendant throughout the trial, and during your deliberation on your verdict it is your duty, if it can consistently be done, to reconcile all the evidence in this case upon the theory that the defendant is innocent, and so long as any one of you have from the evidence in the case a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, such defendant cannot be convicted. If any one of you, after a full consideration of all the evidence in this case, has a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, said defendant cannot be convicted."

"You are further instructed that, if you find that the prosecution in this case has failed to establish any one single material element of the offense charged, then under such finding you shall render a verdict of not guilty and acquit the defendant."

[1] The reasons assigned for the refusal to give the foregoing instructions are that the substance thereof was included in other instructions given by the court to the jury. An examination of the record shows that the jury in this case was very fully instructed as to the law applicable thereto. The jury was advised in a number of instructions that the defendant could not be convicted, unless the jury was satisfied from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, that the burden of proof rested upon the prosecution to so satisfy the jury concerning every element necessary to constitute the offense, and that the concurrence of 12 jurors was necessary before a verdict could be rendered. While it has been held several times that an instruction framed along the line of the first one set forth herein is proper to be given to the jury, from the fact that the jury in this case was instructed so many times that conviction could be had only when the jury was satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from the testimony as to the defendant's guilt, we think that no substantial injury resulted to the appellant from the failure of the court to give the instruction in the language requested by the appellant. The jury was also very carefully instructed that the defendant could not be convicted upon proof of the mere fact of the possession of intoxicating liquor; that the testimony must go further, and show that the possession was unlawful. Without setting forth the instructions in detail, it is sufficient to say that in this case the instruction given by the court to the jury included all the salient features of the refused instructions, and were prepared with as much care and set forth the law applicable to the case as fully and completely as ordinary characterize cases of much graver import.

[2] Upon the trial of the case the court permitted the prosecution to prove over the objection of the defendant that on or about the 12th day of January, 1925, an officer searched the premises occupied by the defendant and found therein intoxicating liquor. This ruling of the court is assigned as error. No evidence was introduced tending to show whether the liquor so found was either lawfully or unlawfully possessed. The mere fact of finding liquor only appears in the testimony. The trial court apparently took the view that, upon the trial of one charged with the unlawful possession of liquor, prior possession of liquor might be shown. In this ruling we think the court was in error. The unlawful possession of liquor does not involve a continuing offense, such as the maintaining of a nuisance. In prosecutions for the unlawful sale of liquor, it has been held by our courts that the testimony of prior and subsequent sales to the one upon which conviction is sought is not admissible. We see no difference in principle between the offense of unlawful sale and unlawful possession. Neither involves the idea of continuity. The very moment one acquires unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, that moment he is subject to prosecution. The very moment one unlawfully sells intoxicating liquor, for that offense he is immediately subject to prosecution. They are offenses complete in themselves. We think this case is governed by the principle of law set forth in 8 Cal. Jur. p. 59, § 167, where it is said:

> "The universally recognized rule is that a defendant in a criminal cause can be tried for no other offense than that charged in the indictment or information. It is not competent for the prosecution to prove the commission of independent crimes by the defendant, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the particular crime charged. Such evidence is inadmissible, either to show a disposition on the part of the defendant to commit such offenses as he is charged with, or as corroborative of the testimony directed to the proof of the specific offense for which he is on trial."

This rule is clearly set forth in the case of People v. Smith, 64 Cal. App. 344, 221 P. 405, where the offense charged was that of selling intoxicating liquor. See, also, People v. Morales, 45 Cal. App. 553, 188 P. 58, People v. Amort, 60 Cal. App. 29, 212 P. 50, People v. Pagni, 67 Cal. App. 303, 227 P. 972, and People v. Mori, 67 Cal. App. 442, 227 P. 629.

[3] Our view, however, that such testimony is not admissible, is not determinative of this case. As we have said, the testimony erroneously admitted by the court simply was to the effect that intoxicating liquor was found in the dwelling house occupied by the defendant. There was no attempt made to show the character of possession. Upon the trial of this case the defendant admitted the possession of the liquor in question, and the intoxicating character, prior to the giving of the objectionable testimony herein referred to. The only question presented to the jury for determination was whether the defendant had unlawful possession of the intoxicating liquor under the provisions of section 33 of title 2 of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. § 10138½t), which reads:

> "But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling, while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only, and such liquor need not be reported, provided such liquors are for use only for the personal consumption of the owner thereof, and his family residing in such dwelling, and of his bona fide guests when entertained by him therein; and the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor in any action concerning the same to prove that such liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed, and used."

This section must be read in connection with all the other sections of the act, and especially in connection with section 3 thereof, making it unlawful to manufacture, barter, sell, or possess intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes after the date therein mentioned. While this point has not been expressly decided in this state, the matter has been passed upon in a civil case by the Supreme Court of the United States, wherein it is held that the only instances where intoxicating liquors can be lawfully possessed for beverage purposes is where the intoxicating liquors were obtained prior to the date mentioned in section 3 of title 2 of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. § 10138½aa). Cunard Steamship Co. v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 100, 43 S. Ct. 504, 67 L. Ed. 894, 27 A. L. R. 1306.

We think that section 33 of title 2 of the Volstead Act, relative to the possession of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, which may be lawful, refers to and must be held to refer to intoxicating liquors procured prior to the date mentioned in section 3. We find no provision of the Volstead Act making lawful the possession of intoxicating beverages commonly known as and called "bootleg whisky" and "jackass brandy." If this interpretation of the Volstead Act is correct, then by the admission of the defendant of the possession for beverage purposes of the intoxicating liquor found in his residence, and also the intoxicating character thereof, as admitted by his counsel in open court, the case for the prosecution was practically established. The trial court, however, went into the question of unlawful possession, and admitted testimony tending to show acts and conduct from which the jury might infer unlawful possession, and, as the case was tried, there was presented to the jury the sole question of unlawful possession. The sole question for the jury was thus narrowed to the issue of the character of the possession, and the court very carefully, pointedly, and particularly directed the attention of the jury to this one fact, and that it was incumbent upon the people to prove the unlawful possession and not upon the defendant.

We are thus brought to a consideration of the proof. The testimony in this case shows that two witnesses, residing 27 feet from the building occupied by the defendant, which building appears to have been occupied by the defendant alone, testified at great length to the occurrences taking place at the premises occupied by the defendant, the coming and going of people at unusual hours, the fact that they came there apparently sober and went away apparently intoxicated, that intoxicated people were frequently seen with the defendant at his place of residence, and covering such a period of time and showing such circumstances that the jury could not very well avoid coming to the conclusion which it reached in this case. The people who came and went to defendant's premises included both men and women. The testimony of the prosecution is, when examined, practically uncontradicted. The defendant himself admitted possession of the intoxicating liquor, and simply stated that he did not sell or give it away. The defendant also introduced one witness who stated that the rear of the house occupied by the witness was about 150 feet from the rear of the house occupied by the defendant; that there was a garage and two-story tank house and a barn between his dwelling house and the building occupied by the defendant; that he had not seen anything or heard anything indicating the improper use of liquor upon the defendant's premises; and that he did not know whether he would have heard such occurrences or not. There was testimony also introduced by the defendant that his employer never knew of his being intoxicated.

[4] The appellant argues that the testimony of the witness for the prosecution was exaggerated. This was a question wholly for the jury to determine. The testimony of the defendant's witness that he heard nothing and saw nothing, and was really situated and living where he would probably see nothing and hear nothing, does not rise to the dignity of contradictory evidence. Under these circumstances, we think that the error of the court in admitting testimony simply of prior possession comes within the rule announced in section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution, and that the defendant suffered no prejudice through the admission of such testimony.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

1. Conspiracy 🔑47—Evidence received against one defendant only held insufficient to prove commission of alleged overt act by codefendants.

Evidence received against one defendant alone, as to purchase of weapon, held insufficient to prove that his codefendants, in trial for conspiracy to kidnap, committed alleged overt act of causing former to purchase revolver.

2. Conspiracy 🔑43(5).

In alleging overt act, it is sufficient to charge that it was performed in furtherance or pursuance of conspiracy.

3. Criminal law 🔑1032(7)—Proof of different intent than alleged in indictment for conspiracy presents no more than variance, unavailable on appeal without objection to evidence or presentation of question to trial court.

As defendants in conspiracy trial could not have been prejudiced by failure to prove alleged specific intent in committing overt act charged, proof of different intent presented no more than variance, not available on appeal, in absence of objection to evidence on such ground, or presentation of question to trial court.

4. Conspiracy 🔑27.

Defendants' stationing of themselves before prosecuting witness' studio, pursuant to conspiracy to kidnap her, held an overt act.

5. Conspiracy 🔑45—Evidence of proposals and consideration of plans to kidnap held admissible, though remote in time and effect.

In trial for conspiracy to kidnap, testimony as to proposals and consideration of plans to kidnap several persons, including prosecuting witness, during period of over two years before culmination of plot charged, held admissible, though remote in time and effect.

6. Criminal law 🔑1043(1).

Whether evidence, objected to as not admissible at all, was receivable against one defendant, cannot be considered on appeal.

7. Conspiracy 🔑45—That evidence of formation of conspiracy begins at time long before wrongful meeting of minds is no objection.

That evidence, showing gradual formation of criminal concord in conspirators' minds, begins at time long before wrongful meeting of minds, is no objection thereto.

8. Conspiracy 🔑45.

Criminal conspiracies being generally proved by circumstantial and piecemeal evidence, great latitude must be given state in producing its evidence.

9. Criminal law 🔑530.

Defendants' signed confession held admissible as against objection that it could be used at most to refresh witness' recollection.

10. Criminal law 🔑768(1)—Instruction that laws may as well be stricken from statute books unless jury did duty held not error as telling them it was their duty to convict.

Instruction that jury must consider people's rights to have laws properly executed, and that, "unless you do your duty, laws may as well be stricken from the statute books," held not error as telling them it was their duty to convict, especially in view of succeeding instruction to be just to accused as well as people.

11. Criminal law 🔑823(2)—Instruction that sufficiency for jury of evidence of corpus delicti is for court held not error, in view of other instructions as to jury's duty.

Instruction that it is for court to say whether there is sufficient evidence of corpus delicti to go to jury held not error as confusing and invading jury's province, in view of other instructions as to their functions and duty.

12. Criminal law 🔑823(4).

Instruction in conspiracy case, that overt act is outward act done in pursuance and manifestation of intent or design, held not error, though not requiring finding that act was done to effect object of conspiracy, in view of other instructions.

13. Criminal law 🔑1172(1)—Correct instruction, giving authority, however weighty, for definition of term, is not prejudicial error.

Giving authority, however weighty, for correct definition of term, is not prejudicial error as giving "false and misleading weight" to instruction.

List of authorities supporting proposed instructions should not be given jury, if result would be merely loss of time.

15. Criminal law 🔑1137(3)—Defendants, proposing instructions with authorities appended, cannot object to reading of name of authority for instruction given.

Defendants, proposing instructions with authorities appended, cannot object to reading of name of dictionary to jury as authority for definition of term in instruction given.

16. Criminal law 🔑1130(5).

Error in instruction, merely quoted with statement that it was erroneous, without argument or citation of authority, cannot be decided.

WORKS, J. Defendants were charged with a conspiracy to kidnap Mary Fairbanks, known also as Mary Pickford. Defendant Wood was acquitted. Defendants Stevens and Holcomb were convicted. The convicted defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order of the trial court denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] After charging the formation of the conspiracy, the indictment set forth the following allegation, as an averment of one of the overt acts relied upon for a conviction: That, "in pursuance of such conspiracy, the defendants did, on or about the 5th day of May, 1925, cause the said Adrian J. Wood to purchase a revolver to be used for the purpose of intimidating the said Mary Fairbanks, also known as Mary Pickford, and compelling her to submit to such taking and restraint." It is contended by appellants that the evidence was insufficient to prove against them the commission of the overt act thus alleged. The Attorney General concedes that this point is well taken, and, after an examination of the record, we are satisfied that the concession is properly made. There are several reasons which justify this action of the Attorney General, but one only of them need be stated: All evidence concerning the purchase of the weapon mentioned in the indictment was received for some reason against defendant Wood alone; in other words, that evidence, by the ruling of the trial court, was expressly excluded as to appellants.

[2, 3] The only other overt act charged in the indictment was thus set forth: That, "in pursuance of such conspiracy * * * the said defendants did, on the 30th day of May, 1925, cause said Charles Z. Stevens and Claude Arthur Holcomb to station themselves in an automobile in front of the Mary Pickford Studio, * * * with intent then and there to seize, capture, and restrain the said Mary Fairbanks, also known as Mary Pickford, and thereafter keep her under restraint until" a ransom for her release was paid. It is undoubtedly the law that, in alleging an overt act in conspiracy cases, it is sufficient to charge that the act relied upon was performed in furtherance or in pursuance of the conspiracy. People v. George (Cal. App.) 241 P. 97; 12 C. J. 624. Here, however, the pleader who drew the indictment did more. He charged the specific intent with which the act was performed. It is admitted by the Attorney General—and a perusal of the record demonstrates that no other course could properly have been taken by him—that there is a lack of evidence to prove the specific intent alleged. The act was sufficiently proven, beyond a doubt, but the intent with which the act was performed was shown to have been entirely different from that which was charged. Upon this state of the record it is insisted by appellants that the evidence fails to support the charge as laid. It is said by them that, the prosecution having elected to color the charge that the overt act was done in pursuance of the conspiracy by the allegation that it was committed with a specified intent, the prosecution must have proven that intent, and could rely on no different intent. On the other hand, respondent contends that the allegation that the overt act was committed with a specific intent on the part of the conspirators may be disregarded as surplusage, and that the charge is satisfied by any proof that the act was performed in pursuance of the conspiracy. These contentions we shall proceed now to examine.

The question as to what allegations in an indictment or information may be regarded as surplusage has been before the courts of this state in several cases. In one of these, the defendant was charged with the crime of procuring and allowing a certain individual to be registered as a voter in the precinct register of a precinct in which he was not entitled to be registered. The defendant was a deputy registrar of voters, and it was alleged in the information that he committed the crime with which he was charged "as such deputy registrar of voters." Under a chain of circumstances which it is not necessary here to state, it became proper for the court to determine what was the effect of the allegation. It was said in the opinion that:

> "The charge in the information that, 'as deputy registrar,' defendant committed the offense is the merest surplusage. It was meaningless in averment and unnecessary in proof. The statute is not directed against official misconduct, nor limited in its application to public officers. 'Every person who willfully causes, procures, or allows' false registration is punishable under it. Every act embraced within its terms may be done by a private citizen as well as by a public officer, and the official character of the offender under this law is of no possible importance." People v. Sternberg, 111 Cal. 3, 43 P. 198.

It must be confessed that there is great doubt whether this adjudication gives us material aid in determining the question which is here presented for our consideration. The specific allegation in the information under scrutiny in the cited case, to the effect that the defendant committed the crime with which he was charged as a deputy registrar of voters, was swallowed up in the general allegation that he committed it, for the statute denouncing his crime was directed at all persons and not merely at public officials. The specific allegation therefore added nothing to the charge, nor did it explain or color it. Here, however, the specific allegation that appellants stationed themselves outside the Mary Pickford Studio, with intent then and there to kidnap her, is not included in the general allegation that they so stationed themselves in pursuance of the conspiracy. The specific allegation therefore in a sense makes addition to and colors the general allegation. We state these differences between People v. Sternberg and the present case for the purpose of indicating more clearly the point which is before us for determination. There are other decisions of our courts which come nearer to the question that confronts us. In one of them the defendant was charged with arson. It was averred in the information that the building which was alleged to have been burned was the property of a certain individual. There was no proof of the allegation of ownership, and it was contended, because of the omission, that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the conviction. The court said:

> "The rule, with reference to the proof required to support an information or indictment, is that every fact or circumstance necessary to constitute the crime charged is material, and must be alleged and proved. But the allegation of a fact or circumstance not legally essential to the charge is mere surplusage, and may be disregarded. There are allegations, however, not necessarily essential, and which may be dispensed with; but, when they are laid in the information or indictment, they become material, and must be proved in all cases when descriptive of the identity of that which is necessary to the charge. In the case before us, the name of the owner, although alleged, was immaterial, because it was not a necessary part of the description of the crime charged, therefore not necessary to be proved." People v. Handley, 100 Cal. 370, 34 P. 853.

In another case the defendant was charged with the larceny of a steer, and the information alleged that it was taken from the possession of a particular individual. The court said:

> "The allegation in the information that the animal was taken 'from the possession of one George L. Wallace' may be treated as surplusage. * * * The possession of the owner * * * was neither a necessary element of the offense nor any part of the description of the property alleged to have been taken. * * * Its presence in the information neither added to nor detracted from the force and effect of that pleading." People v. Hutchings, 8 Cal. App. 550, 97 P. 325.

A similar question has arisen in two burglary cases. In the first of these the court said:

> "There was a request for an instruction directing the jury to acquit on the ground of variance between allegation and proof, in this: The information charged a burglary in entering, etc., a building at St. Helena, in the county of Napa, while the proof was that the building is situated a mile and a half from St. Helena. It does not appear that a designation of the local vicinage of the building was at all important for its identification, and, unless necessary for that purpose, it was surplusage to allege or prove its situation further than that it was in the county of Napa." People v. Geiger, 116 Cal. 440, 48 P. 389.

In the second burglary case occurs language which seems at first glance to support the contention of appellants here:

> "It may be admitted that, where the prosecution does particularize by specific allegation the location of the place where a burglary has been committed, or as to the particular person owning the building, they cannot show that the ownership was otherwise than that alleged or the location different, without rendering their case open to the objection as made by appellant here of a variance between the allegations and proof." People v. Redman, 39 Cal. App. 566, 179 P. 725.

It seems, for several reasons, that the expressions in this latter case cannot influence our decision of the question here presented. In the first place, taking the entire context of the opinion, the language is plainly obiter. Then, too, it is possible that the court "admitted" the point only for the purpose of argument, and did not intend to express a decided view upon it. Further, the language quoted seems not to accord with the decision of the Supreme Court in People v. Geiger, supra, for there the court expressly decided that it was surplusage "to allege or prove" more than that the burglarized building was in the county of the jurisdiction, where the allegation was that it was in a certain town, and the proof showed that it was a mile and a half from the town.

From a review of all these authorities, it seems plain that the point now urged by appellant would be fruitless, if the prosecution had made no attempt whatever to prove any specific intent with which appellants stationed themselves outside the Mary Pickford Studio. This much seems to be settled by the rulings in People v. Handley, supra, and People v. Hutchings, supra. Under these decisions, and under the general principles upon which they are based, we can perceive no prejudice or injury to the rights of appellants which could have resulted from a mere failure to prove the specific intent with which it was alleged that two of the parties to the conspiracy had stationed themselves outside the studio. If the prosecution had deserted absolutely the allegation in making its proof, and had attempted to prove no other specific intent, we do not see how appellants could have been misled by the mere fact that a specific intent was alleged. But a specific intent, other than that alleged, was proved by the prosecution. One witness testified to an admission by appellant Holcomb that he "went out to the studio * * * to look for Mary Pickford." This statement was received as against Holcomb alone. Appellant Stevens made a statement to the police after his arrest, in the form of question and answer. It was afterward reduced to writing, and was signed by him. The following excerpts are made from the statement, which was received as to Stevens alone:

"Q. What did you go out there [to the studio] for? * * * A. Well, it was possibly to see if Mary Pickford came out out there.

"Q. I don't want any possibility about this, I want the truth. A. To see if she did come out. * * * It was to get information; further than that I can't say.

"Q. Get information for what? A. As to her movements.

"Q. What was the purpose of getting information as to her movements? You had planned to kidnap her, hadn't you? A. Why, if it was possible. * * *

"Q. What were you doing out there? A. Just as I stated there, I went out to look over the ground.

"Q. To see what possibilities were of kidnapping her? A. Yes. * * *"

In a similar statement made by appellant Holcomb, and received as against him alone, the following occurs:

"Q. And what were you doing out there [at the studio] at the time of your arrest? A. Well, we went out there to see if Mary Pickford would come out and go home."

The presence of this showing in the record would seem to offer a question different from those treated in People v. Handley, supra, and People v. Hutchings, supra. The point which appellants advance seems now to approach more nearly that decided in People v. Geiger, supra, but we need not pause to say whether the present question is ruled by that case or whether there is such a difference between the respective sets of circumstances in the two cases that the rule stated there is inapplicable here. We have already seen that the rights of appellants could not have suffered if the prosecution had made no proof whatever of a specific intent with which appellants stationed themselves before the studio, and had relied alone upon the proof of the conspiracy as a basis for an inference by the jury that the act of the conspirators in stationing themselves before the studio was one in furtherance of the conspiracy. That being so, no more than a question of variance was presented when the first item of proof was offered which tended to prove a specific intent different from that alleged in the indictment, if we grant for the sake of argument, without deciding, that such a question then arose. No objection was made to the specific items of evidence which we have quoted from the respective statements of appellants, nor does the record show that the question of variance was presented to the trial court at any time or in any way. This situation is exactly met by a case lately decided by this court. We said in the opinion then rendered:

"It is insisted that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that the charge was that the defendants attempted to rob T. Tschanz, while the evidence shows that the name of their victim was Simon Tschanz. This variance appears from the record, it is true, and, if we concede without deciding that it was a material variance, we at once observe that no objection was made at the trial to any of the evidence on the ground of variance, nor in fact was the point in any manner presented at the trial, or on motion for a new trial. It has been determined, under a statute to the effect that only questions presented at the trial can be reviewed on appeal, that the claim made in a criminal case that there was a variance between charge and proof cannot first be presented to the appellate court (State v. Padilla, 18 N. M. 573, 139 P. 143), and in this state it has been held many times that the point that there is a variance between pleading and proof in civil cases cannot first be made on appeal (Stockton C. H. & A. Works v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 53 P. 565; Robson v. O'Toole, 60 Cal. App. 710, 214 P. 278). In the opinions in the two cases cited, and in the many others referred to in them, the reason given for the rule in civil cases is that an amendment of pleadings may be allowed and justice thus be done if the point be made in the trial court. There appears to be an equally cogent reason for the application of the principle in criminal cases. If the question be raised in the trial court, the pending charges may be dismissed and a new indictment be found, or a new information be filed, thus aiding the administration of substantial justice and wiping out what are sometimes exceedingly technical defenses. It is to be remembered, too, that the general rule is that courts of review pass only upon questions presented at the trial. This rule has often been applied in criminal as well as in civil cases. People v. Taminago, 35 Cal. App. 238, 169 P. 696; People v. Walton, 53 Cal. App. 35, 199 P. 824. We therefore decide that the point that there was a variance between charge and proof was waived." People v. Gonzales, 69 Cal. App. 609, 231 P. 1014.

See, also, Swallow v. Francisco (Cal. App.) 239 P. 95.

We conclude that the point made by appellants, and arising from the allegation in the indictment that one of the overt acts charged was committed with a specific intent, is without merit.

[4] It is contended by appellants that their act in stationing themselves before the Mary Pickford Studio was not an overt act within the meaning of the statutes of this state upon the subject of criminal comspiracy. In disposing of this point, we deem it sufficient to refer to People v. George, supra. We think the act here shown was an overt act within the rules laid down in that case. This conclusion presupposes, of course, that the conspiracy here charged was formulated before appellants made their trip to the studio gates. Whether it had been formulated before that event is a point later to be considered.

[5] The prosecution proved by various witnesses that defendants, during a considerable period of time, had discussed plans for the kidnapping of several celebrities of the cinema world and several children of wealthy residents of Los Angeles. Some of these discussions occurred before Mary Pickford was mentioned as a possible victim of the rapacity of defendants. One of the witnesses who testified to these earlier occurrences was one Harney. His testimony, which was received over the objections of appellants, went back more than two years, the Pickford plot having finally culminated in May of 1925. He testified that in December, 1922, or in January, 1923, appellant Stevens "mentioned of taking a party and holding until he collected the ransom"; that the "party" then spoken of was Pola Negri; that conversations between him and Stevens on the same subject "went on for probably one year," and that at some time during the conversations Mary Pickford was mentioned as a possible victim of a kidnapping enterprise; that Stevens said that she could be picked up "either at her house, as she was coming home, or on the road" and that she could be held until her husband, Douglas Fairbanks, paid a ransom for her release; that in March or April, 1925, Stevens asked the witness if he remembered their earlier conversations about kidnapping; that Stevens then said that he had talked about the same thing with appellant Holcomb; that he and Holcomb had "planned out where they could get the party, the subject, and didn't name any names at all, just the subject"; that Stevens soon thereafter mentioned Jackie Coogan as a possible victim of a kidnapping plan, and said that he, Holcomb, and defendant Wood were considering such a plan; and that Stevens, in April, 1925, said he had given up the plan.

[6] It is now contended that the trial court erred in receiving the testimony of Harney, but the contention is most sparingly argued, and no authority is cited to support it. We shall, however, assume that the question is fully presented and argued, and shall therefore decide it. As a preliminary to a disposition of the point, it is to be observed that no contention is made that the evidence was improperly received as against Holcomb. The general question is presented only that it was not admissible at all. We do not decide, of course, that it was not receivable against Holcomb, but merely point out that such a question is not before us.

[7] A conspiracy may have a very small and a very remote beginning. Like a gigantic member of the forest, it may originate in a tiny tendril, which requires a long time and a persistent nurture to be developed into the matured monarch of the grove. It is for this reason that it is said in a standard publication that, in conspiracy cases—

> "it is no objection that the evidence covers a great many transactions and extends over a long period of time, that it may show another crime, that the acts, evidence to show which is offered, occurred some time before the alleged formation of the conspiracy, provided, however, that the facts shown have some bearing on and tendency to prove the ultimate fact at issue." 12 C. J. 635.

An examination of the record before us shows that the entire evidence in the cause, including the testimony of Harney, discloses a practically continuous chain of circumstances, commencing at least as early as the date of the events related by Harney, and ending with the arrest of appellants at the gate of the Mary Pickford Studio. This chain of circumstances showed the gradual unfolding of the plot to kidnap the individual for whom the studio was named. To employ again the simile of which we have already made use, it shows the gradual growth of the illicit enterprise from tendril to maturity.

[8] In our opinion there is no valid objection to evidence in conspiracy cases which tends to show, step by step, the gradual formation of a criminal concord in the minds of those charged with the illicit combination, merely because the evidence begins at a time long anterior to the wrongful meeting of minds. It is necessary only that the evidence, in all its parts, tends to prove the formation of the conspiracy. In a case in which, it is true, the only issue was as to the identity of one of the alleged parties to a conspiracy, the court said:

> "From the nature of the crime itself it is difficult to prove a criminal conspiracy by direct evidence, and such conspiracies are most always proven by circumstantial and 'piecemeal' evidence; and, in consideration of this fact, in such cases great latitude must of necessity be given the commonwealth in the production of its evidence." Jenkins v. Commonwealth, 167 Ky. 544, 180 S. W. 961, 3 A. L. R. 1522.

The opinion in this case, to our minds, correctly states a rule which fits the facts of the present controversy. In a civil action for damages wrought by a conspiracy, it is said, as to one of the defendants, that:

> "It was immaterial when his acts and declarations occurred, if they related to the transaction out of which his liability arose." Exchange Bank v. Moss, 149 F. 340, 79 C. C. A. 278.

One court has said, in another civil case, in quoting from an earlier opinion rendered in the same jurisdiction:

> "And in the admission of circumstantial evidence upon a charge of conspiracy, great latitude is allowed. The jury should have before them, and are entitled to consider, every fact which has a bearing on and a tendency to prove the ultimate fact in issue which would assist them in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion, and it is no objection that the evidence may tend to prove many different transactions extending over any particular period of time, provided that all the facts proven have some bearing on and a tendency to prove the ultimate fact in issue. The limits to which evidence of this kind may be admitted should be left to the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling should not be disturbed, when the evidence admitted tends, even remotely, to establish the ultimate fact of conspiracy." Democrat Printing Co. v. Johnson, 71 Okl. 128, 175 P. 737.

Practically the same rule is followed in the criminal cases of Jelke v. United States, 255 F. 264, 166 C. C. A. 434, and Welch v. Commonwealth, 189 Ky. 579, 225 S. W. 470.

The purpose of the evidence in conspiracy cases is to establish a mental state—an illicit concord of the minds of several persons. Such being the question involved, the unfoldment of the evidence is to be governed by the rules which prevail in those cases in which the endeavor is to ascertain the sanity or insanity of an individual. The mental state of an individual may change slowly. The joint state of mind of conspirators, finally merging into a criminal concord under the law of conspiracy, may develop gradually from a condition of innocence to one of the blackest guilt. Therefore, in addition to the cases above noted, we may justly rely, in support of our views, upon the well-known rule that, in order to determine sanity or insanity—the mental state of an individual—an investigation into the mental activities of the subject under inquiry may reach back over a long period of time. This rule is so well known that we do not pause to cite the cases which announce and support it. On the whole, we conclude that the evidence of Harney showed a proper part of the series of circumstances in which, by the verdict of the jury, appellants have become enmeshed. His testimony, although remote in time and perhaps also in effect, nevertheless tended to prove the formation of the conspiracy. It was admissible under the liberal rules touching upon the production of evidence in conspiracy cases.

[9] As we have already observed, the trial court received in evidence a signed confession of appellant Stevens in the form of question and answer. It is contended that the contents of this paper were erroneously received, but, in arguing the point, appellants merely say:

> "At the most, this memorandum could only have been used for the purpose of refreshing the recollection of a witness who might be interrogated concerning the subject of the conversation."

We can perceive no merit in this argument. By signing the papers, Stevens made it his as fully as if it were a letter which a typist had produced from his dictation and to which he had appended his signature.

[10] It is claimed that the trial court erred in giving the following instruction:

> "The importance of your duties requires that you consider the rights of the people of the state of California to have the laws properly executed, and that it is with you, citizens selected from the county, that finally rests the duty of determining the guilt or innocence of those accused of crime, and, unless you do your duty, laws may as well be stricken from the statute books."

It is said that by this instruction the jury was told that "laws should be stricken from the statute books if they do not convict," and that it was the duty of the jury to convict. This part of the instruction was not as carefully drawn as it might have been, but we think it contains language that saves it from the condemnation which is now sought to be placed upon it. The jury was told that the duty of its members was to see that the laws were properly executed. This language informed the jury, in effect, that it was to discharge its duties under the law as given in the entire instructions of the court. The jury was also told that it was its duty to determine the guilt or innocence of the defendants, and that, in effect, unless this duty was performed, laws might as well be stricken from the books. As thus viewed, we think the instruction was proper. It was not greatly different in legal effect from some parts of the instruction approved by us in People v. Selby (Cal. App.) 245 P. 792. It must also be observed that the court gave to the jury, in connection with and following the language upon which appellants base their claim of error, this further statement:

> "You should also ever keep in mind the importance to the accused of the result of your deliberations, and be just to him, as well as to the people of the state of California. Both the public and the defendant have a right to demand, and they do so demand and expect, that you will carefully and dispassionately weigh and consider the evidence and the law of the case, and give to each your conscientious judgment, and that you will reach a verdict that will be just to both sides, regardless of what the consequences may be."

This language, taken together with that to which appellants take exception, made the instruction eminently fair.

[11] Appellants also object to the following portion of an instruction which was given by the court:

> "Prima facie evidence of the corpus delicti is sufficient; and it is for the court to say whether there is sufficient evidence of the corpus delicti to go to the jury, precisely as in the case of any other material fact."

Appellants admit that it was the duty of the court to determine what evidence was admissible to establish the corpus delicti, but they say that:

> "It is the sole duty of the jury to determine the weight and the sufficiency of the evidence, and their instructions upon their duties should not have been confused by the court reading a lecture on what the powers of the court were."

We cannot perceive, in the language to which appellants take exception, the evil which they see in it. The jury was merely informed that it was a function of the court to determine what was sufficient evidence of the corpus delicti "to go to the jury." Other instructions which went to the trial body plainly informed its members what were their functions and duty in dealing with all evidence which the court, in the exercise of its functions, permitted them to hear. We can see no error in the giving of the instruction to which objection is now made.

[12] The record shows the following, among the instructions given by the trial court:

> "You are instructed that an overt act in law is some act actually done in execution of a criminal intent as distinguished from mere threats or words, or an outward act done in pursuance and manifestation of an intent or design; the mere design or intent not being punishable without such act. Webster's Unabridged Dictionary."

It is contended that the instruction was erroneous in that portion of it which follows the expression "mere threats or words," for the reason that "it does not follow from this definition that the act must be one which is done to effect the object of the conspiracy." If it be conceded, without deciding, that this objection is tenable as directed alone at the particular language of the instruction which is sought to be condemned, we must at once observe that the objection falls to the ground, in view of other instructions which were given. The jury was told, for instance, that, if it found beyond a reasonable doubt that the conspiracy was proven and that either of the overt acts alleged in the indictment was committed by the defendants "in pursuance of said conspiracy" or "in furtherance of said conspiracy," it was the duty of the jury to convict. On the whole, we think the objection which appellants made to the particular language of the instruction which they have selected for their assault is not well taken.

[13-15] It is also objected that it was error for the court to give Webster's Unabridged Dictionary as authority for the definition of the term "overt act," for it is said the mention of this well-known authority gave a "false and misleading weight" to the instruction. The obvious answer to this objection is that, if the instruction was correct—and appellants have not shown us that it was not—no damaging weight could be imparted to it by the statement of any authority for it, however weighty the authority itself might be. We doubt, however, whether the court gave to the jury the name of the dictionary as authority for the definition, or whether we are bound to assume that it was given, merely because the title of the ponderous lexicon is affixed to the definition in the record. It is the usual custom to append to proposed instructions a list of the authorities which are relied upon as a sanction of their correctness. Many instances of the custom appear in the present record. These lists of authorities should not be given to the jury, of course, if we consider alone the fact that valuable time would be lost in such a course. If the name of the dictionary was read to the jury, however, it would appear that appellants have waived the right to urge the reading as error. Several instructions which were proposed by them, and which were given by the court, are found in the record with authority for their correctness appended to them. Appellants cannot object to a sin in others which they have themselves committed.

Appellants contend that the evidence was insufficient to prove the conspiracy alleged in the indictment. Ordinarily we should meet such an objection by stating enough of the evidence in a cause to show that the point is without merit, but we do not here find such a course to be necessary. The record in this action consists of 2,000 pages, and we have read it in its entirety. We think it sufficient to state that there was ample evidence from which the jury could have inferred that the conspiracy was proven. It is inadvisable to spin out an already lengthy opinion for the purpose of demonstrating a thing which to us appears to be obvious.

[16] Appellants contend that a certain instruction given by the court was erroneous, without arguing the point or citing authority in support of it. Only the instruction is quoted, with the statement that it was erroneously given. Under such circumstances there is nothing for us to decide. Maguire v. Cunningham, 64 Cal. App. 536, 222 P. 838.

Other points are made by appellants, but they are answered in our discussion of questions which are treated above.

TRUITNER v. KNIGHT et al. (Civ. 5664.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 23, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 19, 1926.)

New trial ⟹137—Notice of intent to move for new trial, so denominated, held sufficient, though words "for a new trial" were omitted from body of notice.

Notice of intention to move for a new trial, so denominated, and which read, "You * * * will please take notice that the defendant * * * intends to move the court in the above entitled action on the following grounds, to wit," held sufficient, though words "for a new trial" were omitted from context of body of notice; opposing counsel not being misled.

in defendant Clifford Truitner appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion denied.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, and Carling & Cummings, of Fresno, for appellant.

G. Levin Aynesworth, of Fresno, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Motion to dismiss appeal. The facts out of which the proceeding arises show that plaintiff, a minor of the age of 12 years, brought an action to recover damages against defendants for injuries suffered by her in an automobile accident. The case came on regularly for trial before a jury. Plaintiff recovered a verdict in the sum of $1,000. Thereafter defendant Truitner filed a certain notice in writing upon plaintiff, which was expressly denominated in its heading as being "Notice of Intention to Move for New Trial." The notice reads as follows:

> "You and each of you will please take notice that the defendant Clifford Truitner intends to move the court in the above entitled action on the following grounds, to wit: (1) Irregularity in the proceedings of the court, jury, and adverse parties, by which defendant was prevented from having a fair trial. (2) Misconduct of the jury. (3) Accident and surprise, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. (4) Newly discovered evidence, etc. (5) Excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice. (6) Insufficiency of the evidence. * * * (7) Errors in law. * * *"

The notice further recited that it would be based upon affidavit and also upon the minutes of the court. Indorsed upon the notice was an admission of service by the attorney for the respondent in words and figures following:

> "Due service of the within notice of intention to move for new trial and receipt of a copy thereof acknowledged this the 26th day of February, 1926."

It will be noted that the words "for a new trial" are omitted from the context of the body of the notice itself. The motion was denied by operation of law, and an appeal was regularly taken. The contention of respondent in support of the motion to dismiss the appeal is that no notice of intention to move for a new trial was ever filed, by reason of the omission of the words "for a new trial" in the body of the notice, an omission it is claimed which has the effect of completely nullifying the notice. The main question here presented is whether or not the notice as given was sufficient to satisfy the statutory requirement. There can be no question that the attorney for respondent was not misled or deceived concerning the object of the notice, and in fact he admits that he was not. He insists, however, that, notwithstanding this fact, the statute demands a literal compliance with its terms, failing in which the notice is a mere idle act having no force or effect.

In support of the motion we are cited by respondent to numerous cases involving the insufficiency of notices of appeal as being authority upon the question. No useful purpose would be subserved by a review or analysis of these decisions. It is sufficient to say with reference thereto that they present no analogy to the instant proceeding. The precise question here involved has received consideration by our Supreme Court. In the case of O'Connell v. Main, etc., Hotel Co., 90 Cal. 515, 27 P. 373, the sufficiency of a notice of intention to move for a new trial was under consideration by that court. The objection to the notice was, as here, that it did not formally give notice that a new trial would be asked for. The notice recited that defendant "intends to and will move this court to set aside the decision and judgment heretofore rendered, entered and made in said cause," and it set out, as a basis for the relief sought, various grounds specified in the Code of Civil Procedure for a new trial. It also recited that the motion would be made upon a statement of the case. It further appeared that respondent's attorney had stipulated to give the defendant further time "within which to prepare and serve his statement on motion for a new trial." The notice was held to be sufficient as a notice of intention to move for a new trial. In discussing the case the court took occasion to say that notwithstanding that the notice did not formally advise respondent that a new trial would be asked for, it distinctly and unmistakably gave that information. It was there pointed out that no possible case could be conceived where, under the grounds stated, the motion could refer to any other relief, except the granting of a new trial, and that respondent's attorneys could not possibly be misled, since they stipulated giving further time to defendant to prepare and serve its statement on motion for a new trial.

Precisely the same condition here obtains, and, in addition thereto, the notice is much more explicit, for it is denominated "Notice of Intention to Move for a New Trial." It further recites that it will be made by affidavit and upon the minutes of the court, which recital further indicates the character of the notice. As in the O'Connell Case, the grounds of the motion are stated and they apply only to a motion of this character. No other conceivable motion could be bottomed upon these grounds.

As above indicated, counsel could not possibly have been deceived, and, in fact, he admits, as indeed he must, considering his acknowledgment of service, that he was not misled. As was said in Anderson v. Standard Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 445, 213 P. 65:

> "The disposition of the courts is to hear appeals upon their merits, and the sections of the Code relating to the subject should be liberally construed, with a view of promoting such purpose."

We are of the opinion that the notice so construed is amply sufficient to satisfy the statute. The record further shows that, after the denial of the motion for a new trial by operation of law, appellant filed his notice of appeal within proper time.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

TYLER, P. J. Plaintiff recovered a judgment against defendant in the sum of $4,000. The action was one for damages for personal injuries arising out of an automobile accident. Defendant appealed.

It is claimed that the appeal was not taken within the time allowed by law. There is no merit in the contention. The precise questions here presented were passed upon in the case of Rose Truitner v. Knight et al. (No. 5664) 248 P. 702, this day decided.

Upon the authority of that case, the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

CASHIN, J. A motion upon suggestion of diminution of the record, to insert in the transcript now on file in this court instructions offered by the parties at the trial of the action, in order that the record shall show at whose request certain of the court's instructions to the jury were given. The record on appeal was prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the motion is accompanied by copies of forms of instructions certified by the clerk of the trial court to be true copies of "defendants' instructions" filed in his office.

These papers, in order to be available on appeal, should have been included in the reporter's transcript and made a part of the record, by the action of the trial court including them therein and certifying them to be correct. if through mistake, inadvertence, or neglect they were omitted therefrom, application for relief in the first instance should have been made in the trial court, and in the absence of its action thereon the insertion of the papers in the transcript would add nothing to the authentic record on appeal.

The motion is denied.

MIX v. YOAKUM et al. (Civ. 5566.)*

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 25, 1926. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1926.)

Executors and administrators ⟹443(7)—Complaint in action against executors to recover sum alleged to have been held in trust by deceased for plaintiff, without alleging demand on trustee, held not to state cause of action.

Complaint in suit against executors to recover sum alleged to have been held in trust by deceased for plaintiff, in which no demand was alleged to have been made on trustee during his lifetime, held not to state a cause of action, despite allegation of filing of claim with executor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Charles M. Mix against F. E. Yoakum and another, as executors of the last will and testament of Finis E. Yoakum, deceased. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Newby & Palmer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal, entered after a demurrer to his amended complaint had been sustained, and he had declined to amend further.

The complaint alleged a confidential relationship between plaintiff and Finis E. Yoakum, based upon the fact that up to the time of his death Yoakum was the pastor of a church to which the plaintiff belonged. It is alleged that the plaintiff had an invalid child, and Yoakum promised to effect a cure of her disorders through prayer; that Yoakum obtained a great influence and control over plaintiff, and plaintiff had the greatest confidence in the integrity and benevolence of the said Yoakum; that in May, 1906, plaintiff was about to leave California because he could not secure employment here; that Yoakum became aware of such intention, and also of the fact that plaintiff had some money on hand, and "Yoakum then and there represented to the plaintiff that, if plaintiff would remain in California, he would continue to pray for plaintiff's said daughter, and that, if plaintiff would deliver to him the said funds, the said Finis E. Yoakum and one D. M. McDonald would hold the funds for plaintiff as a trust fund, to be by them loaned to various persons such as they should elect, and that such trust funds would earn plaintiff not less than 12 per cent. per annum; that they would pay the plaintiff such interest as his money would earn from time to time; and that they would repay to him the principal at such time as he should demand the same."

It is further alleged that the plaintiff, believing and relying upon said representations, delivered to Yoakum various sums, amounting in all to $3,300, for which he received receipts, which are set out in the complaint, and which are signed by D. M. McDonald and F. E. Yoakum; that the said Yoakum and McDonald paid to plaintiff the interest upon said sum of $3,300 at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum, which they represented to plaintiff was earned by said loan, up to and until the 4th day of May, 1915. It is alleged that Yoakum died testate on the 17th day of August, 1920, and defendants were duly appointed executors of his last will and testament; that there is due to plaintiff from the estate of said Finis E. Yoakum, deceased, the sum of $3,300, with interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from the 4th day of April, 1914. It is alleged that a notice to creditors was duly published in the matter of the estate of Finis E. Yoakum, deceased, and that, in compliance therewith, on April 25, 1921, plaintiff duly filed his claim with the executors for money held by Yoakum in trust for plaintiff; that said claim has never been allowed nor rejected by said executors.

Plaintiff asks judgment for $3,300, together with interest at 7 per cent. per annum from April 4, 1915. In support of the ruling of the trial court, respondents urge that the complaint cannot be regarded as stating a cause of action to recover trust funds, because, in order that a suit may be regarded as one in equity to recover a specific trust fund, it is necessary for the plaintiff to allege that the identical trust property, or its substituted form, was traceable into the estate of decedent, and thus into the possession of his representatives. Roncelli v. Fugazi, 44 Cal. App. 249, 186 P. 373; Reed v. Reed, 178 Cal. 187, 172 P. 600.

This statement of principle is conceded by appellant to be correct, but he contends that he is relying upon the personal liability of the trustee for breach of trust, and that a failure to repay the money on demand was a breach of the trust. No demand is alleged to have been made upon the trustee during his lifetime, but it is argued that the filing of the claim with the executor was a demand sufficient to put the trustee in default. We think there is a fallacy in this reasoning. Plaintiff is suing upon an alleged claim against the decedent; that claim was fixed and certain at the time of the death of Yoakum. According to the allegations of the complaint, there had been, at that time, no demand made upon Yoakum which he had refused, and he was not guilty of a breach of trust, therefore, in failing to repay the money upon demand. There are no allegations that any of the representations of decedent were false upon which to predicate an obligation upon this theory.

Two other theories of procedure were open to plaintiff: First, to trace the trust property, if he could; second, to allege, if he could, that decedent had mingled the trust property with his own, so as to make it impossible for the beneficiary to follow and identify it, which would constitute a breach of the trust and form the basis for personal liability. Estate of Dutard, 147 Cal. 253, 81 P. 519. Plaintiff has adopted neither theory in his complaint. Application of the rule of liberal construction of pleadings, for which appellant contends, does not remedy the defects in this complaint.

We must conclude, with the trial court, that the complaint does not state a cause of action. The judgment is affirmed.

ELMORE v. TINGLEY. (Civ. 2953.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 21, 1926.)

1. Pleading 🔑350(3)—On motion for judgment on pleadings, nothing can be considered but complaint itself.

On a motion for judgment on the pleadings, nothing can be considered but complaint itself, and all facts alleged are admitted for the purposes of the motion, and court is to determine whether such facts constitute a cause of action.

2. Pleading 🔑35—Complaint in action on note alleged delivered to plaintiff by defendant and partnership held good, notwithstanding unnecessary allegations as to dissolution of partnership.

Complaint in action on promissory note alleged to have been delivered by defendant and partnership held to state cause of action, notwithstanding unnecessary pleading of agreement dissolving partnership relation existing between plaintiff and defendant.

3. Pleading 🔑330—Demand for account of indebtedness set up in defendant's counterclaim, made by serving carbon copy of original and signed by attorney for plaintiff in typewriting, held sufficient compliance with statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 454).

In suit on promissory note, in which defendant by counterclaim set up an alleged indebtedness of plaintiff, demand of plaintiff for an account, made by serving a carbon copy of the original, which was unnecessarily filed in office of clerk of court, and being signed by attorney for plaintiff in typewriting, held sufficient compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 454.

4. Pleading 🔑330—Defendant's failure to deliver to plaintiff, within time required, copy of account on which counterclaim was based, justified exclusion of his evidence tending to prove account (Code Civ. Proc. § 454).

In suit on promissory note, failure of defendant to deliver to plaintiff on request, within time required by Code Civ. Proc. § 454, copy of account on which counterclaim set up in answer was based, justified trial court, in exercise of its discretion, in refusing defendant permission to introduce evidence tending to prove account.

It is function of trier of facts to settle evidentiary conflicts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by W. W. Elmore against J. M. Tingley, in which defendant filed a counterclaim. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Clyde Thomas, of Chico, for appellant.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action on a promissory note, alleged to have been made and delivered to the plaintiff by the defendant and "Tingley & Elmore." Certain payments were made upon the note, which reduced the principal sum claimed to be due thereon at the time of the institution of the action to the sum of $600, for which sum, with interest, judgment was prayed.

The plaintiff and the defendant, for a number of years prior to the making of the note in suit, were engaged as partners in a mercantile business in Los Molinos, Tehama county. On March 12, 1921, the parties executed a written agreement dissolving said partnership. This agreement, it seems, was at least a part of the consideration for the dismissal of a suit or an action brought in the superior court of Tehama county by Tingley against the plaintiff herein and certain other parties. The nature or the specific object of said suit or action is not explained by this record. However, the agreement referred to provided for the dissolution of the copartnership relation between the plaintiff and the defendant in the prosecution of the mercantile business adverted to above, and further provided:

That defendant "has bought from W. W. Elmore" the said mercantile business, together with the store building in Los Molinos in which said business was conducted, the lot on which said building stood, and all the merchandise, book accounts, good will and all other assets pertaining to said business; that defendant was to "assume and save the said W. W. Elmore and D. A. Elmore and his wife, from all obligations now owing by the said firm of Tingley & Elmore," except a certain account held against the firm by one Buffum; that Elmore was to receive, and "has received from said J. M. Tingley and Henrietta Tingley, his wife, a deed" to certain described lots situated in the "L. W. Nelson tract," and in the town of Anderson, Shasta county, said lots being at the time of the dissolution owned by the firm of Tingley & Elmore; that the defendant "has paid to the said W. W. Elmore and D. A. Elmore, his wife, a certain $2,000, now held by Andrew Schafer in compliance with that certain memorandum executed on the 27th day of January, 1920, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and has executed to the said W. W. Elmore and D. A. Elmore, his wife, a second mortgage for $1,000 on the property now held by Mrs. Tingley in Anderson," describing the same.

There are some other stipulations in the agreement, which it is not deemed necessary to recite herein. The complaint, besides pleading the promissory note and alleging payment of certain sums thereon, and nonpayment of the balance alleged to be due by reason thereof, sets out said agreement in hæc verba, but contains no reference by averment to the agreement, unless the following may be so construed:

> "That, on the 12th day of March, 1921, the defendant agreed in writing to assume all obligations legally owed by the firm of Tingley & Elmore."

The defendant filed an answer, together with what is designated in his pleading as a "cross-complaint." The answer denies the execution and delivery of the note set forth in the complaint by Tingley to plaintiff, and also denies other of the essential allegations of the complaint. The so-called cross-complaint alleges the fact that plaintiff and the defendant for many years prior to and up to March 12, 1921, conducted a business as copartners at Los Molinos; that during the existence of such partnership "and on the 29th day of December, 1920," plaintiff became and was indebted to said copartnership in the sum of $1,020.51 "for goods, wares, and merchandise, consisting of groceries, dry goods, general merchandise, and cash advanced, sold, and delivered by the said partners of Tingley & Elmore to the said W. W. Elmore," etc. That averment is followed by allegations to the effect that the said partnership existing between the defendant and the plaintiff was, by the written agreement pleaded in the complaint, dissolved on the 12th day of March, 1921; that by the terms of said agreement all assets, including book accounts, belonging to the said firm, "were sold, assigned, and set over to J. M. Tingley, defendant herein," and that "among the accounts thus sold and assigned to the said J. M. Tingley by the said agreement was the account above referred to, owing from the said W. W. Elmore to the firm of Tingley & Elmore"; that no payment or payments has or have been made by said Elmore (plaintiff) on said account, etc. The agreement is by the so-called cross-complaint annexed to and made a part thereof. A "second cause of cross-complaint" is set up in said pleading upon information and belief, and is to the effect that, since the termination of the copartnership theretofore existing between said Tingley and the plaintiff, as above explained, the plaintiff "has collected and converted to his own use certain accounts owing to the firm of Tingley & Elmore and which were by said agreement sold and assigned to Tingley," particularly the sum of $230.08 owing to said firm by one Mrs. L. E. Little, and which sum, it is alleged, plaintiff has never paid or accounted for to said J. M. Tingley. The prayer is that "the plaintiff take nothing by his action and that he, the said defendant, be given judgment against said W. W. Elmore, plaintiff herein, for the sum of $1,250.59."

No answer was interposed to the so-called cross-complaint; the trial court holding that the "pleading" filed in connection with the answer involved counterclaims, and that, consequently, no answer was necessary—a proper ruling, if the premise is correct. Judgment passed for the plaintiff for the amount sued for, and the defendant appeals upon a record prepared in accord with section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] When the case was called for trial, and before the taking of testimony was begun, defendant moved for judgment on the pleadings, basing the motion on the ground that both the complaint and the answer showed that the obligation evidenced by the note declared upon grew out of and constituted a partnership transaction, and that an action cannot be maintained by one partner against another involving the partnership affairs, in the absence of allegations in the complaint showing that there has been an accounting and settlement of the partnership accounts, citing Dukes v. Kellogg, 127 Cal. 563, 564, 60 P. 44. The motion was denied, and properly so. The settled rule is that, upon a motion for a judgment upon the pleadings, nothing can be considered but the complaint itself. Nothing dehors the complaint, nor any defense thereto set up in the answer, can be taken into account in disposing of such a motion; "but the motion is to be determined upon the same principles as would be a demurrer to the complaint upon the same ground. All the facts alleged * * * are admitted for the purposes of the motion, and the court is to determine whether these facts constitute a cause of action. If the necessary facts are contained in the complaint, the objection that they are defectively set forth, or are in an ambiguous or uncertain form, will be unavailing. There must be an entire absence of some fact or facts essential to constituting a cause of action." Hibernia S. & L.

Socy. v. Thornton, 117 Cal. 481, 482, 49 P. 573, 574; see, also, Kelley v. Kriess, 68 Cal. 210, 212, 9 P. 129; De Toro v. Robinson, 91 Cal. 371, 373, 27 P. 671.

The complaint here states a good cause of action on the promissory note set out therein. Every fact essential to the statement of such a cause of action is alleged, to wit: That defendant and the partnership executed and delivered the note to plaintiff; that plaintiff is the owner and holder thereof, and that the balance remaining due on the principal sum thereof, after deductions of certain payments, is now due and payable; and that defendant has refused and still refuses to pay the same, although demand for such payment has been made. The pleading in the complaint of the agreement dissolving a partnership relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant was not necessary to the statement of a cause of action for the relief sought, but the effect of the agreement as pleaded was neither to add to nor detract from the force of the facts constituting the statement of a cause of action for the recovery of the balance alleged to be due on the note. The agreement, as it is pleaded, is surplusage, so far as the action on the note is concerned. In view of the obvious object of the action, and the manner in which the agreement is pleaded, if it may properly be said to be "pleaded," it is puzzling to determine the reason or the purpose for inserting it in the complaint. If, however, the purpose of incorporating it in the complaint was to show the circumstances under which the obligation arose or originated (which was not necessary to the statement of a cause of action on the note), as set forth in the complaint, it falls far short of accomplishing that purpose. In other words, if it be assumed that the pleading of the agreement was or is material or necessary to show that such was its purpose, the complaint would be wholly wanting in the statement of the purpose or the fact that the note sued on grew out of the transaction referred to in the agreement.

There is in the complaint no explanation whatever disclosing any connection between the note and the matter with which the agreement is concerned. There is no averment to the effect that the making and delivery of the note to plaintiff was the culmination of the agreement of dissolution of the partnership, if it be assumed that that fact would have any material bearing on plaintiff's cause of action on the note. The only allegation in the complaint from which, by some stretch of the imagination, it might be inferred that the note was the outgrowth of the transactions mentioned in the agreement, is the following:

> "That on the 12th day of March, 1912, the defendant agreed in writing to assume all the obligations of the firm of Tingley & Elmore."

But that allegation neither directly nor even inferentially involves the statement that the obligation sued on is or was among the obligations of the firm which were assumed by defendant. But, as stated in the outset, the agreement would be out of place in the complaint, even if it be true (as the evidence shows is the fact) that the note in suit was among the obligations concerned with the agreement dissolving the partnership, since, manifestly, the fact of the making of the agreement and the terms and conditions thereof can be in their nature evidentiary only, or matters to be proved and not to be pleaded, assuming that they have in one way or the other any material relation to the obligation upon which this action is founded or to the right of plaintiff to recover thereon.

The point next made by defendant arose below as follows: As seen, the defendant filed, with his answer, a document which he designated therein as a "cross-complaint," and which the court below held to involve nothing more than the pleading of counterclaims. There is no point made here that the court erred in so holding. Hence we will treat the claims set up in the part referred to of defendant's pleading as counterclaims. It will be noted that the counterclaim first set up by defendant is founded upon an alleged indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant in the sum of $1,020.51, alleged to be due "said copartnership of Tingley & Elmore" for "goods, wares, and merchandise, consisting of groceries, dry goods, general merchandise, and cash advanced, sold, and delivered by the said partnership * * * to the said W. W. Elmore," etc. On the 8th day of October, 1924, the plaintiff, through his counsel, served or caused to be served on defendant, through his counsel, a typewritten demand, dated October 24, 1924, that said defendant, within five days from the date of the service thereof, deliver to plaintiff "a copy of the account and moneys referred to in the counterclaim set forth in your answer in this action, in accordance with section 454 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

It appears from the record—in fact, by admission of counsel for plaintiff—that an original and a carbon copy of the demand were prepared; that counsel for plaintiff caused the original to be filed in the office of the clerk of the court with the papers and files of the action, and the carbon copy, with the name of plaintiff's attorney, typewritten, at the end of or underneath the demand, to be served on defendant. Due service of this copy on the 8th day of October, 1924, was attested by the affidavit of the office clerk of plaintiff's attorney. In fact, the attorney for defendant admitted that he was served with the purported demand. But no heed was paid thereto by the defendant or his counsel. In other words, a copy of the account upon which the counterclaim first alleged in defendant's answer was founded was not furnished or delivered to plaintiff or his attorney by defendant or his attorney. When defendant, at the trial, offered evidence to prove said alleged counterclaim, objection by counsel for plaintiff to any evidence being given or received in support of said claim, on the ground that the demand for a copy of the account out of which said claim arose was not complied with by defendant, was sustained by the court.

Defendant here vigorously contends that the demand was wholly void and of no effect for two reasons, and that he was not required to furnish a copy of the account upon a purported demand, which in law was no demand at all. The two reasons are: (1) That the law contemplates that the original, and not a carbon or other copy, of the demand shall be served upon the party setting up the claim and from whom a copy of the account is demanded; (2) that the law requires that the party entitled to and making the demand for a copy of the account shall subscribe in his own handwriting his name to the demand. So much of section 454 of the Code of Civil Procedure as is pertinent to the present inquiry reads:

> "It is not necessary for a party to set forth in a pleading the items of an account therein alleged, but he must deliver to the adverse party, within five days after a demand thereof in writing, a copy of the account, or be precluded from giving evidence thereof."

[3] The above section does not, as will be noted, prescribe a particular form of the demand which must be served upon the party from whom a copy of the account is demanded; but it must, of course, be in writing, as the section so declares, and, although the section does not expressly so provide, it should either be signed by the party making the demand, or contain some other clear indication that the party making it is the party against whom the account is set up, since, obviously, the party upon whom the demand is made is entitled thus to be furnished with information from which he can determine whether the demand is made by a party entitled to be furnished with a copy of the account upon which the cause of action stated in the complaint is based. Nor is it necessary to file the demand in the office of the clerk of the court, with the files and papers in the action, or at all, since the statute does not so provide. But it is difficult to find a substantial reason for holding that the document served upon defendant by plaintiff as a demand for a copy of the account from which the counterclaim first set up in the answer arose is not sufficient as such a demand merely because it was a carbon copy of the original document or demand prepared by the plaintiff. The object of the demand is, obviously, to secure to the party making it reasonable notice of the items constituting the claim which he is required to meet, so that he may prepare for trial. Ames v. Bell, 5 Cal. App. 1, 4, 89 P. 619.

The Code section, as stated, prescribes no set form for the demand; nor is there anything therein about "original" and "copies" of the demand to which it refers. In other words, there is nothing in said section which, in terms, provides for the making of an "original" written demand or a "copy" of a written "original" demand. While, of course, the party making it may make a copy for his own convenience and use, a matter which he is to determine for himself, there is, so far as the object of the demand or the law authorizing it to be made is concerned, no occasion for both an original and a copy of the demand, since, as seen, the demand is not required to be filed. It is plainly apparent, therefore, that where the demand has been written on two different sheets of paper, one directly on a sheet, and another reproduced from the other by carbon process, it is entirely immaterial which of the two is served on the party upon whom the demand is to be made. When served, the one is as much the original as the other, so far as the purposes of the service are concerned. In other words, either will effectually serve the purpose contemplated by the statute.

As before suggested, all that is required by the statute, under a rational construction thereof, is that the party counting upon the account be given such notice of what is demanded of him by the adverse party as will clearly inform him of the particular account referred to in the demand, and enable him to know that it is the one pleaded by him, and that the party demanding the copy is the adverse party in suit, and therefore entitled to such copy. This being done, it is wholly immaterial whether the demand is in typewriting, or in the handwriting of the demandant, or in point of fact a carbon or other reproduction of an original draft of the demand. The case of Edelman v. McDonell, 126 Cal. 210, 58 P. 528, cited by appellant as supporting the proposition that the "original" and not a copy of the demand must be served on the party suing on the account, is not an authority for the position thus taken. In fact, that case makes no reference to the demand for a copy of the account therein sued on, except to say that:

> "We have no legal evidence that such bill [of particulars] was ever demanded by or delivered to the adverse party."

The particular language of the opinion in that case which counsel seems to think directly supports his contention that, to make the demand legal, the "original" and not a carbon "copy" of the demand must be served upon the party declaring upon an account alleged in a general way, is the following:

> "The statute requires that it shall be delivered to the adverse party, and not a copy thereof, and does not require, or expressly authorize, it to be filed."

In using that language the court was referring to the bill of particulars, and not to the demand for the bill or a copy of the account sued on.

Nor do we think that the fact that the attorney for the plaintiff caused his name to be attached to the demand in typewriting, rather than subscribing it thereto in his own handwriting, made the demand or the service thereof any the less legally effective. The demand contained the title of the court and the cause, and underneath the typewritten name thereon of counsel for plaintiff were the words "attorney for plaintiff," indicating that the said attorney was regularly acting for plaintiff in the litigation and for the latter had the legal right to make the demand. The necessity, if it be necessary, that the demand be subscribed by the party making it, is deducible by implication only, since section 454 does not expressly require the name of the demandant to be subscribed to the document. For this reason we think that the adoption by the attorney for plaintiff of the typewritten method of attaching his name to the demand at the bottom thereof was sufficient (Ligare v. California S. R. R. Co., 76 Cal. 610, 611, 18 P. 777), and that the demand thus signed by the attorney served the purpose of such a document as fully and effectually as it could have done, had the name of the attorney been subscribed to the document in his own handwriting. It would be idle to argue that the attorney for defendant did not know what the demand meant or was intended to accomplish, or what was expected and required thereby of him or his client.

[4] The failure of the defendant to deliver to the plaintiff within the time required a copy of the account upon which the counterclaim first set up in the answer was based justified the trial court, in the exercise of its discretion, in refusing to allow defendant to introduce evidence tending to prove the account. As to the counterclaim secondly set up by defendant, the trial court ruled that the said demand had no reference or application thereto, and therefore permitted defendant to introduce evidence in support thereof.

It is next insisted that it was error to deny the motion for a nonsuit by defendant, made on the close of the plaintiff's case, upon the ground that it was by plaintiff's evidence shown that the obligation which is the basis of the cause of action stated in the complaint "was a partnership obligation and that this was a suit between partners." This contention cannot be sustained. Indeed, it is not consistent with the defendant's own statement in his brief of the facts developed by the evidence presented by the plaintiff. That statement is:

> "On the trial it developed, over the objection of the defendant, that the plaintiff and defendant had for a great many years been associated together as partners in business in Tehama county; that during the said time certain moneys had been advanced for the use of the firm by W. W. Elmore, one of the partners; and that, as proof of said moneys advanced, defendant, J. M. Tingley, had executed a note for and on behalf of the copartnership, and had given it to the plaintiff, W. W. Elmore, which note is the basis of this action."

The foregoing statement, candidly made by counsel for the appellant, is in accord with the evidence introduced by the plaintiff, and clearly shows that the court was legally without authority to grant the motion for a nonsuit. It will not be doubted that, upon the situation as to the evidence so disclosed, the plaintiff, no less than a stranger to a partnership to which he has loaned or advanced money, has the right to maintain an action against the partnership for any money he in his individual capacity loaned to it. The action upon the claim would, of course, be subject to any defense which the partnership might be able legitimately to interpose against recovery thereon, or the right of the partnership to set up any counterclaim or offset that it might be able to set up against recovery by plaintiff on his claim, either in whole or in part.

[5] The findings are sufficiently supported. There was testimony, offered by defendant and received into the record, tending to establish the counterclaim secondly set up in the answer. The defendant also testified that the obligation evidenced by the note in suit was covered by another obligation in favor of plaintiff, and against the defendant and the partnership, which had been paid and satisfied. All this evidence, however, was contradicted by the plaintiff, and thus there was created the evidentiary conflict upon those matters which it is always solely the function of the trier of the facts to resolve and settle.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Frank Fletcher Dickey against E. A. Walrond and others. From the judgment, F. P. Roberts, individually and as administrator of the estate of Marchisi Roberts, deceased, appeals. Affirmed.

Walter H. Linforth and Edwin V. McKenzie, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harding & Monroe, of San Francisco, for respondent Frank Fletcher Dickey.

A. E. Shaw, of San Francisco, for respondents Frank Fletcher Dickey, William James Dickey, and Robert Bernard Dickey.

PER CURIAM. The opinion filed July 2, 1926, is modified to read as follows:

W. J. Dickey died on the 5th day of July, 1912. He left him surviving his wife, Marchisi Josephine Dickey, and two minor sons, William James Dickey, Jr., and Robert Bernard Dickey. This plaintiff was not his son, but was the son of his wife by a former marriage and had had his name changed to Dickey. The decedent left a will. By the terms of the will certain specific bequests were made and then as to the balance of the property the will provided that it should pass to his executors, Bernard Faymonville, E. A. Walrond, and M. B. Harris, as trustees. By the terms of the trust the trustees were to hold the property until the two minor sons should reach the age of 21 years. Thereupon the remainder of the estate should pass as follows: To his wife an undivided one-half part thereof, and to each son an undivided one-fourth thereof. The will further provided that:

> "In the event of the death of my said wife during the life of this trust, then the undivided one-half part that would otherwise have gone to her shall go to her heirs at law."

The language of the will was carried into the decree of distribution. After the death of W. J. Dickey his widow intermarried with Frank P. Roberts. Thereafter, on the 28th day of January, 1923, she died, leaving a last will and testament. At the time of her death William James Dickey, Jr., and Robert Bernard Dickey, the sons of the trustor, were both living and both were under the age of 21 years. Her son, Frank Fletcher Dickey, and her husband, Frank P. Roberts, also survived.

Frank Fletcher Dickey commenced an action to quiet title, and in his complaint he made the surviving trustees defendants and also included Frank P. Roberts as an individual, Frank P. Roberts as the executor of the estate of Marchisi Roberts, deceased, and he also included William James Dickey and Robert Bernard Dickey. The defendants answered and a trial was had in the trial court before the court sitting without a jury. Among other things, the trial court made a finding as follows:

> "That as heirs of the said Marchisi Roberts, deceased, the said plaintiff and the defendants Robert Bernard Dickey, William James Dickey, and Frank P. Roberts are the owners subject to the trust hereinafter mentioned in equal shares of the undivided one-half of the property of said W. J. Dickey, deceased. * * *"

Being dissatisfied with the portion so decreed to him, Frank P. Roberts took this appeal under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellant presents one point, and that is that as a conclusion of law the trial court should have entered a decree finding that appellant is the owner of an undivided one-third of the property, that would have gone to Mrs. Roberts under the will of W. J. Dickey, deceased, if she had not died during the life of the trust, and that the three children of Mrs. Roberts are the owners of the remaining two-thirds in equal proportions.

[1] There is no doubt that in this state a testator has the right to dispose of his property by will as he sees fit. It is not contended that we have any statute, pertinent to the facts of this case, restraining him from doing so or directing to whom and in what amount the property shall be devised or bequeathed. Any and all such pertinent statutes were enacted for the purpose of carrying into effect, and to enable the court to ascertain, the intention of the testator. Estate of Murphy, 157 Cal. 63, 69, 106 P. 230, 137 Am. St. Rep. 110. In the will of W. J. Dickey he named definitely and specifically the beneficiaries. Having done so, and to provide what should be done if any one of the beneficiaries died during the life of the trust, he named again each one and provided that in the event of the person's death the share devised to said beneficiary should "go to his (or her) heirs at law." That phrase is used in the clause under attack and it is used in reference to the possible death of each son and then as to the possible death of both sons. As the testator stated in his will, he did not make any direct devise or bequest to this plaintiff because he felt confident that the testator's wife would provide for the plaintiff. There is nothing showing that the testator ever contemplated that his widow would remarry or, if she did, that she would marry the appellant.

[2, 3] W. J. Dickey was not inclined to deal loosely with his bounty. Thus he did not directly devise anything to his stepson, this plaintiff, but confined his bounty to his own sons and his wife. Although by his will he disposed of separate property aggregating in the neighborhood of $500,000, he did not give to those outside of his sons and wife but $25,000, and that sum did not include a single personal bequest. It is likewise clear that in the expression "his (her) heirs at law," the testator had no individual specially in mind. At the date he made the will the possible heirs of his wife were: (1) Her three sons; (2) the child or children of each one of the sons; (3) the son's child or children. Contemplating these contingencies, it is clear that in certain events any certain individual might or might not be an heir, and that, under the law of succession, the amount would be as varying as the event or events.

It thus appears that from the words of the will, taking into view the circumstances under which it was made, that the persons who were to take after the death of Mrs. Dickey during the life of the trust are definitely and certainly designated, but that as to the proportions in which they were to take, nothing is specifically mentioned. Especially is it true that there is nothing expressly to the effect that the heirs shall take otherwise than in equal shares.

Contending that the testator used the word "heirs" without other words of qualification, and that the terms were used as words of donation, the appellant cites and relies on section 1386 and section 1334 of the Civil Code. The first is the general statute of succession. The other section, omitting irrelevant parts, provides:

> "A testamentary disposition to 'heirs' * * * of any person, without other words of qualification, and when the terms are used as words of donation, and not of limitation, vests the property in those who would be entitled to succeed to the property of such person, according to the provisions of the title on succession."

If that rule is followed, then we are assuming that the testator intended by his will to provide that, under the circumstances which we have recited, the third husband of the testator's widow was to receive a larger portion than the portion which each of the testator's sons would receive and a larger portion than the testator's stepson would receive. But there is nothing on the face of the will showing any such intention.

The respondent controverts the appellant's contention and makes the claim that the above sections are not applicable and that the "heirs at law" constitute a class and each one in the class should share and share equally. The trial court took the latter view and entered its judgment to the effect that the heirs took in equal shares. In doing so we think there was no error. In Estate of Wilson, 65 Cal. App. 680 at page 690, 225 P. 283, 287, the court quotes with approval as follows:

> "In construing a testator's will as executed by him the court may ascribe to the testator, so far as his language permits it, the common impulses of human nature."

We think it can be said, taking into view all of the circumstances under which the will of W. J. Dickey was made, that it clearly appears that it was not his intention to provide in his will, by using the words "her heirs at law," that his wife's third husband should, as her heir, take a larger portion than each of his own sons or his stepson, also heirs of the testator's wife, should take. It was not a "common impulse of human nature" to ascribe to him.

Before the Code the rule in Shelly's Case obtained in this state. Norris v. Hensley, 27 Cal. 439. That rule included these propositions:

> "At common law, a devise of an estate to heirs which they would have taken by descent, was void, and the heirs took as heirs and not as purchasers." Page 446. "If the law will not admit of all possible heirs, etc., taking the inheritance after its inception by a freehold in the ancestor otherwise than by descent, it follows that wherever the limitation to the heirs, etc., after a freehold to the ancestor is admitted to reach the whole denomination or class of heirs described, they must take by descent and not by purchase." Page 447.

Knowing the existence of those rules, the Legislature, on adopting the Codes, enacted Civil Code, § 779, which reads:

> "When a remainder is limited to the heirs, or heirs of the body, of a person to whom a life estate in the same property is given, the persons who, on the termination of the life estate, are the successors or heirs of the body of the owner for life, are entitled to take by virtue of the remainder so limited to them, and not as mere successors of the owner for life."

Later, when the question was before it, in the case entitled Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, at page 301, 37 P. 1049, 1050, the Supreme Court said:

> "By section 779 of the Civil Code the term 'heirs' is changed from the word of limitation to one of purchase, and becomes a specific designation of a class which will have the right to the property upon the termination of the life estate. Upon that event they take the property, not by descent or as successors of the plaintiff, but by virtue of the remainder which was created for them at the execution of the deed to him."

At the same time the Legislature adopted section 1334, Civil Code, as follows:

> "A testamentary disposition to 'heirs' * * * of any person, without other words of qualification, and when the terms are used as words of donation, and not of limitation, vests the property in those who would be entitled to succeed to the property of such person, according to the provisions of the title on succession, in this Code."

And it adopted section 1335, Civil Code, as follows:

> "The terms mentioned in the last section are used as words of donation, and not of limitation, when the property is given to the person so designated, directly, and not as a qualification of an estate given to the ancestor of such person."

As the decedent did not give his property directly to the appellant the devise to him was not necessarily one of "donation and not of limitation." Civil Code, § 1335. An examination of the will discloses that the devise to the appellant, as an heir, was both a donation and a limitation and therefore Civil Code, § 1334, does not apply.

It follows that resort may be had to the statute of succession for the purpose of ascertaining who were the heirs of the widow of the deceased. Having done so, that statute ceases to be a factor. To ascertain the proportions in which each heir takes the respondent was entitled to rely on the instrument creating the remainder. Civil Code, § 779, supra. As that instrument, when fully and completely construed, contains no expression to the contrary each member of the class shares and shares equally. Burke v. Modern Woodmen of America, 2 Cal. App. 611, 84 P. 275; Cooper v. Wilder, 111 Cal. 191, 43 P. 591, 52 Am. St. Rep. 163; De Laurencel v. De Boom, 67 Cal. 362, 7 P. 758.

Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 175 P. 415, is not helpful. The will in that case did not involve a life estate and a remainder over. The devise was direct. Hence Civil Code, §§ 1334 and 1335, both applied. Moreover, the will was so worded as, in effect, to adopt section 1334. It was "to my heirs and to be distributed to them according to law."

Estate of Marshall, 176 Cal. 784, 169 P. 672, is not helpful because the words of that will are "to my own family who I think are all in Mexico," thus qualifying the word "family."

Estate of Wilson, 184 Cal. 65, 193 P. 581, is not helpful because the language of the will before the court was "shall be distributed among my heirs, as provided by the laws of the state of California, the same as if I had died intestate." This language adopts section 1386—the law of succession. See page 70, 193 P. 583,.

[4] Where, as here, a gift is made of an aggregate sum to a body of persons uncertain in number at the time of the gift to be ascertained at a future time, such fact is a circumstance indicating a gift to a class. Where, as here, the devisees are described as a body, their names not being mentioned, and there is nothing to indicate a gift to individuals, that fact is a circumstance indicating a gift to a class. Estate of Fisk, 182 Cal. 238, 241, 242, 187 P. 958. And when it has been ascertained that the gift was made to a class and possession was postponed to a future period, the gift includes all persons coming within the description before the time to which possession is postponed (Civ. Code, § 1337), and they take in equal shares in the absence of language or circumstances showing a contrary intention.

The judgment is affirmed.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. JONES. (Cr. 920.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 13, 1926.)

Burglary ⟹10—Burglary in first degree held not shown, where defendant entered railroad caboose, not armed with deadly weapon or assaulting any person; "inhabited dwelling house or building" (Pen. Code, § 459, and section 460, as amended by St. 1923, p. 747).

A railroad caboose not being an "inhabited dwelling house or building," within Pen. Code, § 460, as amended by St. 1923, p. 747, in view of Pen. Code, § 459, and evidence not showing that defendant removing articles therefrom was armed with a deadly weapon at any time, or that he assaulted any person, held, that conviction for first degree burglary was not sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Inhabited Dwelling House.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Tom Jones was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

Arthur M. Bundy, of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem. The defendant was charged with the crime of burglary, and the jury found him guilty of burglary in the first degree. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The salient facts in the case are that on the night of October 27, 1925, a freight train of the Sacramento Northern Railroad Company was standing in the yard of that company at Marysville; the rear car of the train was a caboose, within which the train crew kept certain personal effects in lockers. The train crew, consisting of two men, had locked the caboose and gone to the depot. Thereafter one A. H. Hale, a railroad detective, arrested the defendant and marched him down the track toward the depot. The two members of the train crew testified that the defendant had in his possession, when they met him in custody of Hale, the detective, certain personal property belonging to one or the other of them, which they had left in the caboose, and that they thereafter went back to the caboose and found a locker broken.

The defendant urges several grounds for reversal, and we have carefully examined each of them. We do not think they merit detailed consideration, other than the one ground, which we consider, and which ground we feel will require a reversal of the case.

As stated, the defendant was convicted of burglary in the first degree. There was no testimony that the defendant was armed with a deadly weapon while in the commission of such burglary, or that in the commission of such burglary he assaulted any person. Neither can it, we think, be claimed that the caboose at the end of the train should be classified as an "inhabited dwelling house or building," as used in section 460 of the Penal Code. Section 460 of the Penal Code reads:

> "1. Every burglary of an inhabited dwelling house or building committed in the nighttime, and every burglary whether in the daytime or nighttime, committed by a person armed with a deadly weapon, or who while in the commission of such burglary arms himself with a deadly weapon, or who while in the commission of such burglary assaults any person, is burglary of the first degree.
> "2. All other kinds of burglary are of the second degree. * * *" (Amendment approved 1923; Stats. 1923, p. 747.)

We think that a caboose is a railroad car. See section 459, Pen. Code. The information in the case charges that the defendant "did * * * enter that certain railroad car commonly known as a caboose," etc. It would seem that both the trial court and the district attorney, when the verdict was returned, overlooked the amendment to section 460 of the Penal Code, adopted in 1923, changing the definition of the degrees of burglary in this state. As the caboose, under the facts in proof in the case, cannot be classified as an "inhabited dwelling house or building," and as there is no testimony that the defendant in this case was armed with a deadly weapon at any time, and as there is no claim that the defendant assaulted any person, the evidence at most could only sustain a conviction of burglary in the second degree, and the court erred in denying the defendant's motion for an order setting aside the verdict of the jury and granting a new trial.

For the reasons given, we are brought to the conclusion that the evidence in this case does not sustain a verdict of first degree burglary, and it follows that the order and judgment appealed from must be reversed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. HILL. (Cr. 896.)

Criminal law ⚿1071—Failure to comply substantially with statute requiring statement of grounds of appeal in application for transcript is fatal (Pen. Code, § 1247).

Pen. Code, § 1247, requiring appellant to state grounds of appeal or points relied on in application for transcript, is mandatory, and failure to comply substantially therewith is fatal.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George W. Thompson, Judge.

Seymour Hill was convicted of maintaining a common nuisance by selling and keeping for sale intoxicating liquors at his hotel, and he appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Thomas Maul, of Placerville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of maintaining a common nuisance from August 26, 1924, to and including the 11th day of July, 1925, at his hotel, "in that said defendant did then and there willfully and unlawfully sell, barter and keep for sale on the premises aforesaid intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes." He filed notice of appeal and application for a transcript of the reporter's notes in the following terms:

> "To the Clerk of the Above-Entitled Court; to Abe Darlington, District Attorney of the County of El Dorado.
> "Notice is hereby given that the above-named defendant intends to and does hereby appeal from the judgment, entered by the above-entitled court, upon the verdict of the jury, which tried the above-entitled case, finding the said defendant guilty of the crime of maintaining a common nuisance. Said appeal is taken from the order permitting the district (attorney) to amend the indictment, from the order of the court overruling the demurrer of the defendant, from the verdict of the jury, and from every order, ruling, and decision of the court in each and every proceeding in the above-entitled case, and from the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The clerk of the above-entitled court is hereby instructed and requested to have a transcript of every proceeding had in said case, including the arraignment, pleading, and trial of the above-entitled case and all testimony taken at each and every proceeding, including statements of counsel, statements, and rulings of the court and everything transpiring at each and every proceeding."

The Attorney General has moved to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the application for a transcript does not state the grounds of the appeal or the points upon which the appellant relies. Section 1247 of the Penal Code provides that, upon taking an appeal, the appellant "must, within five days, file with the clerk and present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which the appellant relies and designate what portions of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon. If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken." It is clear that no attempt was made in the application to state the grounds of the appeal or the points upon which the appellant relies. It has been held uniformly that the provisions of section 1247 are mandatory and that failure to comply substantially therewith is fatal. People v. Flaherty, 61 Cal. App. 775, 215 P. 699; People v. Sanders, 60 Cal. App. 742, 214 P. 246; People v. Ali, 38 Cal. App. 544; People v. Measor, 20 Cal. App. 406, 129 P. 469; Rhodes v. Sargent, 17 Cal. App. 54, 118 P. 727.

The appeal is dismissed.

1. Divorce ⚷245(1).

In absence of statutory authority, courts have no jurisdiction to alter their final judgments.

3. Courts ⚷23.

Parties cannot, by stipulation, confer on court a jurisdiction which the law has denied it.

Application by George S. Gillespie for writ of prohibition to be directed to Superior Court of San Diego County, C. N. Andrews, Judge thereof, to restrain enforcement of modified decree of divorce and assessment of penalty on petitioner for failure to comply therewith. Writ granted.

Arthur F. H. Wright, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. It appears from the petition in this proceeding that on October 18, 1920, an interlocutory decree of divorce was made and entered in favor of Clara Gillespie and against George S. Gillespie, petitioner herein, and that on October 19, 1921, a final decree was entered dissolving the bonds of matrimony theretofore existing between the parties, and reciting:

> "That said plaintiff, and said defendant and each of them be and they are hereby free from each and all of the obligations thereof." The final decree also provided, as did the interlocutory judgment, "that the plaintiff herein, Clara Gillespie, be and she is hereby given the care, custody and control of George S. Gillespie, Junior, the son of the parties hereto."

[1] On September 22, 1922, the parties signed and filed in the original divorce action a stipulation in writing by the terms of which they agreed:

> That the interlocutory decree, and the final decree, "may be modified and amended with reference to the custody, care, education, maintenance, and support of the minor child of said parties in accordance with the modified decree, a copy of which is hereto attached."

Thereafter both parties appeared before the superior court, evidence was introduced, and an order entitled "Modification of Final Decree of Divorce," dated October 16, 1922, was made and entered. It provides that both parties desire "that said decree be modified so as to settle and dispose of the respective property rights of the parties;" that a property settlement was made between them prior to the rendition of the interlocutory decree, but that neither decree contained any provisions concerning the property rights of the plaintiff or defendant. It then proceeds, in part, as follows:

> "Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered and decreed that said decree of divorce be modified and amended" to award to the defendant custody of the boy, and that "in lieu of said property settlement heretofore entered into said defendant shall pay to said plaintiff within sixty (60) days from the date of this modified decree the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00), for the care, support and maintenance of the plaintiff," $1,000 annually to and including the year 1926, and certain specified amounts each month, "until the marriage or death of said plaintiff."

Payments were not made as directed, and, pursuant to an affidavit and order to show cause, a hearing was held on January 11, 1926, at which time the matter was continued to January 25, 1926, and the court indicated that it would then punish the defendant for contempt. This proceeding was thereupon instituted, praying a writ of prohibition restraining the superior court from enforcing its so-called modified decree, and from assessing any penalty against the petitioner for failing to comply with its requirements. It is contended that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in attempting to alter or amend the final judgment by directing the payment of alimony.

[2] Section 138 of the Civil Code authorizes the modification, when necessary, of an order providing for the custody, care, education, maintenance, or support of minor children of the parties to a divorce action, regardless of stipulation. But, in the absence of statutory authority, courts have no jurisdiction to alter their final judgments. The final decree in question did not attempt to establish any of the property rights of the parties, or to direct the payment of any alimony; it was final in form and substance, and contained no reservation. The case is in this respect similar to Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 P. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70, wherein a final decree was entered which made no mention of alimony. Thereafter, upon petition of the plaintiff, an order was made "that defendant pay to plaintiff the sum of one hundred dollars per month" until the further order of the court. Certain property rights were there asserted by the complaint, and adjusted by the court in its final decree, but we do not think that fact is material to the question here presented. Upon appeal from the order directing the payment of alimony the Supreme Court said:

> "A judgment in a divorce suit settling the property rights of the parties, after the time for appealing therefrom has expired, is as final as any other kind of a judgment, except so far as the power to modify it is given by statutory provision. Of course, when we speak of a final judgment, we mean one which does not upon its face reserve jurisdiction (when that can be done) to make a supplemental decree, in which case it is not final. In the case at bar there was no such reservation; it was final in form and substance. And there is no statutory provision giving jurisdiction to make the order appealed from. * * * After the judgment granting the divorce, the plaintiff was no longer the wife of the defendant; and he owed her no longer any marital duty. From that time she could enforce against him no obligation not imposed by the court at the time of the judgment. In the case at bar the judgment became final without any award of alimony; and, of course, the court could not afterwards 'modify' what never existed."

Other cases in this state announcing the same rule are O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 422, 57 P. 225, McKay v. McKay, 125 Cal. 68, 57 P. 677, O'Brien v. O'Brien, 130 Cal. 409, 62 P. 598, Harlan v. Harlan, 154 Cal. 348, 98 P. 32.

[3] It follows, therefore, that, as more than 6 months had elapsed since the entry of both the interlocutory decree and the final decree, respondent had no jurisdiction to modify either by adding a provision for alimony for the support of the plaintiff, when each of those decrees was silent upon the subject, and hence that its order of October 16, 1922, was void. This being true, "the parties could not by stipulation confer upon the court a jurisdiction which the law has denied it." Bacigalupi v. Bacigalupi (Cal. App.) 238 P. 93; Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 367, 173 P. 582.

It is ordered that a peremptory writ of prohibition issue in accordance with the views herein expressed.

One selling corporate stock without permit, contrary to Corporate Securities Act, is guilty of an offense, regardless of whether he knew he was violating law.

14. Criminal law 🔑822(7)—That part of instruction not requiring guilty knowledge for conspiracy to violate Corporate Securities Act, if error, held not prejudicial, where as a whole it indicated that corrupt motive was essential.

That part of court's instruction submitting question of whether defendants conspired to violate Corporate Securities Act, regardless of guilty knowledge, if error, held not prejudicial, where instruction as a whole indicated that corrupt motive was essential element of crime of conspiracy.

15. Criminal law 🔑829(3).

In prosecution for conspiracy to violate and violation of Corporate Securities Act, instructions emphasizing different testimony bearing on intent held properly refused, where general instruction told jury to consider all facts and circumstances disclosed by evidence.

16. Conspiracy 🔑48—Licenses 🔑42(5).

In prosecution for conspiracy to violate and violation of Corporate Securities Act, instruction relating to "common occurrences" of organizing corporations outside state to evade law held properly rejected, as embodying immaterial matter.

17. Jury 🔑103(3)—Disallowing challenge for cause as to juror whose answers as to whether he had formed opinion were conflicting held not error.

Disallowing challenge for cause as to juror whose answers as to whether he had formed opinion were conflicting held not error, question presented to court being one of fact, as to which answer revealed state of talesman's mind.

18. Licenses 🔑42(4).

Evidence held sufficient to show venue as to allegations of sales of corporate stock without permit contrary to Corporate Securities Act.

19. Licenses 🔑42(3).

Indictment alleging that securities issued by foreign corporation were brought into state by defendants and sold without permit held to state offense, under Corporate Securities Act, it not being necessary to allege defendants' connection with corporation.

20. Conspiracy 🔑28.

Conspiracy to violate Corporate Securities Act is crime.

21. Constitutional law 🔑46(3).

Constitutionality of Corporate Securities Act, § 14, declaring all securities sold in violation thereof to be void, not being involved in prosecution for conspiracy or violation of act, will not be considered.

22. Constitutional law 🔑62, 80(2).

Corporate Securities Act held not unconstitutional as illegally delegating judicial functions and legislative powers to corporation commissioner.

23. Licenses 🔑7(1).

Corporate Securities Act held not unconstitutional as being invalid exercise of police power.

24. Constitutional law 🔑230(1) — Licenses 🔑7(1).

Provisions of Corporate Securities Act held not unreasonable, arbitrary, oppressive, discriminatory, or in restraint of trade so as to make it unconstitutional.

25. Conspiracy 🔑37—That parties to conspiracy succeeded in perpetrating acts constituting crime they conspired to commit held not to relieve them of liability for conspiracy (Pen. Code, § 182).

That parties to conspiracy succeeded in perpetrating acts constituting crime they conspired to commit held not to relieve them of liability for conspiracy under Pen. Code, § 182, since crime of conspiracy is distinct offense from actual commission of crime forming object of conspiracy.

26. Licenses ⚿8(2).

There was no hiatus in operation of Corporate Securities Act, § 2, par. 3, at time of its repeal in 1923, since existing law remained in force till amendment took effect.

27. Criminal law ⚿42.

Defendants in prosecution for conspiracy to violate and violation of Corporate Securities Act held not entitled to immunity because they gave evidence before corporation commissioner, where they did not claim privilege of not giving testimony, and subpœna was not directed to them but to corporation, in view of Corporate Securities Act, § 17, as amended by St. 1923, p. 91, § 4.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

J. J. Eiseman and others were charged with conspiracy to violate and violation of the Corporate Securities Act. During the first trial, in which the jury disagreed, charges against defendant John I. Pankratz were dismissed. On second trial J. J. Eiseman was convicted of both offenses. Alexander R. Abrams was convicted of violating the act, and Holmes Ives and another were convicted of conspiracy, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Joseph A. Brown and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for appellant Eiseman.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for appellant Abrams.

Joseph McInerney and Stanislaus A. Riley, both of San Francisco, for appellants Ives and Whelan.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and Robert E. Fitzgerald, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendants, J. J. Eiseman, Alexander R. Abrams, Holmes Ives, N. J. Whelan, and John I. Pankratz, were jointly indicted by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco for the crimes of conspiracy to violate and of having violated the California Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), which declares in part that "no company shall sell, * * * or offer for sale, negotiate for the sale of, or take subscriptions for any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do * * *" (section 3); and that "every officer, agent, or employee of any company, and every other person, who knowingly authorizes, directs, or aids in the issue or sale of, or issues or executes, or sells, or causes, or assists in causing to be issued, executed, or sold, any security * * * contrary to the provisions of this act * * * is guilty of a public offense * * *" (section 14).

The indictment contained eight counts, the first charging a conspiracy to violate said act, and the seven subsequent counts charging unlawful sales of corporate securities. The defendants were tried jointly, and during trial the charges against Pankratz were dismissed; as to the other defendants the jury disagreed. Upon second trial Eiseman was convicted on all eight counts; Abrams was found guilty on the seven counts charging actual violations of said act, but the jury disagreed as to the conspiracy charge; Ives was convicted on the conspiracy charge, the jury having failed to agree upon the remaining ones; and Whelan was convicted on the conspiracy charge and acquitted as to the others. All of the convicted defendants have appealed, and, with the exception of Ives and Whelan, who join in their defense, are represented by different counsel and have filed separate briefs. The legal contentions advanced by the respective appellants are substantially the same, however, and therefore the separate appeals may be considered together. Aside from the claim that the evidence as a whole is insufficient to constitute the offenses charged, no question of disputed facts has arisen, but a statement of the evidence seems necessary to a correct understanding of the conspiracy charge and of the numerous legal problems presented. The record on appeal is voluminous, containing some 4,500 typewritten pages of reporter's transcript and more than 500 pages of printed and typewritten briefs; and, although we shall attempt to relate only the essential facts, the summarization of them will necessarily be somewhat extended.

The transactions which eventually resulted in the indictment and conviction of appellants had their inception in a legitimate effort to aid in the financial affairs of an automobile tire company operating under California law, but developed into the consummation of a fraudulent scheme conceived by appellant Eiseman, in the promotion and profits of which his coappellants shared, whereby the worthless securities of a corporation organized by appellants in another state purposely to circumvent the effect of the California Corporate Securities Act, were, in violation of said act, brought into this state and sold to the stockholders of said tire company in particular, and to any one else in general who might be induced to buy them.

During the year 1922 said tire company was and for some time prior thereto had been engaged in the manufacture and sale of automobile tires, Ives being its president and Whelan its vice president and chairman of the board of directors. It had issued and sold a large amount of its stock throughout California, but early in the year 1922, in order to increase its working capital, undertook a further stock selling campaign, in which it enlisted the services of Eiseman, who at the time was a duly licensed stockbroker. The campaign was not successful, and during the summer of 1922 Eiseman's connection with the enterprise ended. He then went to Los Angeles, where he followed the brokerage business in connection with establishments unrelated to the tire company until his certificate as a broker was revoked for cause by the state corporation commissioner. Having learned while selling stock for the tire company that its stockholders were generally dissatisfied with their investments, Eiseman returned to San Francisco and unfolded to one Max I. Smith, then a licensed broker and since deceased, a plan to develop a Utah coal mining corporation and to trade its stock to the stockholders of the tire company, of whom he had a complete list, for their stock in the latter company and certain cash considerations. Smith did not look upon the plan with favor, however, and declined to enter into it. Eiseman then suggested that a so-called finance company be formed for the ostensible purpose of financing the tire company by discounting the latter's trade acceptances and loaning it money upon the security of customers' accounts, Eiseman predicting that the stock and other securities issued by such a company could be readily disposed of to the dissatisfied stockholders of the tire company for their stock in the latter company at par and a like amount in cash or its equivalent. Smith encouraged the scheme, and in furtherance thereof Eiseman, accompanied by Smith and one Carroll, a licensed salesman of corporate securities, visited the tire company's plant, where he conferred privately with Ives in regard to it. At the conclusion of the conference Eiseman informed Smith and Carroll that the proposition had been favorably received and if consummated he, Eiseman, would eventually be the owner of the tire company's factory. Thereupon, in the early part of September, 1922, Eiseman consulted with Roy Bronson, his attorney, as to the feasibility of the formation of the proposed finance company under the laws of the state of Delaware, so as to evade the effect of the California Corporate Securities Act and allow such company to operate and to sell its stock and securities in this state without the necessity of obtaining a permit for that purpose from the corporation commissioner. Bronson prepared an outline of such a company, together with a plan for the sale of its stock and securities in that state to Eiseman, and advised that such proceedings would be legal and if carried out would allow said stock and securities to be disposed of in this state by licensed brokers without interference or permit from the California corporation commissioner. Bronson's plans were later approved at a conference attended by Eiseman, Ives, and Whelan, and on December 19, 1922, at the request of those mentioned, he caused said projected company to be incorporated in Delaware, under the name of "Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company," with three "dummy" directors and an authorized capital of $2,500,000 of Class A common stock of the par value of $100 per share, and 5,000 shares of Class B common stock of no par value. Immediately after organizing, the directors in Delaware authorized the issuance to Ives and Whelan of the entire Class B stock in purported consideration of services rendered by them in organizing the new company, and also authorized the issuance of $1,000,000 of 6 per cent. "income gold debentures" of the denomination of $100 each. Thereupon, in accordance with the Bronson plan, and on December 20, 1922, the directors entered into a contract purporting to sell to Eiseman $1,000,000 of its Class A stock and $500,000 of its debentures in units of two shares of stock and one debenture of the aggregate face value of $300 a unit for the sum of $120 a unit, making a total purchase price of $600,000, of which $25,000 was to be paid upon the execution of said contract and the balance in installments ranging in amounts from $25,000 to $300,000, the last installment falling due on June 1, 1925. Negative evidence was introduced by the prosecution sufficient to establish the fact that neither the initial payment of $25,000 above mentioned nor any of the others were ever made.

As part of the same transaction the directors executed a trust and escrow agreement pursuant to which the stock and debentures mentioned in the Eiseman agreement were afterwards deposited with a San Francisco firm to be delivered to Eiseman upon payment or evidence of payment of sums equivalent to the agreed purchase price. Immediately thereupon the principal place of business and in fact everything belonging to the Delaware corporation was moved to California, where the "dummy" directors were succeeded by a new board consisting in part of Eiseman, Ives, and Whelan; Ives becoming president and Eiseman vice president and managing director. In February, 1923, upon presenting the incorporation documents to the California secretary of state for filing, it was learned that the "Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company" could not be domesticated in this state because the local Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87, as amended), prohibited the use of the word "bankers" by a corporation engaged in a business not falling within the scope of such act. Another corporation was then organized under the laws of Delaware known as "California Mortgage & Discount Company," with a capitalization of 100 shares of the total value of $10,000, the entire stock of which was purported to have been purchased by "Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company" in consideration of the transfer to it of 1,000 shares of the tire company stock; but neither transfer was ever made. California Mortgage & Discount Company was then moved to and domesticated in California, the personnel of its officers and board of directors being substantially the same as those of its companion Delaware company, and was thereafter represented as being an operating subsidiary of the last-named corporation, with like objects and purposes, and occupied the same offices in San Francisco.

Early in January, 1923, Eiseman revealed to Carroll the method by which and the time when he expected to realize large sums of money from the operation of his enterprises. He stated that in April, 1923, the finance company would declare a "dividend," which he intended should be paid out of the money received from previous stock sales (which dividend was in fact declared and paid in part as planned), and that as a result of the "reload," meaning as he said that those who had already bought securities would make further and greater purchases, the "blow-off" would come, and that with the large sums of money received he would be able to retire and live in Italy.

During the middle of December, 1922, which was prior to the date of the conversation just mentioned and before the date of the incorporation of the finance company in Delaware, and notwithstanding that said company was at that time wholly unauthorized to transact any business, plans were laid to sell its securities in this state, and many sales were actually made in Santa Clara, Napa, and Sonoma counties. A public meeting was held in San Jose which was attended largely by the tire company stockholders residing in the Santa Clara valley in response to notices prepared and sent by Eiseman under the name of the tire company and Ives as president. An address, illustrated by moving pictures taken for that purpose, was delivered by Whelan regarding the operation of the tire company's plant and the manufacture of its products, after which Eiseman elaborated upon the objects and purposes of Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company. Smith and Carroll remained over a few days after the meeting to close initiated sales, while at the same time Eiseman and Whelan canvassed the owners of tire company stock and others in the Napa and Sonoma valleys. In January, 1923, Eiseman, accompanied by Carroll, visited and made sales among the tire company stockholders in the vicinity of Santa Cruz, their arrival being preceded by introductory telegrams purporting to come from Ives, but which were in fact sent by Eiseman. In making these sales and at the San Jose meetings false statements were made which clearly proved a deliberate design to impose grossly on those who might be induced to invest in said finance company. It was represented generally that the business of said company would be to supply the tire company with working capital, upon the security of customers' accounts and through the discount of trade acceptances; that thereby the tire company would be placed in a prosperous condition; and Eiseman emphasized the dual advantage which he said would accrue to those tire company stockholders who would surrender their stock in part payment of the new company's securities.

Among those purchasing in San Jose was one John Scherr, who, on account of illness, had been incapacitated from work for six years, making it necessary for his wife to earn the livelihood for both. Scherr and his wife were told that the finance company's securities would pay dividends of 6 per cent. every three months, and that the profits the Scherrs would receive therefrom would soon be enough to make it unnecessary for Mrs. Scherr to work. The Scherrs turned in their 100 shares of stock in the tire company, and, in addition, Mrs. Scherr was persuaded to call in an outstanding 7 per cent. loan of $1,500 and invest that money in these securities. Later, when a check for $90 was delivered to the Scherrs in payment of a "dividend," the agents told them that further "dividends" would be paid at intervals of about every three months, and that they would soon be able to purchase a fine automobile like the one the agents were then taking them to ride in. They were then asked if they had any other securities to invest, such as Liberty bonds, to which Mrs. Scherr replied that all they had left besides their home was a life insurance policy for $1,000. She was induced to part with this policy, but after retaining it for several weeks it was returned with the explanation that it was not convertible. In Sonoma county Eiseman and Whelan, on December 18, 1922, called upon a man named Trubody, and under the same misrepresentations as to the purposes of the finance company obtained from him 400 shares of the tire company stock at a valuation of $5,000 and 50 shares of Great Western Power stock with a like valuation of $5,000 as payment for 200 shares of the finance company stock. To another stockholder named Mastrup the additional representation was made that Eiseman was a banker and had formed a new company to do a banking and financing business in aid of the tire company, and from him they obtained 5 shares of the tire company stock and 5 shares of Dusenberg automobile stock, the latter stock being taken in as the equivalent of cash; but unintentionally he omitted to indorse the stock. It was returned to him with the request that he do so promptly that he might participate in the coming dividend. He complied with the request, later received the "dividend," and purchased more securities. One Arthur Forni of Napa county, although not a stockholder in the tire company, was induced to give his promissory notes aggregating $25,000 in payment of 250 shares of Class B stock and debentures of the face value of $25,000 upon the assurance of Eiseman, supported by a fictitious telegram, that Forni would be made a director and the vice president of the finance company. He became neither.

A purchaser named Hitchings, residing in Santa Cruz, testified that Eiseman represented to him that the finance company was in process of formation; that it already had money in the treasury and would pay a dividend on April 1st; that the money received from the sales of Class B stock was to be held until the "end of the financing period" and then returned; that subscribers for that stock were to be made associate directors of the company so as to keep in touch with the company's affairs and if dissatisfied could withdraw and receive back the money and stock they had paid in. The real financing of the company, it was represented, was to come from the sale of Class A stock and the debentures. Hitchings was induced to subscribe for 241 shares of Class B stock, giving in payment thereof an assigned note and mortgage for $8,000 and 405 shares of tire company stock.

Shortly after the trip to Santa Cruz a disagreement arose between Eiseman and Carroll, as a result of which Carroll severed his connection with the Eiseman schemes; but before doing so he threatened to advise Hitchings and others of the fraudulent character of Eiseman's enterprises. Thereupon Eiseman wired Hitchings that Carroll had been discharged "for very good cause," and warning Hitchings of Carroll's threat to "spread venomous propaganda," and a few days afterwards called upon Hitchings personally regarding the same matter. About this time Smith became seriously ill and withdrew from further association with Eiseman. His place as the broker for the finance company was filled by appellant Abrams, who had theretofore been sharing the Eiseman offices, although until Smith's death apparently was not interested in the promotion of said finance company. He had been doing business pursuant to a broker's license under his own name, Alexander R. Abrams, as well as under the fictitious names of Alexander & Co. and Bankers' Security Company. Under this latter designation and for an overriding commission of 2½ per cent. on all sales he consented to act as the broker for the sale of the securities of the Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company.

Thereafter, about the middle of February, 1923, the active campaign for the sale of the finance company's securities commenced. Salesmen were sent out with letters of introduction signed by Eiseman and Ives. Preparatory circular letters and prospectus were mailed to all stockholders of the tire company containing Ives' indorsement of the new company and recommendations to purchase its securities. Sales were plentiful, the purchasers buying mostly units of Class A stock and debentures for which they paid one-third cash or its equivalent in convertible securities, one-third in tire company stock at par, and the balance in unsecured promissory notes. It was following Abrams' connection with the affairs of the finance company that the sales were made to the individuals named in the seven counts charging actual violation of the statute.

Under date of February 18, 1923, Hitchings wrote to Ives about a phone message from Carroll in which Carroll had said that upon investigation he had ascertained that "the story that Mr. Eiseman was connected with the notorious Alexander & Co.," was true; also that the finance company was not a California corporation, had not complied with the laws of this state, and consequently was without authority to sell any stock in California; that for those reasons he, Carroll, had withdrawn from the company and advising him, Hitchings, to protect himself. Hitchings added that "this story about Mr. Eiseman * * * had been circulating around town for some time" and was "bad for both companies," and that he would like to have Ives send him "a plain statement of facts as he knew them regarding Eiseman's connection with Alexander & Co.," also as to "Eiseman's reputation and standing in the financial and business world." The reply to this letter was signed and mailed by Ives, but was in fact written by Eiseman on one of the tire company's letterheads, Ives having delivered Hitchings' letter to Eiseman for that purpose. The reply was in part as follows:

> "My Dear Mr. Hitchings: Your personal letter to me bespeaks the acme of my desire. I have always been glad to hear from the stockholders directly. Relative to your inquiry regarding Mr. Eiseman's reputation and standing in the business world, it gives me great pleasure to inform you that I have personally known Mr. Eiseman for more than two years, during which time he has been in the active management of the finances of our company. The results that he brought us speak in the highest and most laudatory terms for themselves. We have always found him honorable, truthful and unequivocally honest. His financial standing, personal and property liabilities would be jealously coveted by men much older than he. Before coming to our company I personally made an exhaustive research into his antecedents, and the recommendations I received were of the highest. You, nor any one else need have any apprehension over any dealings entered into with Mr. Eiseman. At any time that you should find it possible to visit with me at my offices, I shall be glad to go into detail in eulogizing Mr. Eiseman's past and present status. Regarding Alexander & Co., permit me to state, with emphasis, that Mr. Eiseman was at no time connected with that firm. On the other hand, when he discovered that they were handling our stock he immediately put forth every effort and succeeded in squelching their activities."

It was further stated that Eiseman was justified in dispensing with the services of Carroll on account of the latter's "chicanery in the San Jose deal." Any suspicions entertained by Hitchings were thus dispelled, and he became an ardent supporter of the new company. In March, 1923, Eiseman stated to another subscriber, who had been referred to Eiseman by Whelan, that the tire company had about $1,000,000 worth of business, of which about 60 per cent. had been available to the finance company since its organization out of which the finance company had already made a net profit of about $80,000.

On March 23, 1923, the finance company passed a resolution declaring a "dividend" payable April 1, 1923. On April 2, 1923, under authority granted by the Corporate Securities Act, the corporation commissioner issued a subpœna directed to Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company, Alexander & Co., Bankers' Securities Company, and Coast Syndicate Company to appear on April 12, 1923, and report as to the securities issued and sold by Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company. Up to that time said companies had done no business whatever except to sell stock and debentures, but after the service of said subpœna there was a manifestation of business activity. On April 10, 1923, an account was opened in the Bank of California in the name of the California Mortgage & Discount Company, and certain securities which had been theretofore received from purchasers of stock were placed in the bank for sale and to the credit of that account. On that same date two checks for $2,500 each were drawn against the account payable to the account of the tire company, and on April 30 another check was drawn for $5,000 payable to the same company. The purpose of these payments was not disclosed by the evidence, but if made as loans no trade acceptances, notes or other securities were ever received by said company as security nor did the tire company ever acknowledge receipt of the amounts of said checks. The evidence shows that after the service of said subpœna changes were made in the Abrams' records, carried under the name of Bankers' Securities Company, so as to make the entries agree with the theory of a sale by said finance company of its stock and securities to Eiseman and a resale by Eiseman to Abrams. Orders were also issued to the escrow depositary in San Francisco to deliver shares of stock and debentures to purchasers whose subscriptions had been paid up, although evidence of the payment of cash or its equivalent for these purchases never reached said escrow depositary.

Responding to said subpœna a verified return accompanied by a so-called "consolidated balance sheet" prepared by the finance company and its subsidiary company was filed by Abrams containing erroneous statements of operations and misrepresentations of the assets of said subsidiary company. There was also prepared and filed with said commissioner an application for a permit to issue and sell the securities of the finance company.

On May 25, 1923, the records of Eiseman and Abrams and of the finance company and its subsidiary, in San Francisco, were seized and their offices closed by the district attorney acting under the authority of search warrants. It appears from the records thus seized that during the operation of these enterprises there had been sold to purchasers 1,439 units of the finance company's securities aggregating a sale price of $431,700, of which amount $139,163.41 was accepted in unsecured purchase notes, $119,315 in tire stock at par, and the balance was in cash and securities other than the notes and tire stock already mentioned. The total amount of all cash received as initial cash payments and from the sale of convertible securities was $148,035.83. In addition the receipts from sales of class B stock made up of cash, purchase notes, tire stock, and other securities amounted to $120,427, of which amount there was in cash and convertible securities $48,402.

In the meantime, and after the service of said subpœna, the subsidiary company issued a check for $2,000 payable to Ives, with no explanation being made therefor; Eiseman sold to said company an unsecured note given by one Peasley, a purchaser of Class B stock; large sums of cash received from purchasers were transferred from the account of Bankers' Security Company to the personal account of Eiseman in another bank; other remittances were made to Ives by Eiseman with explanatory letters to the effect that the same constituted Ives' share of cash received from the purchases of class A stock and debentures; Eiseman, through Abrams, caused the assignment or transfer of various mortgages and other securities received as portions of the purchase price of Class A stock and debentures to be made to Eiseman's mother-in-law under the names of Mrs. James Burns and Mrs. Elizabeth Burns, and to his wife under her maiden name, Joyce Ivy Burns. So that as a result of these numerous payments and transfers there was left on hand at the time of the seizure under the search warrants the sum of $97.28 in cash, various delinquent and overdue mortgage notes and shares of stock of no marketable value, and a number of untransferred certificates representing shares of stock of the tire company which had been received from purchasers. The evidence further shows that no trade acceptances were ever received by either of the Delaware companies from the tire company; no loans were ever made to the tire company other than the sum of $10,000 represented by the checks already mentioned which were issued after the service of said subpœna; and no promissory notes or other evidence of the indebtedness were ever assigned or transferred to said Delaware companies by the tire company; and, furthermore, no record could be found of any transfer by either Eiseman or Abrams to either of the Delaware companies of any purchasers' notes or shares of tire stock turned in by them in payment of Delaware securities.

One of appellants' principal contentions is that the plan adopted and executed by them in the organization of Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company and the subsequent sale of its stock and securities in this state, as such plan was established by the uncontroverted evidence adduced by the prosecution, did not constitute a violation of the Corporate Securities Act, and that therefore they are not guilty of the crimes of which they were convicted. This contention is based mainly upon the theory of a valid sale to Eiseman in the state of Delaware of the securities mentioned in the Eiseman agreement, to which the charges in the indictment exclusively relate. Appellants claim that as a result of corporate action taken in that state Eiseman acquired title therein to said securities, and that consequently a resale of the same in this state in repeated and successive transactions by brokers duly licensed by the corporation commissioner was permissible under subdivision A of section 2, par. 9 of said act (as amended by St. 1923, p. 87, § 1). In behalf of Ives and Whelan it is asserted, in effect, regarding the Class B stock, the title to which stands substantially upon the same ground as the securities covered by the Eiseman agreement, that the motive underlying the transfer of securities in a foreign state may not be inquired into in this state; that even though the acts resulting in the transfers be "tinctured with a malign purpose, yet, having been done outside the state of California, and beyond its jurisdiction, the legal effects would be the same." In furtherance of their theory of a valid sale to Eiseman in Deleware, appellants, at the trial, proposed a number of instructions which they claim embodied the law as it is declared in many cases in this state, among them being Hughes Manufacturing & Lumber Co. v. Elliott, 178 Cal. 181, 172 P. 584; Laurence v. Pacific Oil & Lead Works, 27 Cal. App. 69, 148 P. 964; Provident Gold Mining Co. v. Manhattan Securities Co., 168 Cal. 304, 142 P. 884; Lund v. Ganahl, 22 Cal. App. 103, 133 P. 501. The court refused to give these proposed instructions, and in lieu thereof instructed the jury in substance as follows: That no title passed to Eiseman solely by reason of the execution of said agreement; that the recitals contained therein as to payment of the purchase price for said securities were not binding upon the people of the state of California; that the legal effect of said agreement was that title should not pass until there was paid an amount equivalent to the agreed purchase price; that consequently, if the jury found that no payments were made, then title did not pass to Eiseman, but if it was found that some payments were made, title to such portion of said securities as were paid for and no more passed to and vested in him. Appellants claim that the law as thus given to the jury is contrary to the rule adhered to in the cases above mentioned as well as in the cases of Hart-Wood Lumber Co. v. Bonaly, 192 Cal. 180, 219 P. 432, Gopcevic v. California Packing Corp., 64 Cal. App. 132, 220 P. 1078, and Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 212, 18 P. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199; that therefore the giving of those instructions constituted reversible error.

[1] Even though it be assumed that appellants' interpretation of the law of sales of personal property, with special reference to the question of passing title prior to the payment of the purchase price be correct, we are of the opinion that the rule contended for by them may not be invoked in a situation like the one here presented, where the evidence shows the object of the contract was not to provide for a legitimate sale and transfer of title to property, but to all intents and purposes was to create a mere fiction of law, constructed upon a collusive and fraudulent intent and design to violate and defeat the provisions of a penal statute. Under such circumstances we do not believe that such a transaction can be resolved into a legal contractual relationship so as to be controlled by legal rules of ownership applying to legitimate contracts of sale. In all of the cases cited by appellants the contracts considered were founded upon bona fide sales, free from the element of a fraudulent intent to defeat the operation of an existing law, and the controversies were confined to the parties related to the contracts. Here the evidence shows that the purported sale of these securities was in effect one from Eiseman to himself, based upon no consideration whatever, and manifestly the product of a criminal design. When such a contract is presented for recognition in this state, as being legally sufficient to place the parties claiming under it beyond the scope of the law of this state, the state itself becomes an interested party to the contract to the extent at least of having the right to inquire into the bone fides of the transactions upon which the contract is founded. Fraud vitiates all transactions into which it enters (12 Cal. Jur. 721), and in view of the evidence disclosed by the record upon this subject it would scarcely be contended, we think, that in an appropriate proceeding instituted by an interested party the purported contract of sale in question would not be declared void. We believe, therefore, that by reason of the circumstances surrounding the purpose of this contract appellants may not shield themselves behind a salutary legal principle which ordinarily would be applicable to the case of a genuine sale. In the case of People v. McCalla, 63 Cal. App. 783, 220 P. 436, the defendant was found guilty of a violation of the Corporate Securities Act in that he sold without permit securities issued under a subterfuge, and it was said:

> "The case falls within the letter and the spirit of the act, and it would be a reproach to the administration of the law if the perpetrators of such a thinly veiled attempt to circumvent the manifest purpose of this salutary legislation should go unwhipped of justice."

The language quoted does not seem inappropriate here. True, the jury was instructed that fraud was not an issue in the case, but this instruction, as appears from the context, was manifestly given for the sole purpose of preventing the jury from becoming confused with the idea that the prosecution was being had under subdivision 4 of section 182 of the Penal Code instead of subdivision 1 of said section, and had no reference to that part of the indictment charging that appellants did "falsely, fraudulently, and corruptly and feloniously * * * conspire" to violate the Corporate Securities Act. (Italics ours.) If it be a fact, as appellants contend, that 208 units of said securities were actually delivered to Eiseman in Delaware, the status of the transaction is not altered, if for no other reason than that several hundred thousand units were brought into the state, and 1,439 of them were actually sold here. In this connection it is to be noted that at no time during the sale of these securities was it intimated that privately owned stock was being disposed of.

[2] The trial court carefully and correctly informed the jury that "evasion of the law in and of itself is not a crime," but further stated that if it was proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the acts and conduct charged in the indictment were true, and "were instituted with intent of evading the law of California, and by such evasion to violate the Corporate Securities Act of California" (italics ours), then such acts and conduct were in violation of the penal statute under which appellants were being prosecuted; also that all of the acts proved should be considered by the jury in determining whether or not they constituted an entire or part of a scheme, system, plan, or design by which the Corporate Securities Act "was to be evaded and violated" (italics ours), and that if the jury entertained any reasonable doubt as to the existence of any of the essential facts or features of the crime of conspiracy as they had been enumerated by the court, a verdict of guilty should not be found against any defendant as to whom such doubt existed. The instructions given upon the question of passing of title, which appellants assail, may be readily reconciled with the theory that if the jury found as a fact that the payments were made by Eiseman as recited or called for in the agreement, such fact might be taken as proof of the good faith of the transactions, in which event, as already pointed out, the chief element of the offense with which appellants were charged, namely, a fraudulent design to violate the statute, would doubtless be effectively destroyed.

The recent case of People v. Pace (Cal. App.) 238 P. 1089, cited by appellants, does not aid them. There the defendant, president of a California corporation actually engaged in the candy business, made a bona fide purchase from the corporation for a cash consideration of a certain unpaid promissory notes given to the company in payment of the purchase of stock, the stock for which the notes were given being held by the company as collateral for the payment of said notes. In accordance with the terms of the notes and upon default in the payment thereof the defendant dealt with the stock as though it were his own, disposing of at least a portion of it in different sales extending over a period of five months, without having a permit for that purpose. Briefly stated, the court held that to the extent that section 2, subd. 9, of the Corporate Securities Act attempted to require a natural person to secure a broker's permit before he may sell his own securities, when he is not the issuer or underwriter of the same, it was unconstitutional. It is at once apparent that that case, being free from the element of fraud, is clearly distinguishable from the instant one upon the facts.

[3] After giving full consideration to all contentions made by appellants regarding this branch of the case, we conclude that the evidence is sufficient to establish the offenses of which appellants were convicted.

[4] Appellants also rely for reversal upon a number of alleged errors of law which they claim occurred during trial. Being too numerous to deal with singly, it may be stated that they relate generally to rulings upon the admissibility of proof and to the giving and refusal to give certain instructions. The evidence objected to consisted mostly of statements made by the different appellants out of the presence of each other, representations made by appellants' agents to the purchasers in selling said securities, written communications and other documents sent out by the different appellants and by members of their respective office staffs in the negotiation and consummation of sales, and particularly evidence of the transactions had between Abrams' Bankers Security Company through which the sales passed and the purchasers.

After examining the record regarding these points we are satisfied that the evidence alluded to reasonably tended to connect the different appellants with the conspiracy, or else amounted to statements, acts, declarations, or correspondence of appellants or of their agents and employees, during the progress of the conspiracy and in aid of the common design and purpose thereof, and that the same were admitted in evidence after a foundation had first been laid by proof tending to establish the fact of such conspiracy. Such acts, statements, declarations, and correspondence were therefore properly admitted as evidence against each member of the confederacy. People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 427, 165 P. 555; People v. Creeks, 170 Cal. 368, 149 P. 821; People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 P. 861; People v. Vacarella, 61 Cal. App. 119, 214 P. 237; People v. Mazzurco, 49 Cal. App. 275, 193 P. 164; People v. MacPhee, 26 Cal. App. 218, 146 P. 522; 16 Cor. Jur. 654.

[5 8] We furthermore believe that all of the letters, circulars, checks, and other documents objected to were sufficiently identified and connected with appellants or with the conspiracy to justify their admission in evidence. The anonymous letter containing a warning to one of the purchasers to withdraw from the enterprise was expressly referred to in one of Eiseman's letters and therefore was admissible in evidence; and in any event its contents were not harmful. The evidence of the transfer of proceeds from the sale of securities to the accounts of Eiseman and to Ives, and the letters and documents incidental to these transfers, had a direct bearing upon the furtherance of the conspiracy as it was originally planned by Eiseman. Appellants strenuously urge and have extensively argued the point that the books, papers, and files seized under the search warrants were inadmissible in evidence because, as they claim, the proceedings and documents upon which the seizure was grounded were void. But assuming that the search warrants were defective, the contention that the evidence seized thereunder was inadmissible is completely answered by an adverse ruling in the case of People v. Mayen, 188 Cal. 237, 205 P. 435, 24 A. L. R. 1383. The fact that Eiseman was a licensed attorney at law of this state and that upon the door of his offices appeared the wording, "Law Offices of J. J. Eiseman," did not disqualify Miss Colt from testifying as to the identity and authenticity of correspondence, documents, and papers issued by and belonging to the files of Bankers' Mortgage & Discount Company (subdivision 2, § 1881, Code Civ. Proc.), for the reason that her duties were that of clerk, bookkeeper, and cashier for the company mentioned, and none of the knowledge regarding which she testified was acquired by or imparted to her in the capacity of a clerk, secretary, or stenographer of an attorney at law; moreover, there is no claim made that the business enterprises forming the basis of these charges were promoted by Eiseman as an attorney at law.

[9, 10] The question of the character of the so-called certificates issued and given in payment for Class B stock is not a material matter, because the charges in the indictment related to the securities covered by Eiseman agreement; but, even if material, said certificates must be construed as "securities" of said company within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act. People v. McCalla, supra. The other errors urged in reference to the admissibility of proof are either unimportant or insufficiently presented (People v. McLean, 135 Cal. 306, 67 P. 770), and hence do not require discussion.

[11, 12] As to the instructions, we have examined the entire charge of the court and also the instructions proposed by appellants which the court refused to give. From such examination we believe that when the court's charge is considered as a whole the jury was fairly and fully instructed upon all legal subjects pertaining to the offenses for which appellants were on trial, and also upon such legal matters as were necessary for the guidance of the jury in the exercise of its duties and prerogatives. Besides the matters already alluded to, the court's charge included instructions as to all material provisions of the Corporate Securities Act, the law of conspiracy, the question of intent, the right of parties in this state to incorporate and transfer securities outside of this state, and law bearing upon the territorial limitations of the California statutes; also the doctrine of reasonable doubt, burden of proof, and the benefit of legal presumptions. Many of appellants' proposed instructions which the court refused to give contained legal principles which were substantially embodied in the court's charge; others were offered in support of appellants' theory of a valid sale to Eiseman in Deleware; and the remaining ones related to matters which were immaterial to the issues, or contained some asserted principle of law which justified the refusal of the entire instruction. It was clearly within the province of the court to instruct as to the legal effect of the purported contract of sale, leaving to the jury for decision the disputed question of fact as to whether or not there was a bona fide sale.

[13, 14] Only a few of appellants' objections regarding instructions require special attention. They complain that in dealing with the subject of conspiracy the court in one part of its charge, upon the element of intent, instructed the jury that the question for it to pass upon was whether appellants "conspired to do the things which were in violation of law, not whether they had any knowledge that they were violating the law." The legal principle thus stated was doubtless applicable to the charges of actual sales of securities. People v. McCalla, supra. If, however, as appellants contend, it be open to criticism when connected with the law of conspiracy, we do not believe the jury could have been misled by the instruction for the reason that the court as a part of the same instruction also stated to the jury explicitly that mere association of individuals with an innocent purpose or with honest intent is not a conspiracy as defined by law; also, that in determining the guilt of appellants upon the conspiracy charge the jury should consider whether appellants "honestly entertained a belief that they were not committing a wrongful act," and whether or not they "were acting under a misconception or in ignorance, without any criminal motive"; the court further stating, "Joint evil intent is necessary to constitute the offense, and you are therefore instructed that it is your duty to consider and to determine the good faith of the defendants and each of them." Considering the instruction as a whole, we think the jury could not have misunderstood the court's meaning that a corrupt motive was an essential element of the crime of conspiracy. Wharton's Criminal Law (11th Ed.) § 1606.

[15, 16] The court was justified in refusing to give appellants' proposed instructions emphasizing Bronson's testimony as to the legal advice furnished appellants, and other like ones wherein different circumstances from which the question of intent was to be determined were narrated and dealt with in separate instructions, for the reason that a general instruction was given to the effect that in considering the question of intent the jury should "take into consideration all of the facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence." The proposed instruction relating to "common occurrences" of organizing corporations outside of the state to evade the California statute was properly rejected as embodying an immaterial matter; likewise those instructions relating to the title to the Class B stock. The remaining objections as to the instructions are of less importance and possess no merit.

[17] We find no error in the ruling disallowing a challenge for cause to juror Scovel. The juror stated that, while he entertained an opinion regarding violations of the Corporate Securities Act, the same as he did of violations of other penal statutes, he had no opinion regarding the facts of this particular case. While later during his examination there may have been some slight confusions in his answers upon the point, he positively declared that if accepted as a juror he could and would "absolutely set aside that opinion," which had been founded on press reports and rumor, and try the case fairly and impartially. "When such conflict occurs (in the answers of the juror) the trial court must decide, if possible, which of the answers most truly reveals the state of the talesman's mind. In other words, the questions generally presented are those of fact and not of law. People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 P. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193.

[18] Proof in support of venue as to counts 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, while not as substantial as it might have been, was legally sufficient to meet the requirements of the rule stated in People v. McGregar, 88 Cal. 140, 26 P. 97, the respective purchasers having testified that the sales took place at their residences or places of business, as the case happened to be, which were designated in the record by street and number; and, furthermore, the data set forth on the cards seized in the office of said finance company relating to these sales specified the San Francisco residences or business addresses of the purchasers.

[19] The demurrer to the indictment was properly overruled. It was alleged in the indictment that the securities mentioned were issued by a purported foreign corporation and were brought into this state by Eiseman and Abrams as the property of said corporation and sold by all of the appellants without a permit. It was not necessary, as appellants contend, to set forth the capacity in which Eiseman and Abrams acted for the corporation in bringing said securities into the state, or whether they acted for it at all, nor does there seem to be anything anomalous or inconsistent in the situation that said corporation retained title to said securities, notwithstanding that it had "issued" the same and that they were in the constructive possession, at least, of Eiseman and Abrams when brought into the state for disposal. The indictment was not subject to the objections raised and favorably ruled upon in People v. Barnard, 63 Cal. App. 562, 219 P. 756, for the reason that the conspiracy here was confined to the violation of the Corporate Securities Act.

[20] Appellants claim that there is no such crime in California as conspiracy to violate the Corporate Securities Act. Since the instant case was briefed and submitted, however, this precise question has been considered and the matter decided contrary to appellants' views by the Supreme Court in the case of Doble v. Superior Court, 241 P. 852. The decision therein completely answers all of appellants' contentions made in this behalf.

[21-24] Appellants also attack the constitutionality of the entire Corporate Securities Act upon some eight grounds, but in presenting them counsel say that the objections urged overlap one another, making it impossible to consider them separately. For the same reason it would seem equally impossible to discuss or decide them separately. However, specifically answering some of the grounds urged, it may be stated that section 12, which declares that all securities sold in violation of said act shall be void, is nowise involved in this criminal action. The assertion that said act illegally delegates judicial functions (as distinguished from quasi judicial functions) and also legislative powers to the corporation commissioner appears to be amply disposed of by the cases of Doble Steam Motors Corp. v. Daugherty, 195 Cal. 158, 232 P. 140; Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 247, 187 P. 965; and Brecheen v. Riley, 187 Cal. 121, 200 P. 1042. Summarizing the remaining constitutional objections, they are in effect that the provisions of said act do not constitute a valid exercise of the police power of the state, and that the same are unreasonable, arbitrary, oppressive, discriminatory, and in restraint of trade. Again, we are relieved of the task of answering appellants' arguments by citing a number of cases in which similar questions have been exhaustively argued and finally decided. The cases referred to are Halsey & Co. v. Merrick (D. C.) 228 F. 805; Merrick v. N. W. Halsey & Co., 242 U. S. 568, 37 S. Ct. 227, 61 L. Ed. 498; Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 37 S. Ct. 217, 61 L. Ed. 480, L. R. A. 1917F, 514, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643; Caldwell v. Sioux Falls Stockyards Co., 242 U. S. 559, 37 S. Ct. 224, 61 L. Ed. 493; Agnew v. Daugherty, 189 Cal. 446, 209 P. 34; and In re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593. In passing upon these constitutional objections generally the court said in Merrick v. N. W. Halsey Co., supra:

> "We think the statute under review is within the power of the state. It burdens honest business, it is true, but burdens it only that under its forms dishonest business may not be done. This manifestly cannot be accomplished by mere declaration; there must be conditions imposed and provision made for their performance. Expense may thereby be caused and inconvenience, but to arrest the power of the state by such considerations would make it impotent to discharge its functions."

In conformity with the law as announced in the cases cited it must be held here that the act in question is not unconstitutional.

[25] The crime of conspiracy is a distinct offense from the actual commission of the crime forming the object of the conspiracy, and the fact that the parties to the conspiracy succeeded in perpetrating the acts which of themselves constituted the crime they conspired to commit in no wise relieves them from liability under section 182 of the Penal Code. People v. MacPhee, supra. It follows that the guilty parties may be legally convicted of both crimes.

[26] We cannot agree with appellants that there was a hiatus in the operation of paragraph 3 of section 2 of said act at the time of its repeal in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 87), during which time this indictment was found, for the reason that the existing law remained in force until the amendment took effect.

[27] The claims of Eiseman and Abrams that they were entitled to immunity because they gave evidence before the corporation commissioner on April 12, 1923, are without merit. Section 17 of the Corporate Securities Act (as amended by St. 1923, p. 91, § 4), provides in part that:

> "No person shall be excused from testifying or from producing any book, document, or other thing * * * upon the ground that his testimony, or the book, document, or other thing required of him, may tend to incriminate him, or may have a tendency to subject him to punishment for a felony; * * * but no person shall be prosecuted, * * * or subjected to any penalty * * * for or on account of any act, transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he shall have been so compelled to testify under oath, or to produce such documentary or other evidence. * * *" (Italics ours.)

It is apparent, we think, that the law contemplates that the witness claim the privilege of not giving testimony or of not furnishing evidence against himself before he is entitled to the immunity provided for by the statute. It is conceded that such claim was not made by either Eiseman or Abrams; furthermore, the subpœna was not directed personally to either of them, but to the corporations. Their responses to the subpœna must consequently be considered as having been voluntary.

After a full review of the evidence in this case and a careful examination of the legal points presented, it is our opinion that the appellants were fairly tried and justly convicted. It is therefore ordered that the judgments of conviction and the orders denying their motions for new trials, which were also appealed from, be and each of them is affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; CASHIN, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by James E. Chalmers and wife against Lee B. Hawkins and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank S. Forbes and Harry J. McClean, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An action to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by Ora G. Chalmers, in which her husband, James E. Chalmers, has joined as a party plaintiff. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs, upon which judgment was entered, and defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied. An appeal from the judgment was taken by the latter and is presented on the judgment roll with a bill of exceptions.

Defendants urge as grounds for reversal an alleged insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, errors in the admission and in the denial of motions to strike out portions of the testimony, together with the giving and refusal of certain instructions.

The evidence shows that Mrs. Chalmers (who will be hereinafter referred to as the plaintiff) on the evening of September 4, 1920, became a passenger on a motor bus running from Long Beach to Whittier, her destination being the town of Hynes near which she resided. The point nearest to her destination on the route followed by the bus was the intersection of two highways known as Artesia and Ocean avenues, approximately one-half mile south of Hynes, to which the latter avenue leads. The bus proceeded north on Ocean avenue, reaching the intersection at the hour of 10 p. m., its route being thence west on Artesia avenue. The plaintiff, according to her testimony, alighted at the intersection, walked therefrom north on Ocean avenue, keeping a distance of approximately 2 feet to the right of the paved portion thereof, to a point between 350 and 400 feet from Artesia avenue, where the injuries in question were received. Plaintiff was found between 10:30 and 11 o'clock on the same evening lying unconscious at the point last mentioned. Her body was about 4 feet to the east of the paved portion of the avenue, her clothing being partially torn therefrom, and portions of her clothing and articles carried by her were found to the north and south of this point. According to the testimony, an indentation in the roadway along the east side of the pavement led from a point 70 feet south to the place where she was found and thence northwesterly 10 feet to the edge of the pavement. This indentation, as described by the witnesses, corresponded to the track of an auto truck equipped with double tires on the rear wheels, such being the equipment of a truck owned by the defendant Lee B. Hawkins as described by him at the trial. It was further shown that subsequent to the accident on that evening and the following morning there were found near and along the indentation mentioned drippings of beet pulp, from the location, appearance, and quantity of which, as described by the witnesses, it might reasonably be inferred that the indentations were made by a vehicle transporting that substance.

Plaintiff was unable to state how the accident occurred, testifying that she neither saw nor heard the approach of a vehicle, and that her first knowledge of the fact of her injuries was received upon regaining consciousness at the hospital to which she was taken. So far as shown by the testimony, no one saw the occurrence which caused her injuries. The evidence further shows that the night was dark and that there were no lights along Ocean avenue either at or near the scene of the accident.

Defendant Lee B. Hawkins, by whom defendant Frank Hawkins was employed as a driver, was at and prior to the time of the accident following the business of trucking, with his office at the town of Moneta, some miles west of Ocean avenue, using in such calling several Mack trucks. Early in the evening mentioned the driver, Hawkins, with two other employees, were sent by their employer to a point near the town of Artesia, situated to the west of Ocean avenue, for the purpose of unloading a trailer which on that day while conveying a load of beet pulp to the employer's premises had broken down. The employees mentioned, after removing the beet pulp to the Mack truck, commenced the return trip between 10 and 10:30 o'clock p. m., passed along Artesia avenue to the intersection mentioned, and thence north over Ocean avenue. Several persons who occupied the motorbus on which plaintiff was a passenger testified to meeting a Mack truck shortly after the plaintiff alighted from the bus at a point on Artesia avenue west of the intersection, that the seat of the truck was occupied by three persons, and that the truck carried no lights. A witness, who conducted an oil station on Ocean avenue between the town of Hynes and the intersection mentioned, and his wife, testified to the fact that a Mack truck passed the station between 10:15 and 10:45 o'clock p. m., traveling north at a speed between 18 and 30 miles per hour, and that no lights were seen by them thereon. Two witnesses who passed south on the same avenue at about the same time met a truck at a point between 200 and 500 feet north of the intersection. According to their testimony there were no lights thereon. The truck, as described by these witnesses, was of the size and shape of a Mack truck, and its position when seen was partially off the paved portion of the highway to the east. The employees mentioned testified that the lights on their truck were burning, but that the lens of one of the lamps was broken, over which, in order to prevent the Presto-light flame from being extinguished by the breeze, a cloth was held by one of them during the return trip. Each of these employees denied that he saw or that the truck struck the plaintiff, or that he had knowledge of the accident on the evening that it occurred. Plaintiff on that evening wore a garment described by her as a mink fur cape, and witnesses who subsequently examined a Mack truck owned by defendant Lee B. Hawkins at his place of business testified that they found adhering to a metal part projecting from under the body of the truck on the right-hand side thereof certain hair or fur, which was produced at the trial. A furrier testified that the cape worn by plaintiff, which was in evidence at the trial, and the fur found by the witnesses mentioned, were both from the animal known as the kolinsky, a species of mink.

The foregoing is a statement in substance of the evidence which bears materially on the question of the cause of plaintiff's injuries, and an examination of the record discloses no prejudicial error in any of the particulars specified by defendants (exceptions 1 to 55, inclusive), either in its admission, the rulings sustaining objections to questions propounded by the latter, or their motions to strike portions of the testimony.

[1] It is urged by defendants that the finding that plaintiff was struck and injured by the auto truck operated by defendants, being a conclusion based upon evidence which was largely circumstantial, the facts relied upon for its support must be such that the finding is the only conclusion that can fairly or reasonably be drawn therefrom, citing in support of this contention Wilbur v. Emergency Hospital Ass'n, 27 Cal. App. 751, 151 P. 155, wherein the court, citing Neal v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 129 Iowa, 5, 105 N. W. 197, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 905, and other cases relied upon by defendants here, held that a theory cannot be said to be established by circumstantial evidence even in a civil action unless the facts relied upon are of such nature and so related to each other that it is the only conclusion that can fairly or reasonably be drawn from them. The same rule is declared in Estate of Wallace, 64 Cal. App. 107, 220 P. 682, with reference to which the Supreme Court, in denying a rehearing, said: "We do not wish to be understood as approving the statement of the rule by the District Court of Appeal as to the method of weighing circumstantial evidence when applied to a reviewing court on appeal." The correct "rule is stated and applied in the recent cases of Estate of Loucks, 160 Cal. 551, 554, 555, 117 P. 673, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 868, People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 184 P. 389, and Mah See v. North

In People v. Tom Woo et al., supra, an appeal from a judgment following conviction on a charge of murder, the evidence connecting appellants with the homicide being circumstantial, and it being contended that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict, the court said, in affirming the judgment:

> "The principal question on this appeal is whether the evidence is sufficient to justify the verdict against the appellants. * * * In passing upon this question we will not attempt to determine the weight of the evidence, but will decide only whether upon the face of the evidence it can be held that sufficient facts could not have been found by the jury to warrant the inference of guilt. For it is the function of the jury in the first instance, and of the trial court after the verdict, to determine what facts are established by the evidence, and before the verdict of the jury, which has been approved by the trial court, can be set aside on appeal upon the ground we are discussing it must be made clearly to appear that upon no hypothesis whatever is there sufficient substantial evidence to support the conclusion reached in the court below."

As the rule is stated in other jurisdictions, circumstantial evidence in civil cases, in order to be sufficient to sustain the verdict, need not rise to that degree of certainty which will exclude every reasonable conclusion other than that arrived at by the jury. Midland Valley Ry. Co. v. Taylor, 85 Okl. 95, 204 P. 1102; Meier v. N. P. Ry. Co., 51 Or. 69, 93 P. 691; Pittsburg C. C. & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Hoffman, 57 Ind. App. 431, 107 N. E. 315, 321; Hashman v. Wyandotte Gas Co., 83 Kan. 328, 111 P. 468; Lane v. So. Kan. Mut. Ins. Co., 113 Kan. 365, 214 P. 92; Farber v. Boston Ins. Co. (Mo. App.) 256 S. W. 1079; St. Louis B. & M. Ry. Co. v. Moss (Tex. Civ. App.) 203 S. W. 777.

[2] The facts shown by the testimony fairly sustain the implied finding that plaintiff was struck and injured by the truck operated by defendants; and while, as contended by them, the evidence does not exclude every supposition to the contrary, this conclusion and no other finds reasonable support from the known circumstances. It sufficiently appears from the evidence that plaintiff at the time of the accident was walking on the right or east side and off the paved portion of the highway; that she saw no lights and was unaware of the approach of the truck, of which no warning was given. It also appears that the truck was seen on Artesia avenue without lights at a point the distance from which to the place of the accident at the rate of speed maintained by the truck, as testified by the driver, would be covered within a few minutes; and, further, that a Mack truck without lights passed north along Ocean avenue between 10:15 and 10:45 o'clock p. m. of the same evening.

[3, 4] Section 13 of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 397), as amended in 1919 (St. 1919, p. 191), provided that:

> "Where there is not sufficient light within the lateral boundaries of the public highway to reveal all persons, vehicles or other substantial objects within said boundaries for a distance of at least 200 feet, at all times during the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, every automobile while on the public highway shall carry at the front at least two lighted lamps."

The evidence sustains the conclusion of the jury that the truck was negligently operated in that no lights were carried thereon as required by the statute, and that such negligence proximately caused the injury. Hutchinson v. Miller & Lux, 60 Cal. App. 1, 212 P. 394; Fenn v. Clark, 11 Cal. App. 79, 103 P. 944; Western Indemnity Co. v. Wasco Land & Stock Co., 51 Cal. App. 672, 197 P. 390.

[5-7] Defendants as a special defense alleged contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff. While it is the duty of pedestrians to use reasonable care for their own safety, it is the settled law that they have the right to travel upon the public highway, and it is not negligence for them to do so. The burden of proving a want of ordinary care proximately contributing to the injury rests upon the defendant, and must be affirmatively established unless it be shown or can be inferred from the evidence adduced in support of plaintiff's case. Rush v. Lagomarsino (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 1066; Hatzakorzian v. Rucker-Fuller Desk Co. (Cal. Sup.) 239 P. 709, 41 A. L. R. 1027. Here no evidence direct or circumstantial, which reasonably tends to support this defense, appears from the record.

[8] Defendants except to the following instruction given by the court at the request of the plaintiff:

> "It is peculiarly appropriate that such a question shall be left to the judgment of a jury, who are presumably people of ordinary intelligence, and who under ordinary conditions would presumably exercise ordinary care. In considering the evidence, assuming each member of the jury to be such a person, and not unusually cautious or unusually reckless, he may well ask himself, what would I have done under such circumstances? So it would be well for you first to consider yourself in the place of the plaintiff, and consider what you would have done under the circumstances under which she was placed, and whether she acted as a reasonable person would under the circumstances. Then you should put yourselves in the place of the defendant driver, and determine whether, if you had been in his place, you would have acted as he did, or whether he acted as a reasonably prudent person would have acted under the circumstances."

The reference to plaintiff contained in this instruction can give defendants no ground for complaint. As stated, no evidence was adduced from which the jury might reasonably have concluded that plaintiff was guilty of negligence which contributed to her injuries; but the question remains whether the instruction as applied to the defendants was erroneous, and, if so, prejudicial. A like instruction was disapproved in Freeman v. Adams, 63 Cal App. 225, 218 P. 600. In the later case of Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System (Cal. Sup.) 242 P. 76, the court, in considering an instruction similar in form and substance, said:

> "It is difficult to understand how jurors, if not men of reasonable understanding, would be able to determine whether others whose conduct is under investigation acted in a reasonable manner."

[9] The jury represent the ideal prudent man whose assumed course of conduct under given circumstances constitutes ordinary care, and whether such care was used in view of the facts of a particular case—the question having been submitted to a jury—is necessarily determined by the sense and experience of the individual jurors collectively expressed in the verdict. That jurors selected as provided by law, whose functions are equal in importance to those of the officer presiding at the trial, are persons of ordinary intelligence is legally not open to question; and an instruction which assumes the fact and indicates their proper mental attitude in respect to the evidence, with the logical method to be pursued in their deliberations, while unnecessary, cannot reasonably be said to have been prejudicial.

[10, 11] The court further instructed that:

> "It is negligence for the driver of a motor vehicle to continue his onward course when he is unable to see the road over which he is driving."

In view of the evidence tending to show that the lamps of the truck were unlighted, this instruction was not improper. If the jury so found it was negligence per se for the driver to proceed on his course without lights. Hutchinson v. Miller & Lux, supra; Fenn v. Clark, supra.

[12] Defendants complain of other instructions, none of which in our opinion was objectionable with the exception of instruction 32, which was as follows:

> "If you find from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff was walking down the highway, and that the defendant ran into and upon and struck the plaintiff, causing the injuries complained of, without seeing the plaintiff when an ordinarily prudent person would have seen her, or, seeing her, failed to stop his truck to avoid injuring the said plaintiff, and if such acts of the defendant contributed proximately to causing the injury complained of, and she was not guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the injury in any manner, then your verdict must be for the plaintiff."

[13, 14] As contended by defendants, if the driver saw the plaintiff it became his duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid injuring her, and the instruction directing a verdict for plaintiff if defendant, "seeing her, failed to stop his truck," was to that extent erroneous. The driver and those accompanying him denied that the plaintiff was seen by them at any time or was injured by the truck. In view of their testimony and the fact that no evidence was adduced from which it might be inferred that the plaintiff was seen by them, the instruction, while erroneous, cannot reasonably be said to have been prejudicial to an extent warranting a reversal. Prejudice from error is no longer presumed (People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 P. 1042; Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 554, 147 P. 238), and the fact that the reviewing court cannot say that such was not its effect is insufficient. The injury must appear affirmatively from an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, or from the nature of the error itself. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., supra; People v. Mazzurco, 49 Cal. App. 275, 280, 193 P. 164; People v. Chapman, 55 Cal. App. 192, 201, 203 P. 126.

After such examination it is our conclusion that the findings of the jury are supported by the evidence, and that no error is shown by the record which was prejudicial to a degree justifying the opinion that such error resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte ANGELLO. (Cr. 1289.)

Habeas corpus 🔑85(1).

Evidence at preliminary examination in prosecution for felony embezzlement held sufficient to warrant holding defendant to answer, and to warrant denial of his application for habeas corpus.

Application for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to Sheriff of Alameda County, to secure release of B. Angello from custody on charge of felony embezzlement. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

Joseph P. Lacey, of Oakland, and T. C. West, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Earle Warren, Dist. Atty., and J. F. Coakley and Edwin A. Heafey, Deputy Dist. Attys., all of Oakland, Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Habeas corpus. The petition alleges that defendant is unlawfully detained of his liberty by the sheriff of Alameda county. It recites that on about August 15, 1924, a complaint was filed in the justice's court of the city of Oakland, accusing petitioner of the crime of felony embezzlement.

That thereafter a preliminary examination was had upon said charge and accused was held to answer before the superior court. Petitioner here claims that there was no evidence produced at the preliminary examination warranting the justice in holding him to answer, but, on the contrary, that the evidence had upon the hearing entirely failed to show the commission of the crime charged, or any crime. He further claims that the complaint was based upon information and belief and was not issued in accordance with the provisions of sections 811, 812, and 813 of the Penal Code, and that therefore said court had no jurisdiction to proceed in the preliminary examination of defendant on the charge.

There is no merit in petitioner's first contention. Petitioner has failed to file any points and authorities in support of these contentions as required by the rule of this court. An examination of the record, however, shows that there was evidence to the effect that defendant leased certain household furniture of the value of approximately $1,000 from the Gilchrist Furniture Company, and that upon acquiring possession thereof he shortly thereafter moved the same without the state. Equally without merit is the claim that the complaint was based upon information and belief. It directly charged defendant with the commission of the offense, and there was sufficient evidence adduced at the hearing showing knowledge on her part of the offense.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by R. H. Gibson against William Cruickshank, wherein defendant filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for defendant in the main action and on cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Ward Chapman and L. M. Chapman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas T. Porteous, of Riverside, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. It appears from the amended complaint, which was filed by one J. S. Gibson, that a check for $725 was made and delivered on the 25th day of June, 1920, as part payment to plaintiff on account of one Samson sieve-grip tractor, sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant for the agreed price of $1,450. It further appears from the amended complaint that, in addition to the check, the defendant at the same time executed and delivered to plaintiff two promissory notes, also dated June 25, 1920, in favor of the plaintiff, each note in the principal sum of $362.50, with interest, which notes were payable in three months and six months, respectively, after date; that said notes were accepted by plaintiff to cover the balance of said purchase price. It was further alleged that on June 29, 1920, the defendant stopped payment on said check, and has refused to pay the amount therein specified as set forth in said check, or at all, and that the said sum covered by said check remains due, owing and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff. Plaintiff's action is on the check alone, and not on the notes.

By his amended answer to the amended complaint defendant denied the sale or delivery by the plaintiff J. S. Gibson of said tractor, but alleged that on June 25, 1920, he agreed to purchase from one O. C. Hathaway a tractor (giving the same description as in the amended complaint) for the sum of $1,450, "payable $725 on delivery of said tractor, and two notes for $362.50 each, payable three and six months after date, respectively, upon the conditions hereinafter set forth." The amended answer then set forth certain representations and warranties made by Hathaway to defendant, which defendant believed, and, so believing and relying thereon, entered into said contract. The amended answer alleged falsity of the representations, and breaches of warranty; also that defendant stopped payment on said check and gave notice of rescission, etc.

As a separate defense the defendant admitted that he agreed to purchase the tractor from the plaintiff, but alleged that the agreement was made through plaintiff's agent, Hathaway, and upon the like representations and warranties as stated in the first defense, it being now in the second defense alleged that said representations and warranties were made through plaintiff's agent, Hathaway. With his answer the defendant filed a cross-complaint based upon the same transactions hereinabove mentioned, and sought to recover the sum of $160 expended by the defendant in attempting to work and operate the tractor, and also demanded judgment that the check and notes be delivered up to defendant for cancellation, or judgment for the amount thereof in case delivery could not be had. Plaintiff's demurrer to the answer and his demurrer to the cross-complaint being overruled, the plaintiff filed an answer to the cross-complaint, thereby completing the issues on which the case was tried.

Thereafter, it being made to appear that J. S. Gibson had transferred to R. H. Gibson all of J. S. Gibson's rights in and to the plaintiff's cause of action, the present appellant, R. H. Gibson, was substituted as plaintiff. It was after such substitution that the case was tried by the court, and judgment rendered to the effect that plaintiff take nothing, and that the defendant recover from plaintiff possession of said promissory notes, or, in case delivery thereof cannot be made, that defendant recover from plaintiff the sum of $725, with interest, etc. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

In its findings the court found that at the stated time defendant agreed to purchase from J. S. Gibson through O. C. Hathaway, his agent, the described tractor for the agreed price of $1,450, payable $725 upon delivery of the tractor, and the balance by the promissory notes; and that the check and notes were delivered. The court then found as follows:

> "III. That for the purpose of inducing the defendant to enter into said agreement to purchase said tractor, the said J. S. Gibson, by his agent, O. C. Hathaway, represented and warranted to defendant that said tractor could and would haul defendant's grain separator to, upon, and from any field where defendant might desire to take same for the purpose of threshing grain, and would furnish power to operate said separator in threshing grain; that the defendant believed said representations and warranty, and so believing them to be true, and in reliance upon them, agreed to purchase said tractor as aforesaid, and it was agreed by said J. S. Gibson that, if said tractor did not and could not do the work it was represented and warranted it could do, as above set forth, defendant would not have to carry out said agreement of purchase.
> "IV. That said representations and warranty were and are each and all false and untrue; that after the delivery of said tractor to the defendant he made various trials of said tractor in attempting to use the same in hauling his said separator; that in all of said trials said tractor was operated with proper care and skill at all times, but it was not possible to make the same work, or to develop power to haul said separator, and said tractor was not and never was reasonably, or at all, fit for the said purpose of hauling said separator, or of operating the same in threshing grain, and said tractor did not at any time work so as to comply with the warranty or conditions upon which said defendant agreed to buy same.
> "V. That on the 29th day of June, 1920, defendant stopped payment on said check for $725, and it has not been paid, and on or about the 5th day of July, 1920, defendant notified the plaintiff, through his agent O. C. Hathaway, that said tractor could not do the work it was represented it would do, and that it did not meet the conditions upon which it was sold, and that he rescinded said agreement of purchase, and tendered said tractor back to the plaintiff, and demanded of him the return of said promissory notes and check, but to return same plaintiff refused."

[1] Appellant contends that, if the findings be understood as affirming that there was not a completed sale of the tractor, they are contrary to the evidence. The tractor was delivered. The check and the notes contained recitals that they were given by way of "payment" on the tractor; and the findings do indicate a completed sale, down to the point where they say that:

> "It was agreed by said J. S. Gibson that, if said tractor did not and could not do the work it was represented and warranted to do, as above set forth, defendant would not have to carry out said agreement of purchase."

There was no written evidence, other than the check and the notes. Appellant contends that:

> "The admission of parol evidence, tending to establish parol warranties and adding conditions to the written promise to pay, in the form of the check and notes, was reversible error."

But if we accept appellant's theory, which appears to be correct, that the check and the notes were given and taken in payment of the purchase price, then they were parts, not of the contract, but only of its performance. The contract itself was made altogether by oral statements. Therefore there was no error in receiving testimony concerning those statements.

[2] Now, as to representations made by the seller to induce the buyer to make the agreement of purchase, these were:

> "That said tractor could and would haul defendant's grain separator to, upon, and from any field where defendant might desire to take same for the purpose of threshing grain, and would furnish power to operate said separator in threshing grain."

But these statements, in the circumstances under which they were made, were in the nature of warranties in the contract itself, rather than representations by way of inducement to make the contract, and, since these warranties were in effect warranties of the quality of the article sold, they were warranties which the agent, Hathaway, was authorized to make. "An authority to sell personal property includes authority to warrant the title of the principal and the quality and quantity of the property." Civ. Code, § 2323. Comparing the facts, as shown by the evidence, with the article on warranty (section 1763 et seq.) in the Civil Code, it appears that the transaction carried with it no implied warranty. The defense herein, therefore, must rest on the express terms of the contract as made between Hathaway and the defendant.

[3] On June 25, 1920, at the time when this contract was made, the defendant was engaged in threshing grain for one McMahon on land of McMahon at West Riverside, and was using a Fordson tractor. Defendant desired to obtain a tractor of greater power than the Fordson. On his invitation, Hathaway brought the Samson tractor to the McMahon place. By conversations between defendant and Hathaway it was made clear that the tractor would be used to operate the thresher, and also to haul the thresher to other places where it would be used. The Samson tractor was tested for a short time by using it to complete the McMahon job, and they then attempted to use the Samson tractor to pull the thresher out to the road. This it did not do satisfactorily, but this was attributed to the fact that at that time the "road bands," which were provided for use on the tractor wheels when being used on the highway, had not been removed, so they "hitched on the Fordson" and brought the machinery out to the road. It was there that the sale was closed. According to defendant's testimony, he told Hathaway that he would take the tractor "on condition that it would pull the thresher wherever we wanted to go and operate it." Hathaway replied that "it would pull that any place we wanted to go and thresh." Defendant then said, "On that condition I will pay you for the tractor." Thereupon defendant delivered the check and the two notes.

This brings us to the further question of breach of warranty, or failure of the condition on which the sale was made. Defendant's next threshing job at that time was to be on the property of Scofield, about one mile from the McMahon place. The Samson tractor pulled the thresher over the highway, and 300 or 400 yards along a road leading up to the Scofield place. There the tractor "went dead" on soft ground, and it became necessary to get a team of horses to take the thresher to the Scofield place. On the next day (Sunday) Hathaway's son came out in response to a complaint from the defendant, and they began threshing grain, obtaining their power from the Samson tractor. After about 30 minutes the engine stopped and would not go. They were not able to get it started again that day. The next day (Monday) defendant and his son came, and after some difficulty and delay the machine started, and threshed for about two hours, when it stopped again. The job was finished by using the Fordson tractor. Defendant then started to take the Samson tractor back to Riverside, but when he stopped to put on the road bands he could not get it to start again, and it was left on the roadside until July 4th, an interval of six days. On July 4th defendant "got it started, and got it as far as my place, when it stopped." He was taking the tractor to Hathaway's when it stopped. Hathaway lived about 300 feet beyond defendant's home place. Defendant further testified that on or about July 11th he told Hathaway that the tractor wasn't any good, and would not do the work. Hathaway replied that, "if it wasn't any good, he didn't want me to keep it. * * * He said he would come after it. * * *" Apparently no further effort was made to use the tractor, and in September defendant took it to Hathaway's premises and left it there. On September 17th formal notice of rescission was given.

While the evidence on the point may in some respects be conflicting, it is nevertheless sufficient to sustain the court's finding that, in defendant's trials of said tractor and his attempts to use the same, it was operated by him with proper care and skill, and that the tractor was not reasonably fit for the stated purposes for which it was intended to use it, and did not work "so as to comply with the warranty or conditions upon which said defendant agreed to buy the same," and, since it appears that the warranties were "intended by the parties to operate as a condition" (Civ. Code, § 1786), the buyer was entitled to rescind the executed sale (Pepper v. Vedova, 26 Cal. App. 406, 147 P. 105; Luitweiler, etc., Co. v. Ukiah, etc., Co., 16 Cal. App. 198, 205, 116 P. 707, 712).

[4] Appellant suggests the further point that defendant's right of rescission was waived by lack of diligencce, and by use of the apparatus after knowledge of the alleged defects. We think, however, that the use was not extended beyond the limits of a reasonable test. And in view of the conversation of July 11th, above stated, the delay before attempting to formally complete the act of rescission—a delay of two months—did not necessarily constitute waiver of the right to rescind the sale.

[5] That part of the judgment which allows recovery against appellant of an amount equal to the face value of the notes is without support in the pleadings or findings. So far as appears, these notes (which became due before the cross-complaint was filed) remained in possession of appellant. There is no evidence that respondent will be compelled, or that he can be compelled, to pay them.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified, by striking therefrom the words "and in case a delivery of said property cannot be had that defendant do have and recover of and from the plaintiff, R. H. Gibson, the sum of $725, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 25th day of June, 1920, until paid." As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

LICHTIG & ROTHWELL, Inc., v. HOLUBAR. (Civ. 5572.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—On appeal from verdict for defendant, reviewing court must construe conflicting evidence most favorable to defendant.

On appeal from verdict for defendant, where evidence is conflicting, reviewing court must construe case most favorably to defendant, under rule that, if there is in record competent evidence which might have been believed by trial court, its finding should not be disturbed on appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1010(1)—Finding of trial court, supported by substantial evidence, that broker was not procuring cause of consummation of contract between actress and motion picture corporation, held conclusive on appeal.

In broker's action for commissions for procuring for defendant a professional engagement as an actress with a motion picture corporation, finding of trial court, supported by substantial evidence, held conclusive on appeal that broker was not the procuring cause resulting in consummation of contract between defendant and corporation.

3. Brokers 🔑53—Broker, to recover, must show that his efforts were procuring cause, and not merely one in a chain of causes; "procuring and inducing cause."

For broker to recover, evidence must show that his efforts were procuring cause, and not merely one in a chain of causes; "procuring and inducing cause" meaning originating from a series of events that, without break in their continuity, result in prime object of employment of the agent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Lichtig & Rothwell, Inc., against Dorothy Phillips Holubar and another, in which action was dismissed as to the other defendant on his death. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lloyd Wright and Charles E. Millikan, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bauer, Wright & Macdonald, Alexander MacDonald, and Frederick W. Williamson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff, a California corporation engaged in the business of acting as a broker or agent for actors and others engaged in the business of producing motion pictures, sued the defendant for $2,000 for services alleged to have been rendered in that capacity for the benefit of the defendant Dorothy Holubar, also known as Dorothy Phillips. The other defendant, Allen Holubar, who was sued as the husband of Dorothy Holubar, died during the pendency of the action, and the suit was as to him dismissed. Judgment went against the plaintiff, from which it has appealed on a typewritten record.

The action is based upon the ground that the plaintiff at the special instance and request of the defendant acted as a broker for the defendant in procuring for her a professional engagement as an actress with the Principal Pictures Corporation, a corporation which was engaged in the business of producing motion pictures. The trial court found that the defendant was not indebted to the plaintiff, because she had not employed the plaintiff as her agent to negotiate for the engagement mentioned, that the plaintiff rendered no services in her behalf, and that the plaintiff did not procure for her the engagement in question. The plaintiff's sole attack on this appeal is that these findings of the trial court are not supported by the evidence.

[1] The evidence upon all the issues involved is conflicting, and for that reason we must take the story of the case most favorable to the respondent, upon the well-known rule that, if we find in the record competent evidence, which might have been believed by the trial court, that finding should not be disturbed on appeal. Looking at the record in this light, we find that some time prior to June 14, 1922, the plaintiff was approached by the officials of the Principal Pictures Corporation, a corporation engaged in the production of motion pictures, and which was then contemplating the filming of a picture to be entitled "The World's a Stage," for the purpose of securing a list of actresses available to play the leading part. On June 14, 1922, the plaintiff submitted to Mr. Rosenberg, of the Principal Pictures Corporation, the name of Dorothy Phillips, among others, for that engagement. This was done without the knowledge or consent of Dorothy Phillips, and the suggestion was wholly voluntary on the part of the plaintiff. Mr. Rosenberg chose

Dorothy Phillips' name from the list, and informed the plaintiff that they would be interested in procuring her services, if she would accept employment at a salary of $10,000. On the same day an officer of the appellant met with Dorothy Phillips and her husband, and suggested to them the possibility of this engagement.

The appellant's story of this conversation differs widely from that given by the respondent. On the part of the appellant it is claimed that its representatives presented the possibility of such engagement to Mr. and Mrs. Holubar, but that the latter replied that she was then under engagement with another concern, and would not be able to accept employment with the Principal Pictures Corporation. When she was asked what salary she would desire, she stated that she would demand $25,000. To this the representative of appellant replied that he did not think that this was too much money, but that he would present it to his principal; that thereupon Mr. Holubar asked him who his principal was, and was told that it was Sol Lesser, president of the Principal Pictures Corporation. The following version of the conversation between these parties was then given by the representative of appellant:

> "He said, 'Well, if it is Sol Lesser,' he said, 'I know Sol very well, and,' he said, 'I would do anything I could in the situation.' And he said, 'You haven't any objection at all, Ben, if I deal with Sol direct?' And he said, 'You will get yours just the same.' I said, 'Not a bit in the world, Allen, and any way I can help you to get together, let me know.'"

The respondent's version of this meeting differs in important particulars from that given by the appellant. She testified that when appellant's representative first suggested the engagement to her she stated that she was not interested because she was already under contract with another concern and would, therefore, be unable to accept the engagement proposed by the appellant. She also testified that she did not hear anything said regarding her husband's negotiating directly with Mr. Lesser, and that appellant's representative did not mention Mr. Lesser's name during the conversation, and further that she stated that she was then receiving a salary of $25,000, and would expect the same from the engagement suggested by appellant, and that appellant's representative thereupon replied that his principal would not pay such a price, but that they would be willing to pay the sum of $10,000. Mr. Lesser, president of the Principal Pictures Corporation, testified that appellant's agent called upon him after his conversation with the respondent, and reported that the respondent demanded a salary twice what they were willing to pay, and suggested that he might do better by conferring directly with Mr. Holubar. Thereafter Mr. Holubar called upon Mr. Lesser and was tendered a proposition for the employment of respondent. In a day or two thereafter Mr. Lesser was notified by the respondent that she would not accept the engagement at the price suggested, and the Principal Pictures Corporation thereupon employed another actress to take the part. Negotiations for the engagement of the respondent were thereupon dropped by the Principal Pictures Corporation, but some time thereafter Mr. Levy, who was engaged with the respondent in the production of another picture, approached the Principal Pictures Corporation, and through his negotiations the respondent was engaged to take the leading part in "The World's a Stage," and received for her services the sum of $15,000 in cash and his promissory note for $5,000.

[2] On this evidence the trial court found that the respondent did not employ appellant to perform any services for her, that the appellant did not perform any services for her benefit, that she did not authorize the appellant to carry on or conduct any negotiations with the Principal Pictures Corporation in relation to such employment, and that respondent's engagement with the Principal Pictures Corporation was not the result of any agreement of employment between appellant and respondent or of any services rendered by the appellant for the benefit of the respondent. Conceding, as we must, that there is evidence in the record which would have fully justified a finding on the part of the trial court that the respondent was liable for the commissions claimed, our inquiry is closed by the findings which the trial court made and which we have seen are supported by substantial evidence. The effect of these findings is that the appellant was not the procuring cause resulting in the consummation of the contract between the respondent and the Principal Pictures Corporation.

[3] These findings must be viewed in the light of the rule of law applicable to the right of a broker to recover commissions where, as here, it is claimed that his efforts were not the procuring cause of the contract or benefit which the principal obtained. This rule of law is well stated in Sessions v. Pacific Improvement Co., 57 Cal. App. 1, 17, 206 P. 653, 660, where this court said:

> "To constitute himself the causa causans, the predominating effective cause, it is not enough that the broker contributes indirectly or incidentally to the sale by imparting information which tends to arouse interest. He must set in motion a chain of events which, without break in their continuity, cause the buyer and seller to come to terms as the proximate result of his peculiar activities."

The rule is stated in another way in the Sessions Case as follows:

> "In order for the broker to recover, the evidence must show that his efforts were the procuring cause and not merely one in a chain of causes. The expression 'procuring and inducing cause' as used in the books refers to the cause originating from a series of events that, without break in their continuity, result in the prime object of the employment of the agent."

This same rule was quoted with approval in Roth v. Thomson, 40 Cal. App. 208, 215, 180 P. 656, as coming from Smith v. Preiss, 117 Minn. 392, 136 N. W. 7, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 820, and in the Sessions Case it is quoted as coming from Park v. Culver, 169 Mo. App. 8, 154 S. W. 806. We have been unable to find the language of the entire quotation in either of the cases cited by our appellate court, but the rule is in line with all the authorities and we are satisfied that it is correctly stated as quoted.

Judgment affirmed.

LOS ANGELES CITY HIGH SCHOOL DIST. OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. SCHUMANN et al. (Civ. 5226; L. A. 8421.)

1. Eminent domain 🔑222(4) — Instruction meaning that jury must be satisfied that defendant proved market value of property condemned by preponderance of evidence held not erroneous.

In action of eminent domain, instruction that "it was incumbent on defendants to prove to your satisfaction by a preponderance of evidence what was market value of property plaintiff condemned," meaning that jury must be satisfied that defendant proved market value of property by a preponderance of evidence, held not erroneous.

2. Appeal and error 🔑216(1) — Failure of court to adequately instruct jury held not ground for complaint, in absence of request.

Failure of court, in instructing that defendants had burden of proving to satisfaction of jury by preponderance of evidence what was market value of property condemned, in not defining "preponderance of evidence," or that jury must decide issue upon evidence presented, held not ground for complaint, where no instruction on such subjects was requested.

3. Trial 🔑194(5)—Instruction on weight to be given testimony as to market value of property condemned, containing no reference to any witness nor singling out any testimony, held not erroneous, as invading province of jury, nor to contain any incorrect statement of law.

Instruction on weight to be given testimony of witnesses expressing their opinion as to value of property condemned, though somewhat argumentative in form in part, held not erroneous, as invading province of jury, nor to contain any incorrect statement of law, where it contained no reference to any witness, and singled out no testimony, but was a mere statement of an incontestable truth, equally applicable to evidence given by experts on both sides.

4. Eminent domain 🔑222(4)—Instruction held not erroneous, as permitting jury to reject the testimony of any expert as to his opinion of market value of property condemned.

In action of eminent domain, instruction in effect that jury might reject opinions expressed by experts as to market value of property condemned, if they believed that circumstances shown were such that opinions given were not based on such knowledge of the facts as would enable witnesses to express a true opinion with reference to market value, held not erroneous, as permitting jury to reject the testimony of any expert as to his opinion. (Supreme Court, in denying petition for hearing, withholds approval from that part of instruction permitting jury to reject testimony of any witness expressing an opinion, not based on such a thorough knowledge of facts and circumstances relating to the property as to enable him to express a true opinion as to its market value, but does not deem it sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action of eminent domain by the Los Angeles City High School District of Los Angeles County against Anna Marie Beatrice Schumann and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, and J. F. Moroney and Arthur T. George, Deputy County Counsels, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. By the filing of a complaint in the usual form the respondent began an action in eminent domain to condemn certain property of appellants for school purposes. The answer presented the value of the property as the sole issue. A trial was had before a jury. Beside the defendants, a number of expert witnesses testified for each side. A verdict was rendered, and judgment was entered accordingly, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

[1] The principal ground of appeal presented is that certain instructions given are said to be erroneous. Of these instructions No. 7 is the center of attack. It reads:

> "The burden of proof as to market value is on the defendants; that is, it is incumbent upon the defendants to prove to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence what was the market value of the property the plaintiff is condemning, on November 2, 1923."

The appellants insist that the use of the words "to your satisfaction" renders the instruction incorrect, in that it is claimed this statement is inconsistent with the proposition that the defendant is only required to produce so much proof as amounts to a preponderance of the evidence. In Lawrence v. Goodwill, 44 Cal. App. 440, 186 P. 781, an instruction was reviewed which the court held to be partly correct. However, this statement is contained in the instruction:

> "By preponderance of evidence is not necessarily meant a greater number of witnesses; but, if the plaintiff has proven the material allegations of this complaint by such evidence as satisfies and produces conviction in the minds of the jury, then he may be said to have proven his case by a preponderance of evidence."

It was said that this direction to the jury might fairly be construed to mean "that the jury must be satisfied, * * * not that the truth was on the side of the party holding the laboring oar, but that the greater weight of evidence was on his side." This the opinion indicates would be a correct statement of the law, and this is what the trial court in the instant case informed the jury to be the rule which it must follow.

We think appellants have misunderstood the instruction. It means nothing more than that the jury must be satisfied that the defendant proved the market value of the property by a preponderance of the evidence. It is difficult to conceive how the idea can be entertained that by the language of the instruction "to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence" more than one standard of proof was stated, or that by the words "to your satisfaction," used in the context, the impression could be conveyed that the words last quoted have anything to do with the definition of, or any limitation upon, the words "by a preponderance of the evidence." Clearly the statement in question requires the defendant to sustain the burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence, and informs the jury that it must be satisfied that the defendant has done this. The jury is told that it must be satisfied that the defendant has produced a preponderance of the evidence to prove market value, as the law requires.

The cases cited by appellant upon this point chiefly discuss the definition of preponderance of the evidence. Yet, in so far as instruction No. 7 is concerned, that subject is in no way involved. This is true of Estate of Ross, 179 Cal. 629, 178 P. 510, and also People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 154 P. 468. In the latter case the instruction held to be erroneous incorrectly defined preponderance of the evidence as in substance the same thing as proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Appellants cite Galloway v. United Railroads, 51 Cal. App. 575, 197 P. 663, as condemning the use of the term "to your satisfaction." A careful inspection of this opinion shows that the contrary is true. The offending instruction read:

> "Before you can render a verdict against the defendant, the evidence must satisfy your minds to a moral certainty and by a preponderance of the whole evidence."

The criticism of this instruction was, not that it used the words "to your satisfaction," but that it required that the jury should be satisfied to a moral certainty. Throughout the opinion the fact that the jury must be satisfied is impliedly accepted as the law. The instruction gave two conflicting rules. It informed the jury that they must be satisfied to a moral certainty, and again that they must be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence. And the court indicates that the vice of the instruction is in announcing the first rule, and that it is impossible to determine which of the conflicting rules presented to the jury was followed by it. The necessary inference is that an instruction that the jury must be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence would be the correct rule.

Counsel for appellants also direct our attention to the decision of the District Court of Appeal upon the second appeal of this case, reported at 69 Cal. App. 770, 232 P. 491. We are informed that the instruction, "Before you can render a verdict against the defendant, the evidence must satisfy your minds by a preponderance thereof * * * that the act of the motorman was not done in lawful defense of his own person," was held to be erroneous. This is true, but the opinion contains no mention of the propriety of the use of the word "satisfy." A most casual reading of the court's comments upon the instruction in question shows that the error consisted of the fact that by it the jury were instructed that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show negatively that the motorman had not acted in the lawful defense of his own person, and while the same instruction contained a contrary statement, the court says it cannot be determined upon which theory the jury acted, and hence that the conflict was prejudicial.

This proposition is entirely different from that announced in Dowd v. Atlas Taxicab Co., 69 Cal. App. 9, 230 P. 958, where the jury was informed that the fact that the plaintiffs were without fault must appear "to your satisfaction." Nothing was said about "preponderance of the evidence," or "to a moral certainty," or "beyond a reasonable doubt." The fact was required to be established to the jury's satisfaction. Of course, this is not a correct rule. In fact, it leaves the jury without any definite standard; for one juror might be satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence, another by proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and still another without any substantial evidence. It is noteworthy that, although the court called attention to two erroneous instructions of which no complaint had been made by appellant, it passed without criticism the language in instruction No.

16, stating that before the plaintiff could recover "it must appear to your satisfaction by a preponderance of the evidence" that the defendant had been guilty of some negligence. Instruction No. 16 was held erroneous because of other language, but as to the part above quoted it was passed without criticism.

[2] In the instant case by instruction No. 7 the jury were not instructed that they must be satisfied that the truth was as asserted by appellants, but only that they must be satisfied that the greater weight of the evidence, its preponderance, was on their side. The court did not define "preponderance of the evidence"; but, since no instruction upon that subject was requested by appellants, no error was committed in the omission. The same is true of other criticisms made by appellants, such as that the jury were not instructed that they must decide the issue upon the evidence presented. Appellants asked no such instruction, and so cannot complain that none was given.

[3] Also we are urged to reverse the judgment, because it is claimed that the court erroneously instructed the jury upon matters of fact. Three instructions are cited in this behalf. They are Nos. 12, 9, and 14. No. 12 reads as follows:

> "Certain witnesses in this case were questioned as to their knowledge of sales of property similar to that involved in this suit, in the same vicinity, quoted by the owners to real estate men and others. These questions, and answers given by the witnesses in response thereto, should not be taken by you as evidence of the actual market value of any of the property in question, but solely for the purpose of determining how well qualified the particular witness may have been to give his opinion as to the market value of the property in question. The opinion of a witness is no better than the reasons upon which such opinion is based, and when a witness gives an opinion as to the market value of the property, it is pertinent to ascertain the extent of his investigation into every matter that would be a legitimate subject of inquiry by any one desiring to purchase the property in question. Therefore, in determining the weight to be given by you to the testimony of any witness who in this case has given his opinion as to the market value of any of the property in question, you may consider, as legitimately bearing upon his ability to form an accurate opinion as to its market value, his knowledge of sales of similar property in the vicinity of the property involved in this suit, his knowledge of the prices at which such property has been quoted in good faith by the various owners thereof in an effort to sell the same in the open market, his knowledge of the nature, surroundings, advantages, and disadvantages of the property, and any other fact or circumstances that would tend to establish the familiarity of the witness with such property and with its actual market value on November 2, 1923."

We are informed that this instruction does not contain a single proposition of law, but is no more and no less than a pure argument to the jury. Especially objection is made to the sentence beginning, "The opinion of a witness," and to the one commencing, "Therefore, in determining the weight." The first sentence in the instruction embodies the statement of a well-recognized rule which it is highly important that the juries should heed in considering expert evidence in condemnation cases, and without which confusion as to the purpose of permitting testimony concerning sales of similar property and legal limitations placed upon the use of such testimony might well result. The sentence beginning, "Therefore, in determining the weight," is really a restatement of the same rule. Though somewhat argumentative in form, the last sentence neither invades the province of the jury nor contains any incorrect statement of the law. The sentence beginning, "The opinion of a witness," gives a logical reason for the rule previously stated. It may be unnecessary to inform the jury as to the foundation for legal principles, but such an instruction can never be harmful, where it contains no reference to any witness and singles out no testimony, but is a mere statement of an incontestable truth equally applicable to the evidence given by experts on both sides. We find no error in instruction No. 14.

[4] The court gave the following instruction numbered 9:

> "You are not bound to accept the opinion of any witness as to the market value of any of these properties, but must determine the fact for yourselves, and in so doing it is your province to weigh the testimony of each witness who has expressed such an opinion with reference to all the circumstances surrounding not only the property itself, but the witness' familiarity with such property, and to determine from all such circumstances how well qualified the witness may be to express a true opinion of its market value, and you may, in your discretion, reject the testimony of any witness who has expressed such an opinion, if it appears satisfactorily to you that such opinion is not based upon such a thorough knowledge of all the facts and circumstances relating to the property itself as to enable him to express a true opinion as to its market value."

The objection made to this instruction is that it informs the jury that they may "reject" the testimony of any expert as to his opinion. Hirshfeld v. Dana, 193 Cal. 142, 223 P. 451, is cited as authority for appellants' stand in this regard. While it is true that the Supreme Court, in its opinion in that case, said that the phrase "you are at liberty to reject it," referring to expert testimony, and informing the jury that they might "disregard it," was "lacking in accuracy" as used in the particular part of the instruction in which it was contained, the following instruction was conceded to be correct:

> "1. (a) The opinions of expert witnesses are entitled to such weight as you deem proper to give them. You may accept or reject such opin- ions as you may accept as true, or reject as false, any other facts in the case."

It is unnecessary to quote the entire instruction first above mentioned, which the court had under consideration in that case, but it is sufficient to say that, both from a reading of the instruction itself and the comments of the court upon it, the conclusion must follow that the language quoted by appellants, and which is termed by the opinion as inaccurate, was regarded as erroneous because of its context. Among a number of incorrect statements the instruction informed the jury that the testimony of experts was merely advisory. The opinion says:

> "The expression 'merely advisory' is not a correct description of the respective functions of the jury and the expert. Their respective functions are entirely independent. When the instruction is analyzed and considered, apart from other instructions, it is open to the objection that it may detract from the effect of expert evidence, in that it might lead the jury to believe it was optional with them whether to weigh such testimony as they would that of any other class of witnesses."

But in the instruction given in the instant case the jury were not informed that they could arbitrarily reject the opinions expressed by experts, but in effect that they might do so, if they believed that the circumstances shown were such that the opinions given were not based upon such knowledge of the facts as would enable the witnesses to express a true opinion with reference to market value.

We are told that the trial court sustained objections to questions by which it was sought to show that there was no other property in the vicinity of the same size or character as that involved in this action. However, our attention is not directed to any part of the record where such an effort was made. The rights of the many other litigants whose appeals insistently demand our attention prevent us, regardless of our inclination, from assuming counsel's burden of time-consuming labor involved in searching the record for the rulings which are asserted to exist.

The contention that the burden of proof as to valuation is not legally upon the defendant in a condemnation suit might be worthy of serious consideration, if it presented a new question. However, the cases referred to by appellants—Monterey County v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 507, 23 P. 700; San Diego L. Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 50, 25 P. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604; Reed Orchard Co. v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 648, 128 P. 9, 18—determine the matter adversely to their claim.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for hearing herein is denied. In denying such petition we withhold our approval from that portion of instruction numbered 9, reading: "And you may, in your discretion, reject the testimony of any witness who has expressed such an opinion if it appears satisfactorily to you that such opinion is not based upon such a thorough knowledge of all the facts and circumstances relating to the property itself as to enable him to express a true opinion as to its market value." We do not, however, deem the above portion of the instruction, when read in the light of the other instructions given by the court, to be sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal of the case.

HABER et ux. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. HABER v. SAME. PETRIE et ux. v. SAME. (Civ. 3135.)

1. Street railroads 🔑114(13)—Finding of contributory negligence of automobile driver attempting to cross street railway track held warranted by evidence.

Evidence of automobile driver's attempt to cross street railway track when view of traffic on opposite side of closely approaching train was obscured held to warrant finding of contributory negligence in action for injuries to occupants of automobile, which was struck by train while blocked on track by traffic congestion.

2. Trial 🔑260(8)—Refused instruction as to duty to propel street car carefully, with due regard for safety of other vehicles, held substantially covered by instructions given.

In action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, refused instruction that it was defendant's duty to propel its car carefully, with due regard for safety of other vehicles, held substantially covered by instructions given.

3. Trial 🔑191(8)—Instruction that failure to propel street car carefully, with due regard for safety of other vehicles, was negligence, held properly refused as implying negligence.

In action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, instruction that failure to propel car carefully, with due regard for safety of other vehicles, was negligence, held properly refused as implying negligence.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1067—Refusal of last clear chance instruction, in action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, held harmless to plaintiffs.

Where testimony, in action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, showed that latter was from 40 to 100 feet away when automobile entered track, that motorman immediately applied emergency brakes, and that collision would have been avoided if automobile driver had not slackened speed, refusal of instruction on last clear chance was harmless to plaintiffs, in absence of testimony as to distance in which train could have been stopped.

5. Trial 🔑253(4)—Instructions on last clear chance held properly refused as omitting necessary elements.

In action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, instruction that contributory negligence would not bar recovery if manner of operating car after discovering plaintiffs' peril amounted to willful or reckless conduct held properly refused as omitting questions whether plaintiffs could extricate themselves from impending peril and whether failure to take advantage of last clear chance was proximate cause of injury.

6. Negligence 🔑83—Elements of "last clear chance" doctrine stated.

Application of last clear chance doctrine depends on whether plaintiff's danger was perceived by defendant in time to avoid injury by ordinary care, whether defendant exercised such care or neglected to do act within his power which would have prevented injury after discovering plaintiff's situation, whether both parties were guilty of concurrent negligence, continuing to time of and contributing to accident, whether defendant knew of and could have avoided danger of which plaintiff did not know, and whether plaintiff could have extricated himself from impending peril by exercising ordinary care.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last Clear Chance.]

7. Negligence 🔑83—Actual peril, but not physical impossibility of escape, is essential to application of last clear chance doctrine.

For last clear chance doctrine to apply, peril must have been an actual one, but physical impossibility of escape is not absolutely essential, it being sufficient that injured person was unaware of danger.

8. Negligence 🔑83.

That defendant but for his remissness would have observed plaintiff's dangerous position is insufficient to render last clear chance doctrine applicable.

9. Street railroads 🔑90(4).

Motorman must exercise reasonable diligence in analyzing situation on observing automobile approaching track.

10. Trial 🔑194(8) — Instruction that there was no evidence that plaintiffs controlled operation of automobile struck by electric train held properly refused.

In action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train while blocked on track by traffic congestion, instruction that "there is no evidence which warrants * * * conclusion that plaintiffs * * * were in any degree in the control of the operation of the automobile," held properly refused.

11. Trial 🔑260(8)—Refused instruction as to imputation of automobile driver's negligence to passengers held covered by instructions given.

In action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, refused instruction that automobile driver's negligence could not be imputed to plaintiffs and that jury were to determine merely whether defendant was guilty of negligence proximately causing accident and plaintiffs of negligence contributing thereto held covered by instructions given.

12. Street railroads 🔑118(1)—Instructions on duties of occupants of automobile and motorman held proper.

In action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, instructions that plaintiffs were required to anticipate operation of cars at usual speed, that defendant had right to expect that automobile driver would anticipate such speed, and that motorman had right to assume that approach of car would be visible to plaintiffs, and that they would not attempt to cross so close in front of it as to make collision unavoidable, held proper.

13. Street railroads 🔑85(1).

Street car being confined to tracks, automobile driver must give way to its clear passage, though his and motorman's duties on approaching intersection are reciprocal.

14. Street railroads 🔑103(3)—Motorman must have observed peril in time to avoid injury for last clear chance doctrine to apply.

Automobile driver must observe street car's approach and use ordinary care to avoid collision therewith, failing in which it must be shown that motorman actually observed peril in time to avoid injury for last clear chance doctrine to apply.

15. Street railroads 🔑90(3).

Whether bell of electric train was rung was immaterial, where occupants of automobile struck by train saw it and knew that it was approaching.

16. Appeal and error 🔑1170(9)—Instruction that plaintiffs cannot recover if accident was caused by negligence of automobile driver blocking their automobile on street car tracks held not prejudicial error (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

In action for injuries to occupants of automobile struck by electric train, instruction that plaintiffs could not recover if accident was caused by their driver's negligence or that of automobile driver blocking him from leaving track held not prejudicial error within Const. art. 6, § 4½, as allowing jury to consider negligence of parties not before court, in view of all circumstances.

17. Street railroads 🔑114(13)—Finding that negligent driving of automobile was sole proximate cause of injuries to occupants held warranted by evidence.

Evidence that automobile driver ventured on street railway track, with three-car train, visible at all times, seen to be approaching, and traffic on opposite side of track, held to warrant jury's finding that careless, reckless, and negligent driving of automobile was sole proximate cause of occupants' injuries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Actions by George B. Haber and wife, by George B. Haber alone, and by A. J. Petrie and wife against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgments for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Bachman & LePage, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Frank Karr, E. E. Morris, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The three cases set forth in the title were all tried upon the same evidence, before the same jury, and are brought before us upon appeal on one transcript and one set of briefs. The defendant had judgment in all three of the cases, and the plaintiffs in the respective cases appeal. These actions are based on injuries sustained while the plaintiffs were riding in an automobile in a southerly direction on a certain street in the city of Los Angeles, known as and called South Wilton street. This street is intersected by a certain other street running easterly and westerly in said city, known as and called West Sixteenth street, upon which the defendant owned and operated a double-track railway. The complaints set forth two causes of action: (1) That as the plaintiffs were proceeding in an orderly and careful manner in a southerly direction and were attempting to cross the tracks belonging to the defendant, and that when they got upon said tracks they were blocked thereon by traffic congestion, and, while so blocked thereon, the defendant carelessly, negligently, and recklessly managed, operated, and controlled a certain three-car train then being operated in an easterly direction on said Sixteenth street and in consequence of said manner of operation ran said train against the automobile in which plaintiffs then and there were, with such force and violence that plaintiffs suffered injuries, etc.; the second cause of action alleges that while the automobile in which the plaintiffs were seated was standing in a dangerous place across defendant's tracks and unable to move in any direction, that the defendant perceived, or in the exercise of ordinary care should have perceived, the situation and danger of plaintiffs, and that defendant, by exercising ordinary care, might have stopped said train and avoided a collision with said automobile, but that defendant so carelessly, recklessly, and negligently managed, controlled, and operated its said three-car train that in consequence thereof said train was run against the automobile, etc., injuring the plaintiffs. The facts show that the automobile owned by George B. Haber was at the time of the collision being driven and operated by George M. Haber, a son of George B. Haber, that in the automobile there were also Anna E. Haber, wife of said George B. Haber, Mrs. A. J. Petrie, Louise and Jeannette Haber, daughters of Mr. and Mrs. Haber. The automobile was and for some minutes preceding the accident had been proceeding in a southerly direction on South Wilton street, traveling at a speed estimated by the driver at 20 miles an hour; by other witnesses at a considerably higher rate of speed. The driver of the automobile, George M. Haber, stated the speed at 20 miles an hour just before entering the intersection of Wilton and Sixteenth streets. That upon entering the intersection he slowed down to 15 miles an hour. That before he started to cross the street he looked both ways. That as he looked toward the west, which was on his right, he saw the defendant's train. That the train was a short block away. That it was so far away he did not think there would be any danger of being hit. That when he entered upon the north line of the defendant's railway the automobile was being driven at about 12 miles an hour, and, further, that the train at that time he estimated to be 100 feet away. That he proceeded across the north line of tracks and onto the south line of the railway upon which the defendant's train was traveling in an easterly direction. The north line of rails was called the "west-bound track," the south line is called the "east-bound" track. That when he actually got on the tracks the train was about 40 feet away. That at this instant of time, an automobile being driven in an easterly direction shot in front of him, necessitating his slowing down to about 5 miles per hour to avoid colliding with such automobile. His testimony is as follows in this particular:

> "When I got on the tracks that this train was running on, when the front wheels got on this track, the train was probably 40 feet off at that. I couldn't give any intimation that I was going to slow down to the motorman. I didn't know anything about this auto that was going to cut me off until I got just a few feet farther. When I was actually on the tracks and the train was 40 feet or less I did something that I myself had not expected to do; that is, I slowed down. That auto that passed in front of me was about 5 feet from me when I first saw it. It was coming from the west on Sixteenth street. It was coming so fast I did not see it. About all I saw was a black streak shot in front of me. When that black streak shot in front of me, the train was so close that I couldn't get off before the train hit me. I was going possibly 10 miles an hour, that is, when I was on the tracks; I slowed down just enough to let the auto pass. When I slowed down on the tracks the street car was running about 15 miles an hour. I am able to judge that if I had not slowed down on the track and I had continued at the speed that I was making in crossing the tracks, and the street car continued at the speed it was making, that I would have gotten across in plenty of time. The automobile that passed in front of me was going at about 38 miles per hour. I first saw it when it was 20 or 25 feet away."

The testimony shows that there was a vacant lot on the northwest intersection of Wilton and Sixteenth streets, so that the occupants of the automobile had a clear view of the approaching three cars, and also that the motorman of the train had a clear view of the automobile. There is nothing in the testimony showing that either the train or the automobile was not equipped with proper appliances for managing, controlling and stopping the same, nor is there anything in the testimony showing the distance required to stop either the train or the automobile at the place where the collision occurred, or under like conditions then prevailing. All of these matters appear to have been entirely omitted from the case. George B. Haber, the father of George M. Haber, testified that his son was driving the automobile, that he occupied the front seat with him, that he first saw the train when the automobile was 75 feet north of the north curb line of Sixteenth street, at that time the automobile was running between 18 and 20 miles an hour, that he would estimate the distance of the train from the intersection at 300 feet, that when they got upon the east-bound track, or nearly to the east-bound track, an automobile came from the west and blocked their way, that at that time he would judge the train was 100 feet away, and that the train had slowed up some, that before they could get off the east-bound track, after the automobile had passed on, they were struck by the defendant's train, that he did not hear any bell, and that he did not need any bell to tell him that the train was coming, for he saw it. On cross-examination this witness testified that when he first saw the speeding automobile coming across the intersection he thought the train was some 150 feet away; also, that when they were at the north curb line of Sixteenth street the train was distant some 250 feet. This witness further testified that when he got on the west-bound track he did not know how close the train was; that he was relying on his son to watch out for such things; that he allowed him to drive the car on the day in question and authorized his son to drive the car and take the witness and his wife in the same; that he had the right to direct where the car should go, but that he did not exercise such authority.

Miss Louise Haber testified that she saw the train at least 100 feet away, and that at such point is slowed up some; that the car in which they were riding slowed up some when they were entering Sixteenth street; that they slowed down just before entering on the tracks and started up again, and when the other automobile shot in front of them they slowed down and the train hit them. "I think we were just about on the track the train was on when the other automobile dashed by."

Amos Peterson, a witness called for the plaintiff, testified:

> That he was coming west on Sixteenth street; that when he first saw the plaintiffs' car he was 100 or 200 feet east of it; that he had slowed up for the intersection. "I saw the train coming and heard the noise of the brakes, and when I looked around the train was practically on top of them. Plaintiffs' automobile was about across the track. When I first saw the train it was 300 or 400 feet away; when the automobile got on the track, I should judge it was 50, maybe 100 feet away—that is, when they put on the brakes. I should judge the train was making about 20 miles an hour; I should judge the automobile had slowed down to either 3 to 5 miles per hour; the train went in my judgment from 45 to 50 feet after it hit the automobile; I did not see the speeding automobile that went by."

J. C. Page, a witness called by the plaintiff, testified that he was at the intersection of Wilton and Sixteenth streets at the time of the accident; that just preceding the collision he was traveling easterly on Sixteenth street; that he was driving a Ford car; that the three-car Pacific Electric Railway train came along on Sixteenth street running easterly and "caught up with me at a place called Arlington"; at Arlington both he and the train slowed down; that after Arlington he speeded up some; that an automobile passed by him running about 40 miles an hour; that he speeded up his automobile to 20 or 25 miles per hour; that the train was coming faster than he; he would judge about 30 miles an hour; that he first heard the train make a sound indicating that they were turning on the air or turning off the power at a point about 250 feet from Wilton street; that after that the train picked up some speed, he would judge about 30 miles an hour; that the first the motorman lessened the speed was about 250 feet from Wilton street; that an automobile running about 40 miles an hour crossed in front of the Haber car; that at that time the front car of the train was distant from Wilton street close to 100 feet; that when the automobile crossed in front of the Haber car the Haber car lessened its speed; that the time the automobile started to stop the brakes were put on the train the last time; "I would judge it was 100 feet from the Haber car after it started to put on the brakes, the car went across the intersection of Wilton street. I think it was the air brakes that I heard go on when the train was about 100 feet from the point of the collision. Possibly I am in error as to the distance the train was away. It was between 75 and 100 feet."

A witness by the name of Hill, called for the defendant, testified that he was riding on the train, and that just preceding the application of the brakes the train was running between 15 and 20 miles per hour.

H. B. Spurlin, the motorman on the train, testified:

> That he was operating a three-car interurban train; that as he came toward Wilton place he threw off the power and was coasting along at the rate of about 15 miles per hour; that he first noticed the automobile speeding along at about 500 or 600 feet back from the intersection; that the automobile was traveling much faster than the train; that he thought the automobile was running between 30 and 35 miles an hour; that he was ringing the bell all along; that the traffic coming east and west on Sixteenth street was pretty heavy; that when the Haber car came to the intersection it slowed down and then shot forward and slowed down suddenly in front of the train. "When the automobile came on the track I was about 15 feet away. I threw the train into emergency. That means I put on all the brakes I had. It was not possible for me to stop and avoid the collision. I figured the automobile was going to slow down and stop when it came to Sixteenth street. I would say the train stopped in about 70 feet, that it made a good stop—that the automobile slowed down about 20 feet distant from the north line of Sixteenth street. I was not 100 feet away when the automobile slowed down on the track in front of me. When I saw him coming in I commenced trying to stop. When I saw this auto apparently about to get on my track and slowed down, I did everything I could to avoid hitting him. I did not slow down and start up the train again. I simply threw off the power and let the train coast. That is what we usually do when we pass Arlington."

Dale R. Roundtree, a witness, was riding in the first car of the train. He testified before the brakes went on, in his judgment, the train was not exceeding 20 miles an hour.

S. E. Wilson, a witness called for the defense, testified:

> That he was assistant superintendent of the Western division of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, that he was a passenger on the train; that the train was running between 15 and 18 miles per hour; that there was a switch point at Arlington 400 feet distant; that at the time the emergency brakes were applied, in his judgment, the front end of the train was 50, possibly 60, feet from the west curb line of Wilton street. "The train did not slow down as if to stop and then start up again. After the brakes went on, the next thing I heard was the noise of the machine careening backward. From where the train hit the automobile until it stopped was between 18 or 19 steps. I stepped the distance. From the place where the brakes went on to where it stopped, I would say, was a distance of about 130 feet. That was a good stop for a train running between 15 to 18 miles per hour of the weight of a three-car interurban."

Miss A. A. Way, a witness called for the defense, stated that she was riding on this train, that she heard the bell ringing several times, and that the speed of the train was just as usual.

Mrs. Jessie M. Way testified that she was riding on the train, and that she heard the brakes go on before the crash; they were very close together.

Miss Voigts, a witness for the defendant, testified that she was sitting in the first car of the train; that she saw the automobile before it was struck; that they were pretty close to it when it came out of the side street; that the motorman stopped the train very quickly; that the motorman was sitting quiet before the stop; that the automobile came very quickly from the side street and then stopped. "I think the automobile was coming at about the same speed as the train, because I thought the automobile could not make it."

Harry R. La Grange, a witness called for the defendant, testified that he was seated in the first car in the third seat back from the motorman; that he was looking straight ahead and saw the automobile coming in front of the train; that the train was running about 15 miles per hour; that he observed the clanging of the bell as the car approached the intersection.

Mrs. Elliston, a passenger on the electric train, testified that she saw the automobile coming from the left; that she thought it was running about 30 miles per hour; that when she first saw the automobile it was about as far from the intersection as the train; that she did not hear the bell or whistle; that the train stopped very suddenly.

Arthur J. Brown testified that he was the head conductor on the train, that the train was running from 15 to 20 miles an hour, and, further, that the motorman was ringing the bell, and that the train had not reached a speed of 30 miles an hour at any place between Arlington and the accident.

George Malhoit testified that the train was going between 15 and 17 miles per hour, but the train did not slow down and then start up; that the train went past the point where it struck the automobile a little more than a car length.

[1] The foregoing is, in substance, the testimony upon which the jury found for the defendant. There was no testimony introduced as to the width of the streets, nor, as has been said, was any testimony introduced as to the distance in which either the train or automobile could be stopped. The testimony shows that the occupants of the automobile were aware of the approach of the train, and the motorman of the train also had knowledge of the approach of the automobile. No question is made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of the jury. Nor is there any real question presented as to the contributory negligence on the part of the automobile driver. The testimony shows that he was fully cognizant of the approach of the train, that he saw the condition of the traffic and thought he had plenty of time to cross the track before the train would reach him, and that he was suddenly compelled to do something he was not expecting to do, to wit, slow up his automobile to avoid colliding with the machine driving in the same direction with the defendant's train, and that the automobile that passed in front of him had been running along by the side of the train and so had not been perceived. The conclusion seems unavoidable from the facts presented that the driver of the automobile was guilty of a high degree of negligence in attempting to cross the track when his view of the traffic speeding along on the opposite side of the train was obscured, and that his attempting to do so when the train was approaching so closely amply justified the jury in reaching such a conclusion.

For grounds of reversal the appellant sets forth that the court erroneously refused to give the following instructions asked for by the plaintiffs:

(1) "It was the duty of the Pacific Electric Railway Company on the occasion in controversy here to propel its electric car in a careful manner and with due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians and other vehicles upon such street, and a failure to do so was negligence."

(2) "The defendant pleads in its answer contributory negligence on the part of the driver of the automobile and on the part of plaintiffs; yet contributory negligence would not be a bar to plaintiffs' cause of action, if they have established the same, if you shall further believe from the evidence that at the time of the accident, after the motorman discovered the peril of the plaintiffs, his manner of operating the car amounted to willful or reckless conduct, for contributory negligence in this state is never a defense as a bar where the proximate cause of an accident is the wanton and reckless conduct of the person so pleading such contributory negligence as a defense."

(3) "In this case there is no evidence which warrants the jury in the conclusion that plaintiffs, or either of them, were in any degree in the control of the operation of the automobile in which they were riding at the time of the accident, or that the relationship of the plaintiffs to the driver of the automobile was such that his negligence, if any, could be imputed to them. Under such circumstances, the question of whether the driver of said automobile was guilty of negligence is not material, nor to be considered by you in the decision of this case. You are to determine merely whether the defendant was guilty of negligence proximately contributing to and causing the accident, and whether the plaintiffs or any of them, were themselves guilty of negligence which contributed to such accident, and if you find that defendant was guilty of such negligence, and the plaintiffs were not, then the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiffs and each of them, as the result of such negligence, * * *"

—and also erred in giving to the jury the following instructions, which we will number, for convenience, A, B, and C:

A. "I charge you that plaintiffs were required to expect and anticipate, to the extent that a prudent person of their age and experience and knowledge would anticipate, that defendant would operate its cars on its line at the usual and customary rate of speed in said locality; and defendant, if operating lawfully and in the usual manner, had a right to expect (until it had actual knowledge to the contrary) that any automobile driver would anticipate and look out for such speed of operation of its cars and trains."

B. "You are instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the approach of defendant's car was visible to any one in plaintiffs' position exercising ordinary care, then said motorman had a right to assume that the approach of his car would be visible to plaintiffs driving said automobile towards said crossing, and had a right to expect that the approach of his car would be heeded by plaintiffs under such circumstances, and that plaintiffs would not attempt to cross so close in front of said car as to make a collision therewith unavoidable. And the motorman had a right to operate his car forward under such assumption and to rely thereon until he had actual knowledge that an attempt would be made to drive said automobile across said track in front of his car."

C. "If you find that this accident was caused solely and proximately by either negligence on the part of the young Mr. Haber driving the automobile or by negligence on the part of some other automobile driver in getting into his way and blocking him from getting off the track, you cannot hold the railway company liable, and your verdicts must be in its favor."

[2] In so far as the alleged error of the court to give the plaintiffs' requested instruction No. 1, it is sufficient to say that the substance of that instruction is fully set forth in other instructions given by the court to the jury, wherein the jury was told that the operator of a vehicle has a right to expect that those in charge of street cars will operate them in the manner and run them at the speed which is customary at the particular place, and that they will give the usual warnings and signals and take the usual precautions to avoid injuring others; each may rightfully expect that the other will, at the proper time, discharge his proper duty towards others; that the plaintiffs and the driver of the automobile had a right to rely upon the presumption of law that the motorman in charge of and operating an electric car upon a street would propel the same at a lawful rate of speed and would not propel the same at an excessive rate of speed in violation of an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles; and that all of them had a right to rely upon such presumption of law until by the use of ordinary care they, or any of them, had notice to the contrary.

The court also instructed the jury that pedestrians and automobile drivers had an equal right to the use of the street with the defendant, save and except that the defendant could not turn aside, but that its cars must follow the tracks, and that the pedestrian and automobile driver, in due season, should yield the right of way. The court also fully instructed the jury as to the duty of all parties to exercise due precaution to avoid accidents upon the streets, and that a pedestrian or automobile driver may act upon the theory and belief and expectation that others, as well as himself, will use the reasonable care that the situation requires to avoid collisions, etc.

[3] It may also be noted that plaintiffs' requested instruction No. 1 is also faulty in that it contains an implication of negligence on the part of the defendant. There should have been inserted words to the effect that if the jury found from the testimony a failure on the part of the defendant to operate its train with regard for the safety and convenience, etc., then and in that case the defendant was negligent.

[4-6] Appellants' requested instruction No. 2, refused by the court, appears to have been requested on the theory that it sets forth the doctrine of last clear chance. On the part of appellants it is argued at length that the testimony which we have set forth shows that the doctrine of last clear chance is applicable. On the part of the respondent it is likewise argued at length that this doctrine is inapplicable; that the plaintiffs saw that the motorman had a legal right to assume that the plaintiffs would not venture into a place of danger; and that when the plaintiffs had, by the action of the automobile driver, created the situation of peril, there remained no opportunity whatever for the stopping of the train. The testimony shows that at the time the plaintiffs entered the perilous zone, or the track upon which the collision occurred, the train in question was from 40 to 100 feet away, one witness testifying to a greater distance, but his testimony shows that his estimate was little more than speculation. All the testimony illustrating the acts of the parties at the critical moment is to the effect that at the instant of time when the automobile driver placed his machine in a perilous position by slowing up while on the east-bound track, the motorman, irrespective of the distance which the different witnesses estimated the front car of the train to be from the automobile, immediately applied the emergency brakes and did all that could be done to stop the train. The testimony of the automobile driver shows that had he not slackened the speed of his machine after entering upon the track, there would have been no collision. Under these circumstances, without any testimony whatever showing the distance in which the train could be stopped, or that anything was left undone which could have been done by the motorman, we do not see how any instruction on the subject of last clear chance could have materially affected the verdict of the jury. But, assuming that an instruction on the subject of last clear chance might have properly been given to the jury, we nevertheless think that the instruction requested by the appellants was properly refused, as not being either a clear or correct statement of the law on that subject. The requested instruction omits entirely the ability of the plaintiffs to extricate themselves from the impending peril, and also omits the necessary element that the failure to take advantage of the so-called last clear chance was the proximate cause of the injury. By an examination of the elements entering into an instruction so framed as to present the subject of last clear chance, it will be readily perceived that the requested instruction is deficient. These elements are set forth in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Townsend v. Butterfield, 168 Cal. 568, 143 P. 762, as follows:

"1. Whether or not the plaintiff's danger was perceived by defendant in time to enable him, by ordinary care, to have avoided injuring plaintiff.

"2. Whether, after discovering plaintiff's situation of peril, defendant did exercise ordinary care, or did neglect to do some act within his power, which, if done, would have prevented the injury.

"3. Whether or not both parties were guilty of current negligence continuing to the time of the accident and each contributing thereto.

"4. Whether or not the defendant knew of the danger and could have avoided it against the plaintiff who did not in fact know thereof," —to which we may also add the inability of the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, to extricate himself from the impending peril. Two of these elements necessary in presenting the subject of last clear chance are set forth in the recent case of Darling v. Pac. Electric Ry. (Cal. Sup.) 242 P. 703: (1) Whether or not after the plaintiff became aware of the threatened danger she could not by the exercise of ordinary care have extricated herself. (2) Whether or not the motorman had actual knowledge of the plaintiff's condition and could by the exercise of ordinary care have avoided the accident, but negligently failed to do so. In the case of Ilardi v. Central Cal. Traction Co., 36 Cal. App. 488, 172 P. 763, this court sets forth an instruction held to be a correct statement of some of the elements necessary to be incorporated in an instruction of the subject of last clear chance. One of the further necessary elements to be included in an instruction on the subject of last clear chance is, among others, set forth in the case of Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 182 Cal. 369, 190 P. 36. There the court treats this subject as follows:

"Under the last clear chance doctrine the peril which calls upon the train employees to act must be an actual one from which the imperiled party cannot escape by the exercise of ordinary care. Until the deceased reached the point from which he could not escape injury by the exercise of ordinary care, either by stopping or accelerating his pace, the doctrine of the last clear chance does not apply. The rule is well stated in the following quotation from French v. Grand Trunk Ry., 76 Vt. 441 (58 A. 722): 'It is true that when a traveler has reached a point where he cannot help himself—cannot extricate himself—and vigilance on his part will not avert the injury, his negligence in reaching that position becomes the condition, and not the proximate cause, of the injury, and will not preclude a recovery; but it is equally true that if a traveler, when he reaches the point of collision, is in a situation to help himself, and, by a vigilant use of his eyes, ears, and physical strength, to extricate himself and avoid injury, his negligence at that point will prevent a recovery, notwithstanding the fact that the trainmen could have stopped the train in season to have avoided injuring him. In such a case the negligence of the plaintiff is concurrent with the negligence of the defendant, and the negligence of each is operative at the time of the accident. When the negligence is concurrent and operative at the time of the collision, and contributes to it, there can be no recovery."

[7-9] The court then considers other elements which we have mentioned herein as necessary to set forth the doctrine of the last clear chance. In Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709, is set forth the elements necessary to be incorporated in an instruction when given to a jury upon the subject of last clear chance. In 19 Cal. Jur. 653, 654, § 801, it is pointed out that the doctrine of the last clear chance is not applicable until one reaches a point of peril from which he cannot extricate himself by the exercise of ordinary care; that the doctrine presupposes that he has placed himself in that position by his own negligence. The peril must be an actual one. It is not absolutely essential that it is physically impossible for the plaintiff to escape. It is sufficient that he is unaware of the danger. It is also pointed out that if the injured person is observed in a position where, with the exercise of reasonable care upon his part, no injury will fall to him, other persons have the right, until circumstances clearly point to the contrary, to assume that he will not expose himself to danger. Section 82 of the same volume sets forth that the defendant must have had actual knowledge of the plaintiff's dangerous position; that he realized that the plaintiff was either oblivious of the danger or could not extricate himself therefrom by the exercise of reasonable care. It is not enough that the defendant would have observed the plaintiff but for remissness upon his part, etc. It is further said that the operator of a train or street car has a right to assume that one approaching the track is in the possession of his normal senses, and that he is able to and will take care of himself. The defendant, under such circumstances, or the motorman in this case observing the situation, would be held to the exercise of reasonable diligence, when analyzing the situation. Under the circumstances disclosed in this case, the situation of peril arose when the automobile driver slackened the speed of his car upon the railroad track at which instant of time, as we have said, the testimony shows that the motorman applied the emergency brakes. Be this as it may, however, the requested instruction does not present the necessary elements which we have set forth in order to submit to the jury in the form of a statement of the law of the doctrine of the last clear chance, and was properly refused.

[10, 11] As to the third requested instruction refused by the court, it is sufficient to refer to the testimony of George B. Haber, the father of the driver of the automobile, to show its incorrectness. The instruction commences with these words: "In this case there is no evidence which warrants the jury in the conclusion that plaintiffs, or either of them, were in any degree in the control of the operation of the automobile in which they were riding at the time of the accident." The testimony shows that there was no actual physical control, but there was sufficient to present to the jury the question whether, under the circumstances, the owner of the car, who had authorized his son to drive the car and take his family therein, was not in a position to give directions, and, also, order the automobile stopped when he observed the approach of the three-car electric train at a sufficient distance away when by stopping the automobile all danger of collision might have been avoided. All proper portions of the requested instruction were included in instructions actually given. The court did instruct the jury that the negligence of the automobile driver was not imputable to passengers; that the fact that the plaintiffs and the driver of the automobile in question were engaged in a pleasure trip together was not sufficient to impute the negligence of the driver to the occupants of the automobile. The court also instructed the jury that the negligence of the driver was not imputable to the plaintiffs unless the jury found that the plaintiffs, or any one or more of them, as the case might be, were, in whole or in part, in control of the mechanical operation of said automobile, or unless the jury found the relationship of coadventurers, or master and servant, or principal and agent, existed. The court further instructed the jury that the mere fact of the relationship of the parties would not warrant imputing to any of them the negligence of the driver. It thus appears that, eliminating the question as to instructing the jury that there was no evidence, the court properly instructed the jury as to the law applicable to the case.

[12-14] As to the instructions A and B given by the court to the jury, we find nothing therein contrary to a correct statement of the law. In the case of Bibby v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 58 Cal. App. 658, 209 P. 387, almost identical questions were presented, and it was there held that such instructions are proper. It is to be noted that a hearing in this case in the Supreme Court was denied. In the Bibby Case the court instructed the jury that the motorman of the car exercising ordinary care has the right to assume that one driving an automobile would not attempt to drive upon the track so close to an approaching car as to be in danger of being struck thereby, when the approach of the car could be seen or heard by the use of ordinary care; that it is not the duty of the motorman in such situation to slow down, or to stop his car, when the automobile first approaches the track, nor until the motorman sees, or in the exercise of ordinary care should conclude, that the automobile would continue to proceed upon the track in front of the car. The court further instructed the jury in that case as to the duty of the automobile driver to see the approaching car when the same was visible. In the case at bar it is admitted by all the parties that the approaching car was visible several hundred feet away. In Kuchler v. Milwaukee Elec. Railway & Light Co., 157 Wis. 107, 146 N. W. 1133, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 891, it is said: A motorman has the "right to presume that the driver of the horse, though only a few feet from the track, would stop and not make an effort to cross immediately in front of a rapidly approaching car"—citing a number of cases. See, also, 19 Cal. Jur. 654, section 82, to the effect that the operator of a train or street car has the right to assume that one approaching the track is in possession of his normal senses and that he is able to and will take care of himself. While it is said that the duties of a motorman and the automobile driver approaching an intersection are reciprocal, yet, from the fact that the street car is confined to its tracks, it is the duty of the automobile driver to give way to its clear passage. It is the duty of the automobile driver to observe the approach of a street car and use ordinary care to avoid a collision therewith, and when there is a failure so to do, in order that recovery be had, it must be shown that the motorman actually observed the peril in time to avoid the injury, before the doctrine of the last clear chance applies. 23 Cal. Jur. p. 881, § 45; Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 610, 93 P. 677; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709; Lambert v. Southern Pacific R. Co., 146 Cal. 231, 79 P. 873; Arnold v. San Francisco Oakland Term. Rys., 175 Cal. 5, 164 P. 798.

[15] In the case at bar all parties saw the approach of the electric train, knew that it was being propelled forward, and therefore whether the jury concluded that the bell was or was not rung according to the testimony of different witnesses, which it had the right to accept or reject, was wholly immaterial, and we do not need to consider that phase of the case further than to say that there was testimony from which the jury might conclude that the bell was being rung. The plaintiffs saw the train and knew that it was approaching.

[16] The appellants strongly insist that the giving of the instruction that "if the accident was caused solely and proximately by either the negligence of the driver of the automobile in which the plaintiffs were riding, or on the part of the automobile driver blocking him from coming off of the track, the plaintiffs cannot recover." The point is made that this instruction is outside the issues, in that the jury was allowed to consider the negligence of parties not before the court. Taken in the abstract, this appears to be true, but when considered in relation to all the circumstances attending the case, it is evident that the jury was not misled. If the sole cause of the accident was attributable to others than the defendant, the jury necessarily would conclude that the defendant was not negligent. If the defendant was negligent in any particular contributing to the accident, then no other person could possibly be the sole cause. In the Bibby Case, supra, in the instructions given in that case to which we have referred and where two defendants were charged with negligence, the court instructed the jury as follows:

> "If you believe from the evidence that the driver of the autobus was negligent in this respect, and that such negligence on his part was alone the direct and proximate cause of the accident, then plaintiffs cannot recover against the defendant railway company."

This instruction was held to be correct. In Birmingham Ry., Light & Power Co. v. Ely, 183 Ala. 382, 62 So. 816, a case involving an automobile collision and a street car, the court held that the following instruction should have been given:

> "If the jury believe from the evidence that the negro chauffeur in charge of the automobile in which plaintiff was riding was negligent in running the automobile down the hill at the time of the collision between it and defendant's street car, and that this negligence on his part was the sole proximate cause of the collision and plaintiff's injury, then you should find a verdict for the defendant."

[17] In the case at bar, if the sole proximate cause of the collision was the negligent operation of the automobile by George M. Haber, the driver thereof, then and in that case the plaintiffs cannot recover of or from the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company. We do not think the reference to a possible third party contained in the instruction misled the jury to the prejudice of the plaintiffs, and therefore that section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution applies in this case. The evidence shows that the jury was fully warranted in finding that the sole and proximate cause of the injuries to the plaintiffs was the careless and reckless and negligent driving of the automobile. Venturing upon a railway with a three-car train approaching, visible at all times, seen to be approaching, in view of the traffic on the opposite side of the track which might at any moment intercept the progress of the automobile, makes almost unavoidable the conclusion that the driver of the autombile was alone responsible, to say nothing of sufficiently supporting the verdict of the jury.

The judgment is affirmed as to all three cases.

GONNERMANN v. ROBERTS. (Civ. 4652.)

Automobiles 🔑245(10, 76)—Automobile driver's negligence as to street car passenger alighting and passenger's contributory negligence held for jury (Motor Vehicle Act 1915, § 20, as amended by St. 1919, p. 217, § 12, subd. [o]; Motor Vehicle Act 1923, § 134).

In action for injuries sustained by plaintiff when stepping from street car and struck by defendant's automobile, which failed to clear car by six feet as required by Motor Vehicle Act 1915, § 20, as amended by St. 1919, p. 217, § 12, subd. (o), and Motor Vehicle Act 1923, § 134, question of defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence held for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Anna L. Gonnermann against William F. Roberts. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joe Crider, Jr., and Chandler P. Ward, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. Action to recover damages for injuries resulting from negligence of defendant in operating an automobile.

Appellant's statement of the matter involved in this appeal is:

> "The propositions involved on this appeal arise solely on the court's refusal to grant defendant's requested instruction No. 1 for a directed verdict in favor of the defendant."

According to the evidence, the plaintiff stepped from the street car into the street, where there was sufficient room for the automobile driven by the defendant to have passed her without even going close either to her or to the cement curb on the near side of the street. In other words, if he had driven his car half way between the car and the curb, there was sufficient room for him to pass without coming in contact with the plaintiff, or even proximately close to plaintiff. Therefore the doctrine of "last clear chance" certainly cannot apply to the facts involved in this matter. The authorities cited by appellant do not cover the facts involved herein. As we view it, the question is merely whether the defendant, who if he had been looking would certainly have seen the plaintiff, could, in the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided striking her, and whether as she stepped from the car to the street she should have anticipated that he would have passed closer to the car than to the curb or close enough to strike her.

We can see no element of contributory negligence in the way that she alighted from the car. She stepped from the car to the street, but did not take another step forward. Under the circumstances shown, she had a right to assume that the automobile driven by the defendant would clear the car at least six feet, as was required by the Motor Vehicle Act of 1915, § 20, as amended (Stats. 1919, p. 217, § 12, subd. [o]), as follows:

> "In passing any railroad, interurban or street car while passengers are alighting from or boarding the same, vehicles shall be operated or driven on the right hand side of such cars and at a rate of speed not exceeding ten miles an hour and no portion thereof or of any load thereon shall come within six feet of the running board or steps of such cars, and shall at all times be operated with due care and caution so that the safety of such passengers shall be assured. * * *"

See, also, present California Vehicle Act, § 134 (St. 1923, p. 560).

The only movement of the plaintiff, after she had reason to believe that she was in danger of being struck by the defendant, was to move her body back toward the street car step. There was nothing to obstruct the view of the driver of the machine; there was nothing in the road that would interfere with his seeing. He testifies that his brakes were in such shape that he could stop within but a very few feet; in fact, within one-fifth or one-sixth of the distance that he was from her at the time that she alighted from the car.

Therefore, under the authority of the case of Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 554, 182 P. 281, it would have been error for the trial court to have given the instruction, under the facts and circumstances here shown, directing a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

ARP v. BLAKE et al. (Civ. 3086.)

1. Contribution 🔑9(6)—Plea of estoppel in action to enforce contribution founded on payment of judgment held not sustained by evidence.

In action to enforce contribution founded on payment of judgment, plea of estoppel, in that plaintiff failed to disclose to defendant when purchasing judgment that he intended to set up his right to contribution, as against judgment against him for any excess he might be compelled to pay over and above his share of the obligation, held not sustained by evidence.

2. Judgment 🔑846.

Judgment debtor held not bound to disclose to one purchasing judgment that there were certain claims and liens existing against or on such judgment under Civ. Code, § 1432.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by James Arp against Elizabeth S. Blake and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Alfred Siemon, Paul F. Garber, and Siemon & Garber, all of Bakersfield, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this suit in equity to enforce his right to contribution founded upon his payment of a certain judgment obtained by one Ransch against the plaintiff, the defendant Blake, and one Hewitt, in the sum of $1,050 and interest. The plaintiff was awarded judgment, from which this appeal is prosecuted by the defendants under the so-called alternative method. Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

The present is the final outgrowth of several other actions previously tried and determined, a recital of the history of which is deemed necessary to a clear understanding of the issue submitted for decision by this appeal. The respondent's brief contains the following well-stated and correct account of the several actions of which the present is the culmination, and we will therefore adopt into this opinion the history of the litigation as it is so recited:

> "On May 27, 1910, plaintiff, James Arp, made a contract with defendant Blake to sell her certain residential property. At the time of making said contract Arp held the property under another contract of purchase, presumably with the owner, J. Ransch, which contract had been executed by an attorney in fact; but it later developed that the owner had revoked the power of attorney, and Arp was unable to get title to deliver to Blake. Blake then brought suit against Arp and recovered judgment for breach of the contract to sell, and that case was finally decided against Arp by this (Supreme) Court, the decision being reported in Blake v. Arp, 180 Cal. 144, 179 P. 683. The details of that litigation are set forth in paragraph I of the complaint in this case. The judgment in that case will be referred to herein as the Blake-Arp judgment.
> "Shortly after the commencement of the suit of Blake v. Arp, the owner, J. Ransch, commenced a suit against Blake, Arp, and one Hewitt, for the purpose of recovering the value of the use and occupation of said property for the time Blake occupied the same under the Arp contract. (The date of the commencement of this action is given in the clerk's transcript as March 17, 1919; but this is obviously a mistake, as it appears elsewhere in the said transcript that judgment in said case was secured April 11, 1916.) This case also found its way into the books, the appeal thereon being reported as Ransch v. Arp, 39 Cal. App. 580, 179 P. 694. That judgment was against Arp, Blake, and Hewitt for the use and occupation of the property, and the case is particularly described in paragraph II of the complaint herein. That judgment will be referred to in this brief as the Ransch-Blake judgment.

"The above-mentioned litigation having thus resulted, Arp contended that the last-mentioned judgment was the personal and individual obligation of Blake by reason of her having secured the benefits of the said use and occupation, and that she ought to pay it, or, in case he should be compelled to pay it, that he should be allowed a set-off on the Blake-Arp judgment which Blake held against him. He accordingly moved for a credit in the case of Blake v. Arp, and the lower court allowed a set-off of one-third of the Ransch-Blake judgment; but both parties appealed and the case was reversed on the ground that contribution could not be enforced by motion. Blake v. Arp, 48 Cal. App. 715, 192 P. 452.

"Arp then commenced the present action for contribution or a set-off against the Blake-Arp judgment, having theretofore been compelled to pay the Ransch-Blake judgment. Defendant Cohn had received an assignment of the Blake-Arp judgment and was accordingly made a party defendant. The first cause of action set forth in our complaint relates to the matters above mentioned and asks for credit on the Blake-Arp judgment of the amount which plaintiff had been compelled to pay on the Ransch-Blake judgment. The complaint also contained two other causes of action growing out of garnishments on Arp by creditors of Blake, but these causes fell by the wayside on demurrer in the trial court.

"A trial was had on the first cause of action which resulted in a judgment in favor of Arp against Blake but not against Cohn. Plaintiff appealed to this (the Supreme) Court and the case was transferred to the District Court of Appeal for the second District for hearing, where it was decided August 2, 1923, by Judge Shenk. Arp v. Blake, 63 Cal. App. 362, 218 P. 773. By this opinion the decision of the trial court was reversed, and it was held that Arp's right to a set-off was valid and enforceable against Cohn as the assignee of Blake unless there had been an estoppel in favor of Cohn, and ordered the case back for trial on the issue of estoppel alone. The case was retired on that question and judgment went in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Cohn for the full amount of the Ransch-Blake judgment and interest, the defendant Cohn, as assignee of Blake, having enforced payment by Arp of the full amount of the Blake-Arp judgment during the pendency of the former appeal herein."

The facts set forth in the complaint, as is to be inferred from the foregoing statement, are, substantially, as they are given in said statement. The answer of Cohn, besides admitting and denying certain of the allegations of the complaint, sets up a special defense by way of an estoppel founded upon the following alleged facts:

That immediately prior to the purchase of the Blake-Arp et al. judgment by said Cohn and the assignment thereof to him, said Cohn met and conversed with the plaintiff herein regarding said judgment; that the plaintiff stated and represented to Cohn that he (plaintiff) "was about to pay off the said judgment owing to the said Elizabeth Blake, and that if he, the said defendant Charles Cohn, would purchase said judgment the said James Arp would shortly thereafter pay the said Charles Cohn the amount of said judgment, and defendant Charles Cohn, believing him and relying upon said representation of the said James Arp, did purchase said judgment and obtain an assignment thereof, and pay the sum of $2,550 to the said defendant, Elizabeth Blake, therefor, that he would not have purchased the same if the said James Arp had not made said representation to him, and that, therefore, the said plaintiff, James Arp, is and should be estopped of claiming of contribution or right to subrogation or contribution against this defendant, Charles Cohn."

As before stated, the special defense thus set up involved or tendered the only issue litigated below in the present trial. The trial court found against the defendant Cohn upon his plea of estoppel.

It appears from the evidence that, prior to the date of the purchase by Cohn and the assignment to him of the Blake-Arp judgment, to wit, June 3, 1919, said judgment being for the sum of $2,100, the judgment creditor Blake was indebted to Cohn, for and on account of money advanced by the latter to the former, in a sum exceeding $3,000; that Mrs. Blake, after obtaining the judgment against Arp, was frequently importuned by her attorneys in the action in which she secured said judgment for the payment of their fee of $708 for the professional services they rendered therein for said Blake; that she (Blake) applied to Cohn for sufficient money with which to pay said fee; that Cohn, upon the understanding that Mrs. Blake would assign said judgment to him in consideration of and for the payment of said attorneys' fee, agreed to satisfy or pay the same, and did do so, and received from Blake such assignment; that it was further agreed by Cohn that upon the satisfaction of said judgment by the payment thereof by Arp, Cohn should and would credit, upon the then existing indebtedness of Blake to him, the difference between the amount paid in satisfaction of the said fee of the attorneys and the sum remaining of the satisfied judgment debt. Arp having paid the judgment to Cohn, the latter followed the course with respect to the disposition of the money so received as indicated by his said agreement. These facts are undisputed—in fact, they were admitted by Cohn when testifying herein in his own behalf and were specifically found to be true by the trial court. But, as seen, Cohn claims that he did not purchase said judgment until after he had talked with Arp with reference thereto and then solely upon the representation or assurance by Arp that, if Cohn should and did buy the judgment, he (Arp) would pay and so satisfy it.

This brings us to the consideration of the question whether the finding as to Cohn's plea of estoppel rests upon a sufficient evidentiary foundation. Upon this question the court found:

That, prior to the purchase of said judgment by Charles Cohn, the latter and Arp had a conversation in which the proposition of Cohn to purchase said judgment was discussed; that said Arp (plaintiff) "then and there stated to the said Cohn that he, said plaintiff, held certain offsets against said judgment, and that, if he should be compelled to pay said judgment in said action 8450 to the said Ransch, he, the said plaintiff, would deduct the same from the amount of the judgment in favor of said Blake, and that, if the defendant Cohn purchased said judgment, the plaintiff would pay defendant Cohn whatever remained due; that it is not true that the said Charles Cohn purchased the said judgment from the said Blake upon any belief in or reliance upon any promise of the plaintiff to pay the whole of said judgment to the said Charles Cohn; that it is not true that the said Charles Cohn would not have purchased the said judgment except for his belief in or reliance upon any representation or statement of the plaintiff that plaintiff would pay the whole of said judgment."

The court further found, as above stated:

That the sum of $708 paid by Cohn to the attorneys acting for and representing Mrs. Blake in her action against the plaintiff here "is the only sum and the only amount of money which the defendant Cohn in any manner paid out or expended for or on account of said assignment" (of said judgment), and further found "that the defendant Cohn did not pay out or expend such sum or any part thereof, or suffer any loss or prejudice whatever by reason of any statement, act or declaration whatever of the plaintiff, James Arp; that, on or about June 3, 1919, immediately prior to the time when the said defendant Cohn paid out said sum of money and received the said assignment of said judgment the plaintiff, James Arp, notified and informed the defendant, Charles Cohn, that he, the said Arp, would expect credit on said judgment held by said Blake in the event he was ultimately compelled to pay said judgment in said case No. 8450."

It was also found, in response to the allegations of the supplemental complaint filed herein by the plaintiff here, that the plaintiff Arp was compelled to and did pay the amount of the judgment ($3,975) in the Ransch-Blake action upon a duly issued writ of execution, which was placed in hands of the sheriff, with instructions to satisfy the same out of the property of the plaintiff; that plaintiff, to prevent his property from being seized and sold under and by virtue of said writ, paid the amount of said judgment to the sheriff.

[1] The single question presented to us here is whether the above findings, in so far as they relate to the plea of estoppel set up by the defendant Cohn, derive sufficient support from the evidence. The defendant Cohn testified:

That he called at the office of the attorneys of Mrs. Blake in her litigation with the plaintiff to discuss the matter of paying the fee due them from Mrs. Blake for services performed by them for her in said litigation, and of taking over by purchase the judgment then existing in favor of Mrs. Blake against the plaintiff; that he (Cohn) did not care to consummate the deal until he had talked the matter over with plaintiff; that he left the office of the lawyers and within a brief time thereafter met Arp on the street; that he said to Arp that Judge Scott (one of Mrs. Blake's attorneys) "wanted him (Cohn) to buy the judgment that Mrs. Blake has got against you; I told him (Scott) I wouldn't buy anything subject to litigation. * * * 'Now,' I says (addressing Arp), 'that's the situation; you (Arp) are strong on lawsuits and I don't want lawsuits.' He (Arp) says: 'Yes, you have got a judgment and go ahead and buy it; I would rather you would have it than anybody else because I know in case I am short of money you are not going to crowd me.' I says, 'That's all right; I will give you all reasonable time, but I want interest on the principal.'"

Cohn, proceeding, testified that he thereupon told Arp that he (Cohn) would go to Judge Scott's office and give the judge a check for $708, the amount of the attorney's fee. Cohn further testified that the conversation just related was the only one he had with Arp regarding the purchase of said judgment prior to said purchase and that no other persons but Arp and himself were present when it took place. He had also testified that, prior to making such purchase, he had no knowledge of the fact or did not know that Arp had a judgment against Mrs. Blake.

As Cohn testified, no other persons than he and Arp were present when the said conversation took place. Therefore, Arp's was the only testimony other than that of Cohn disclosing the nature of the conversation given at the trial. Arp's testimony materially varied from that of Cohn relative to what was said by them in the conversation. But, before stating the testimony of Arp, or the substance thereof, it should be explained that, after the judgment obtained by Mrs. Blake against Arp became final, two creditors of the former, before the said conversation was had, brought actions against her to recover debts owing to them from her, and each had caused to be served upon Arp a writ of attachment, and thereby garnished the money due from Arp to Mrs. Blake upon said judgment. This garnishment existed at the time the conversation took place between Cohn and Arp relative to the purchase by the former of the Blake-Arp judgment and, of course, Arp was bound thereby. Code Civ. Proc. § 544. Now, as to the nature of the conversation referred to, Arp testified, as Cohn testified, that there was but one conversation between them relative to the Blake-Arp judgment, and, as Cohn also testified, said conversation occurred on the street, where the two happened to meet; that Cohn said to him that he (Cohn) had bought the Blake-Arp judgment from Mrs. Blake, and that he (Arp) replied:

"Well enough, that's all right; I will pay it, but there are several garnishments and I also have a claim against her (Mrs. Blake) for rent.

"Q. Did you tell him that time that you had no claims of any kind? A. No, sir, I did not; I told him I had a bill of the horse pasture and a garnishment by Mr. Allen and one of the Hochheimer Company, and also the J. Ransch judgment that she owed to Ransch which I was trying to make her pay.

"Q. What did he say, if anything? A. Well, he said he didn't have anything to do with that at all; I says, 'I have; they have already garnished me before this;' and so he says, 'I have paid Mr. Scott for the assignment;' he says, 'Yes. Mr. Scott called me up and told me about it; that you were going to pay it off or something like that.'"

On cross-examination Arp testified:

"Q. Now at that time when you had that conversation, what was said between you as to the payment of this Ransch judgment? A. Well, we talked it over there and I told Mr. Cohn about these garnishments against me and also the Ransch judgment against Mrs. Blake and I and Hewitt, and I hadn't occupied the house or received anything about it and * * * had to protect myself; he said he had bought it and I would as soon pay him as anybody else—it didn't make any difference to me; if I had to pay it, I would pay it. * * *

"Q. Didn't you tell him you were glad he had bought the judgment and knew he wouldn't press you and you would be glad to pay him interest on it? A. Not the whole judgment.

"Q. Well, did you distinguish between any particular amounts that you were willing to pay interest on? A. Well, just what was the balance—about twenty-four or twenty-five hundred dollars.

"Q. Well, did you say balance? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you ever tell him what this money was that she owed you? A. Yes; I told him several times.

"Q. You told Charley Cohn what it was? A. Yes.

"Q. Did you tell him in this conversation what it was? A. I told him something like thirteen hundred dollars. * * * He said he didn't know anything about that; that wasn't his business."

[2] It is clear that the testimony, of which a brief résumé is given above, fully upholds the finding that Cohn's special plea by way of estoppel is wanting in sufficient evidentiary support. First, it may be observed that Arp knew (as did Cohn) that the former would in any event be bound by the judgment against him—that is to say, he (Arp) knew that he would be so bound, regardless of whether the ownership thereof remained in the judgment creditor or was in any third party to whom she might assign it, and he (Arp) further knew that he was entitled to claim any set-off he might have against the judgment creditor or against her assignee of said judgment. Civ. Code, § 1432. Hence, it would seem, he could have had no possible reason for concealing from Cohn the fact that he claimed and intended to set up his right to contribution as against the judgment against him for any excess he might be compelled to pay, in satisfying the Ransch-Blake et al. judgment, over and above his share of the obligation. But, be that as it may, according to Cohn, it was Arp's silence as to his claimed right of contribution which constituted the main ground of his "offending," and this was only an act of omission in that he failed to disclose to Cohn that he claimed such right and intended to assert it at the proper time as in recoupment, pro tanto, of the money he appropriated to the payment of the Ransch-Blake et al. judgment in excess of the amount which constituted his share of the obligation. He, however, was not legally required to speak upon the subject, since, obviously, the proposition of Cohn to purchase the Blake-Arp judgment involved a matter or a proposed transaction solely between Mrs. Blake and Cohn, and one with which Arp was in no way or measure connected. Arp was not, nor was he to be, a party to that transaction. He was as much a stranger to it as any person in no manner or form connected with any of the litigation eventuating in the action by Blake against Arp and in which the former obtained the judgment against the latter which Cohn proposed to purchase. Arp, therefore, owed no legal duty to Cohn with respect to the matter of the latter's proposition to purchase the Blake-Arp judgment. He was under no legal obligation to advise Cohn regarding his proposition to buy said judgment, or to suggest to him (Cohn) that there were certain claims and liens existing against or upon said judgment. In Newhall v. Hatch, 134 Cal. 269, 66 P. 266, 55 L. R. A. 673, the obvious proposition is stated that:

> "Mere silence on the part of a party will not create an estoppel, unless he was under some obligation to speak, and a party invoking such estoppel must show that it was the duty of the other to speak, and that he has not only been induced to act by reason of such silence, but that the other had reasonable cause to believe that he would so act."

The court in that case proceeded to say, as we have shown is true here, that there was nothing in the relations between the plaintiff and the defendant which made it the duty of the former to give the latter information regarding the matter as to which it was claimed the alleged estoppel arose.

But the foregoing considerations may be disregarded, and still the finding that the plea of estoppel was not sustained cannot be disturbed, and this upon the proposition that Arp's testimony, as seen, is in sharp conflict with that of Cohn regarding the nature of their conversation, and is, as seen, to the effect that he (Arp) in said conversation told Cohn that he was entitled to an offset as against Mrs. Blake upon the judgment held by her against him, and that he intended to seek the enforcement of said offset.

The argument advanced in the brief of counsel for appellant that, inasmuch as the court found that the conversation between Cohn and Arp occurred before the former's purchase of the Blake-Arp judgment, the further finding that Arp's version of the conversation was true justifies the conclusion that the conversation referred to by Arp must have occurred subsequent to the purchase of said judgment by Cohn, is obviously destitute of merit. Both Cohn and Arp in their testimony were as one upon the fact that there was only one conversation had between them relative to the purchase of said judgment by Cohn. The latter testified that said conversation occurred before he purchased the judgment. Arp did not expressly fix the time that the conversation was had with reference to the time of the purchase of the judgment by Cohn, but did say that in said conversation Cohn told him that he had bought the judgment, from which the inference may be deduced that at the time of the conversation Cohn had already purchased the judgment. The court, as we have seen, found the other way. But it is clearly immaterial, upon the record here, whether the purchase was made prior or subsequent to the time the conversation occurred. If before, then the finding that Arp's version of the conversation—that is, that in said conversation he informed Cohn that he had certain offsets against his (Cohn's) assignor which he (Arp) intended to set up against the judgment—derives sufficient support from the testimony of Arp to that effect. If the conversation occurred at a time subsequent to the purchase of the judgment by Cohn, then obviously, what was said or omitted to be said by Arp in the conversation could not have been a factor entering into the act of Cohn in purchasing the judgment.

Although we have herein given the points presented rather extended consideration, we are constrained to suggest that the case should have been left where the trial court left it.

The judgment is affirmed.

15. Trusts 🔑316(2).

Commission of over $48,000, provided for by will, held not inadequate compensation of executors and trustees for administering estate valued at over $500,000.

16. Trusts 🔑315(2) — Trustees, accepting trust under will limiting compensation, are bound thereby, and court cannot allow greater sum.

Trustees, accepting trust created by will limiting amount of their compensation for services, both as executors and trustees, are bound thereby, and court cannot allow them greater amount.

17. Appeal and error 🔑417(1)—Notice of appeal held not objectionable, as ungrammatical, inartificial and meaningless.

Notice that appellants "hereby appeal to the Supreme Court," etc., "from that certain judgment made in the above-entitled matter on the 5th day of June, 1925, settling, allowing, and approving the first annual account of trustees of said estate, * * * and which judgment or order was rendered in favor of said trustees," held not objectionable, as ungrammatical, inartificial, and meaningless.

18. Trusts 🔑271½.

Court of equity will not interfere with reasonable exercise of trustees' discretion under will in distributing property.

19. Trusts 🔑280—Trustees' refusal to distribute $100,000 to beneficiaries from corpus of estate held not abuse of discretion under will.

Trustees, making three distributions, amounting to some $75,000, within year, and intending to make distributions as frequently as income warranted, held not to have abused discretion under will to so dispose of surplus, not necessary for businesslike management of estate, by refusal to distribute $100,000 to beneficiaries from corpus of estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Willard W. Whitney, deceased, and the administration of the trust under decedent's will. From an order settling the first annual account of George Burnham and another, trustees, Mary E. Whitney and others, beneficiaries, appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

Adam Thompson and Renwick Thompson, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, and B. J. Bradner, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal from certain portions of an order settling the first annual account of trustees under a will. The facts necessary for a discussion of the objections raised show that one Willard W. Whitney died testate in January, 1923, leaving a large estate, consisting of real and personal property. His will was duly admitted to probate in San Diego county, and George Burnham and Herbert E. Anthony were appointed his executors. They proceeded to administer upon the estate, and regular proceedings were had leading up to the distribution, which was made on the 29th day of February, 1924. Under the terms of the will, as modified by its codicils, Mr. Burnham and Mr. Anthony, who were made executors, were also named trustees, and the decedent's entire property was devised and bequeathed to them as such, in trust to manage and dispose of the same, for which purpose they were allowed a period of 10 years to distribute the proceeds in aliquot parts among numerous beneficiaries, some of whom are appellants herein. Under the decree of distribution the assets of the estate on hand at the close of administration were accordingly distributed to them as such trustees and they have since managed them in that capacity. In due time they filed their first annual account as such trustees, which embraced their transactions from February 29, 1924, the date of the decree of distribution, to and including March 24, 1925. This account was settled, the order being made June 5, 1925, and it forms the subject of the present appeal.

We will discuss the various objections in the order in which they are made. The first objection to the account is that it does not appear therefrom what amount of interest, if any, has been received by the trustees from any bank or other deposit source whatever under said trust; nor does it appear from the account what money, if any, has been invested by the trustees under the trust from the money collected from the various sources for said estate; nor does it appear in what banks the funds received were or are invested. It was and is claimed under this objection that the trustees had received not less than $2,500 per month as rents from the real property of the estate, and that they also had received some $25,389.89 distributed to them in cash under the decree of distribution, and it is charged that the trustees, from the commencement of their trusteeship, have had as high as $43,735.57 on deposit in a certain bank in the city of San Diego, without any interest being paid thereon, and that there was, at the time the first account was presented, over $25,000 belonging to the trust fund, and it was not credited with any interest whatsoever; that the trustees should, under the provisions of section 2261 of the Civil Code, be made to account for interest upon these items. That portion of the decedent's will which refers to the duties of the trustees concerning the investment of the funds reads as follows:

> "I hereby direct my said trustees to keep all moneys that may come into their hands as rental, income or otherwise, and to invest and reinvest the same as in their judgment may seem best for the purpose of securing the highest and safest income therefrom for the uses and purpose of the estate."

It also provides that:

> "They are further authorized and empowered to dispose of surplus moneys not necessary for the businesslike management, maintenance and care of the estate from time to time, and in such amounts as they deem best, to the said hereinafter named legatees, said distributions to be pro rata."

Then follows the further provision limiting the trustees to a period of 10 years within which to sell and convert into cash all the real and personal property of the estate and to distribute the same to the beneficiaries. The record shows that, at the time of distribution to the trustees of the assets of the estate, there came into their hands a cash balance of $25,389.89. This balance was on deposit in a bank at San Diego, of which the trustees were officers. It further shows that between the date of the distribution on February 29, 1924, and March 14, 1924, the collections of the trustees amounted to but a few hundred dollars. On the latter date, a period of about two weeks from the date of the making of the decree of distribution, the trustees made a pro rata distribution, in addition to proper disbursements, to the beneficiaries by checks which, after deductions for certain taxes advanced on the distributive shares, aggregated the sum of $25,931.43. The result of this distribution substantially exhausted all the money in the hands of the trustees at this time.

This true condition was not reflected on the ledger account, for the reason that the beneficiaries are widely scattered throughout this country and Canada, and the checks sent them were for some time outstanding. The record further shows that the trustees had sold certain Michigan bank stock belonging to the estate, and had forwarded to the purchaser the certificate, with draft attached for the amount due. At this time the trustees charged themselves with the amount of the sale, though the proceeds thereof did not reach their hands until some time later; the delay being caused by the state of Michigan demanding the sum of $841.08 as an inheritance tax on the same. The actual sale price had been credited to the estate. The amount ultimately received by the trustees for the sale of this stock was the sum of $25,920, which was some $874 less than the amount they had credited the estate with. The difference was thereupon charged back to the trustees' account. During this period of delay, as above described, the ledger sheet showed this amount to be actually in the estate from the time the amount of the draft was credited to it by the trustees, when, as a matter of fact, the sum was not actually on hand. In September, 1924, the trustees made another distribution to the beneficiaries, and the greater portion of the checks representing the amount thereof were outstanding on October 1, 1924. The apparent balance shown by the books did not, therefore, correctly reflect the actual balance. There is also evidence in the record to show that, in addition to these distributions, the trustees made a third one to the beneficiaries immediately after filing their account and before the hearing thereof, so at the time of the settlement of the account the balance appearing was greatly reduced by outstanding checks. Certain oral testimony given by bankers at San Diego was had to show upon what accounts interest would be allowed. There was testimony to the effect that 3 per cent. would be credited on balances upon certain character of checking accounts, but with restrictions upon the checking privilege, and that, where special arrangements were not made, the right to demand advance notice of withdrawals was retained in the event of some banking stringency.

[1, 2] The testimony upon this subject is conflicting. The court found that no interest should be charged to the trustees on account of any balance of cash from time to time in their hands or in the bank during the period covered by the first account. The express and primary object of the trust was to reduce the corpus of the estate into cash and have it distributed among the beneficiaries. It was not the purpose of deceased to have the trustees keep the corpus of the estate invested. It is manifest from the evidence that the trustees are endeavoring to carry out the purposes of the trust, for they have made three distributions to the beneficiaries, amounting to some $75,000 in a little over a year's time, and there is testimony of one of the trustees to the effect that it is the policy of the trustees to make a distribution every 90 days, if possible. Their declared purpose is to continue this practice whenever accumulated amounts are sufficient to warrant a disbursement, consistent with judicious management of the estate. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the court erred in not charging the trustees with interest upon the balances they may have had at certain short periods of the year.

[3-6] We do not wish to be understood, however, as declaring that, where accumulated funds have reached an amount where interest thereon can be obtained, and the distribution of such funds is held in abeyance for any reason for such a length of time that it would amount to a lack of ordinary business prudence for the trustees not to deposit them where they might earn some interest, the trustees would not be liable for a loss of interest. The liability of a trustee to pay interest must be determined from the character of the trust, and the circumstances attending its administration. The general rule is that a trustee, acting in good faith, who keeps funds in his hands ready to distribute should not be charged with interest thereon. 39 Cyc. 422. It is, however, of the most vital importance that trustees be held to a strict and rigid accountability. They must exercise, in the execution of the trust, the degree of care and diligence which a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own affairs.

[7] If, then, in carrying out the manifest intention of the testator, delay in distribution occurs for any reason, and sums accumulate that simple business prudence would dictate should be invested, and such sums are not invested or placed at interest, such omission should and will subject trustees to the payment of the interest they ought to have received. If they become short of this duty, they will be held to a strict personal accountability for any losses which may result from such omissions; and the fact that they neither made nor intended to make any personal gain from their omission would not exonerate them from liability. Here many of the beneficiaries are aged persons, who are in a necessitous condition, and they are desirous of having the amounts due them speedily paid, and the trustees, it seems, are endeavoring to carry out their wishes in this respect, instead of temporarily investing the funds, which they might be justified in doing under the power given them by the terms of the trust. Under these circumstances we are of the opinion that the court properly refused to charge the trustees with interest.

[8] In concluding this subject, it might be well, however, to point out that, in the event of a delay in the making of further distributions, the mere fact that the bank in which the trust funds are deposited, and in which the trustees are officers, pays no interest on sums awaiting distribution, will not relieve the trustees from placing the funds in some other reliable bank that does pay interest.

[9] The next objection is to the effect that the account does not comply with section 1699 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it lacks the detail contemplated by that section. In this connection appellants first complain that the account fails to contain any reference to certain notes and bonds. These notes and bonds were appraised in the estate as being of the value of $17,780. Under the final account in the estate, respondent trustees, as executors, had charged themselves with the full face value of these securities. In their first account as trustees, they have charged themselves with the entire value of the estate distributed to them as trustees after administration. In this list of assets on hand, these securities do not appear, for the reason that they were sold in the course of the administration of the estate, and the amount received for each security, together with the interest thereon, had been there fully and completely accounted for. The decree of distribution in the estate was in evidence at the hearing upon the trustees' first account, and it clearly shows the history of these items. There is no merit in the objection. The same may be said of the item of $300 paid as a real estate dealer's commission for the sale of certain lots. This matter was likewise disposed of in the settlement of the final account of respondents as executors in the estate. The item was therefore properly found by the court to form no part of the trustees' account.

[10] Appellants next object to a lack of detail in the account with respect to the rents collected by the trustees from the real property belonging to the estate. They claim that the account merely shows that an amount in excess of $2,000 has been collected monthly, but that no details of the various payments by the different tenants are set forth, which omission renders the account objectionable. It appeared in evidence that the broker who collected the rents rendered monthly detailed statements to the trustees both as to the names of the tenants and the amount paid by each, accompanied by a check representing the amount of the collections. These statements were in evidence at the hearing. Under these circumstances, the court held, and we think properly so, in passing upon the objection, that no useful purpose would be accomplished by requiring the account to be amplified with respect to the same. The monthly receipts from the real estate were constant, and only varied a few dollars, and were fully accounted for. There is no merit in the objection.

[11] Objection is also made to the agent's charge for the collection of the rents. We are of the opinion that there is no merit in this objection. It cannot be expected that trustees should personally collect the rents due from tenants by making a personal call upon each of them. The charge was a proper one, made in the necessary care and management of the estate. 2 Beach on Trustees, §§ 460, 588; Estate of Graham, 187 Cal. 222, 201 P. 456, 18 A. L. R. 631.

[12] The next objection relates to the order concerning the compensation of respondent trustees under the will. This objection requires a somewhat extended recital of the facts in relation thereto. Under the terms of the will the testator divided his estate into 17 parts, and gave to the recipients of his bounty certain parts or portions thereof. The third clause of the will of the deceased provided in part as follows:

> "In recognition of the many services performed for me during my lifetime, and in appreciation thereof, I direct that there shall be paid to George Burnham of San Diego, California, two-thirds of one part; to William R. Rogers of San Diego, California, two-thirds of one part."

These parties were named as executors and trustees under the will. William R. Rogers predeceased the testator, and in consequence thereof the testator by codicil provided that, in view of the death of Rogers, he nominated and appointed respondent Herbert E. Anthony in the place and stead of Rogers, and he directed that said Anthony be paid the same quantum of his estate as Rogers had been bequeathed, namely, two-thirds of one part. Two-thirds of one part of the estate, according to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, amounts to the sum of $21,860.72. The seventh clause of the will of the deceased provided as follows:

> "As a consideration and compensation to my said executors and trustees for their services in the performance of their duties as executors and trustees under this trust, and in addition to the portions heretofore provided to be given them, and upon a full understanding with them, the said executors and trustees, they are to receive the sum of twenty-five hundred ($2,500.00) dollars each, which said sum is to be paid in full of all their services as such executors and trustees."

At the close of the administration of the estate Burnham and Anthony, as executors, filed their final account and petition for distribution. They filed a waiver of the compensation fixed by the will, and asked for and were given the statutory commissions as executors in lieu thereof, which were fixed in the sum of $4,363, to be divided between them. In the order settling the final account it was provided that the sum allowed was for executors' commissions only, and was exclusive of such compensation as might thereafter be allowed by the court for such services as might be rendered by the executors as trustees under the terms of the will. No appeal was taken from this order, and it became final. When the first account of the trustees as such was heard, they petitioned the court for a reasonable allowance to them as trustees for services rendered in relation to the trust subsequent to the decree of distribution. Appellants herein filed their objection to any order being made for any allowance whatsoever, for the reason that their compensation had been specifically fixed and determined by the will of the deceased, and under the express provisions of section 2274 of the Civil Code they were entitled to the sum specified therein, and no more.

The court disregarded the objection. In the order settling the first annual account of the trustees, the court decreed that the bequests made by decedent to Burnham and Anthony of two-thirds of one part each of the estate, and the value of the same, were not matters having any connection with their compensation as executors or trustees, and adjudged them to be entitled to the sum of $2,500 each for their services as trustees. It was further ordered, however, that payment of the same should be held in abeyance until the further order of the court. We are of the opinion that the court erred in giving such a construction to the instrument. That the legacy of two-thirds of one part of the estate given to respondents was given as part consideration for their services in both capacities there can be no question. The language of the will is plain and unequivocal in this respect. It recites that as a consideration and compensation, and in addition to the portions heretofore provided to be given them, which has reference to these legacies, and upon a full understanding with them, the said executors and trustees are to receive the sum of $2,500 each, which sum is to be paid for all their services as such. We cannot conceive what language could be employed to more plainly indicate that the legacies were given to respondents in part consideration for the services to be performed under their two functions and duties. Any other construction would be contrary to the letter and spirit of the will. We do not deem an extended discussion of the subject necessary. The instrument speaks for itself.

[13, 14] The order of the court allowing respondents an additional sum, was therefore without authority. Where an instrument by which a trust is created fixes the compensation of the trustees they cannot claim a larger sum. They are entitled to the amount specified, and no more. Civ. Code, § 2274; Estate of Runyon, 125 Cal. 195, 57 P. 783. Their acceptance of the trust will be held as an agreement to receive such compensation as the instrument directs. In any event, they may not elect, as here, to take a legacy given as part consideration for their services, and a larger additional amount than the instrument provides for, and the mere fact that respondents attempted to separate their duties as executors from that as trustees and to have their fees apportioned can in no manner affect the limitations contained in the will, which recites that the compensation provided for shall be in full for their services as executors and trustees. The order settling the final account of respondents as executors, wherein they were allowed certain fees as such, in no manner attempts to change or alter the situation. The mere fact, therefore, that this order has become final, does not have the effect of enlarging the limited amount which the will provides for the services of respondents in both capacities, and the amount of the payment to them as executors should be taken into account when they ultimately receive the fees provided for.

[15, 16] Something is said in the brief of respondents concerning the inadequacy of their compensation for administering upon an estate the value of which is over $500,000. If we are correct in our construction of the will with reference to the compensation of respondents, there is no force in this suggestion, as the total commissions provided for amount to the sum of $48,721.44, or nearly one-tenth of the value of the estate. Then, again, if the amount was deemed by them inadequate they could have refused to act. However this may be, the will having limited the amount which respondents should receive as compensation for their services, both as executors and trustees, and they having accepted their trust, they are bound thereby, and the order of the court allowing them a greater amount is without authority.

[17] Respondents have taken exception to the form of the notice of appeal. They claim it is ungrammatical, inartificial, and meaningless. The notice, among other things, recites that appellants "hereby appeal to the Supreme Court," etc., "from that certain judgment made in the above-entitled matter on the 5th day of June, 1925, settling, allowing, and approving the first annual account of trustees of said estate and trust of said deceased as presented to said court, and which judgment or order was rendered in favor of said trustees and against the aforesaid objectors." We do not feel that any useful purpose would be gained by following the argument of attorneys for respondents in their analysis or grammatical construction of the notice. It is sufficient to say that in our opinion the objection is hypercritical and without merit.

[18, 19] Appellants finally complain of the action of the court in refusing to direct the trustees to distribute the sum of $100,000 to the beneficiaries from the corpus of the estate, it being claimed that such a distribution can be made in the proper exercise of a reasonable discretion considering the condition of the estate. Upon the subject the will expressly provides that the trustees shall keep all of the real estate that may come into their possession rented and producing income, so far as the same is possible, and it directs them to make such repairs as in their judgment may seem best for the purpose of securing the highest rentals possible. It further provides that the trustees keep all funds that may come into their hands as rental, income, or otherwise, and invest or reinvest the same as in their judgment may seem best, and authority is expressly conferred upon them to dispose of surplus money not necessary for the businesslike management and care of the estate, by making distributions from time to time to the legatees. In the event of a sale of the real estate the will directs that the trustees shall make immediate distribution of the proceeds received therefrom among the different legatees. By another subdivision a period of 10 years is given the trustees to dispose of and distribute the entire estate.

Under these provisions it is manifest that a certain discretion is vested in the trustees in the matter of distributing the personal property. Under such circumstances a court of equity will not interfere with the reasonable exercise of such discretion. There is nothing in the record to show that up to the present time the trustees have abused this power. They have already made three distributions, amounting to some $75,000, within a year's time, and it was in evidence that they intend to make distributions as frequent as the income amounts to proper proportions. Under these circumstances, the court was justified in refusing the order requested.

From what we have said, it follows that the order must be affirmed upon all questions except that relating to the compensation of the trustees. That portion of the order must be and it is hereby reversed, with directions to the court below to strike therefrom the amount awarded to the trustees, and to confine the compensation of respondents to the amounts given to them under the express provisions of the will, as full compensation for their services in both their capacities as executors and trustees. In determining this amount the trustees should be charged with the sum already received by them as executors.

BERETTONI v. SARGENTINI et al.
(Civ. 5527.)

1. Fraud ⚿59(2).

Measure of damages for deceit is difference between actual value of property and its value, had it been as represented, and depreciation in value of improvements placed on it by plaintiff.

2. Fraud ⚿58(1)—Evidence held not to sustain verdict for deceit for amount of purchase price of restaurant and amount paid for improvements.

In action for deceit in sale of one-fourth interest in restaurant for 6 months on false representation that abatement proceedings had been continued for 6 months, where restaurant was closed by abatement before expiration of 6 months, evidence not showing depreciation in value of improvements added by purchaser, nor actual value of estate bargained for, nor for the time while the restaurant was open, held not to sustain verdict for amount of purchase price and amount paid for improvements.

3. Fraud ⚿47—Complaint for deceit in sale of interest in restaurant held to state cause of action.

Complaint for deceit in sale of interest in restaurant held not to fail to state cause of action, because not directly alleging injury and the elements of injury, since it alleged deceit and matters out of which general damages would necessarily arise and these need not be specified.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action for deceit by Romeo Berettoni against A. Sargentini and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellants.

H. S. Young, and R. G. Hudson, both of San Francisco (B. F. Rabinowitz, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. Action for deceit. Judgment for plaintiff as prayed, and from that judgment the defendants have appealed, bringing up a bill of exceptions. In their brief the appellants present several points. Among others are the points that the plaintiff's complaint did not state a cause of action, because no damages were alleged nor the amount of the damages; and, second, that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, because there was no evidence that the plaintiff was damaged, or, if he was damaged, the extent or amount of his damage. In view of the conclusion which we have reached, we do not find it necessary to consider any other question than the sufficiency of the evidence.

Prior to the 22d day of June, 1922, 5 different persons owned the Buon Gusto Restaurant, situated at 503 Broadway, San Francisco. On the date last mentioned, the prohibition authorities commenced abatement proceedings against the restaurant. Process was duly served on the owners, and, from time to time, orders were made extending the time for the defendants to appear and plead. The last order extending time was filed on the 31st day of August, 1922. Thereafter on the 16th day of October, 1922, the plaintiff and the defendants had a conversation regarding the purchase by the plaintiff from the defendants of their one-fourth interest in the restaurant. In the oral negotiations the plaintiff testified that the defendants represented to him that the abatement proceeding had been continued 6 months from the last part of September, 1922, and, relying on that statement, that he bought their one-fourth interest and paid down $500 on October 16, 1922, and later that he paid $2,000, the balance of the purchase price. He further testified that for $2.-500 he bought a one-fourth interest in the restaurant for 6 months. It was stipulated by counsel that on February 20, 1923, the restaurant was locked pursuant to the decree rendered in the abatement proceedings. When the second payment was made, a bill of sale was executed acknowledging the payment of the money, and that bill of sale recites:

> That the vendor had sold "all his right, title, and interest in that certain restaurant known as Buon Gusto Restaurant at 503 Broadway, in said city, and all tables, chairs, benches, counters, furnishings, fixtures, linens, dishes, silverware, cooking utensils, ranges, cash register, glassware, and all other personal property being at and used in connection with the carrying on of said restaurant business, together with the good will of said business, and the municipal dance license."

Much evidence was introduced regarding what conversations were had between the contracting parties, but no evidence was introduced by either party regarding the value of the tangible assets, or intangible assets, of the entire restaurant, nor of any interest therein. No evidence was introduced regarding the income derived from the restaurant business either before or after the date of the sale. In addition to the fact that the plaintiff paid $2,500 in 2 payments as above recited, the plaintiff testified:

> "My share of a bill paid Mr. Jesti for improvements in the restaurant was $75. My share for fixtures, lamps, was $31. My share of allowance on the old piano traded in was $212.50. My share of a bill for painting was $25."

No other evidence was introduced that could be said to be evidence on damages. The jury returned a verdict as follows:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause find a verdict in favor of plaintiff, Romeo Berettoni, and against defendants A. Sargentini and A. Micheletti for the sum of $2,500 investment plus $300 paid for improvements."

At the close of the case, and after all of the evidence had been received and taken, the defendants made a motion that the trial court direct a verdict in their favor, because there was no evidence whatsoever that the plaintiff had sustained any damage. The motion was denied. In due time the defendants made a motion for a new trial based on each and all of the statutory grounds. Their motion for a new trial was denied.

[1, 2] The measure of damages in this kind of an action has been differently stated in 2 different rules. Under the first rule, the injured party is given compensatory damages in such sum as will reimburse the injured party for the injury he has sustained. Where he retains the property, he will be given damages amounting to the difference between the sum that the property is actually worth and the purchase price. That rule is not the one that obtains in California. The rule that does obtain in California, and which we will call the second rule, is that the damages will be ascertained as the difference between the actual value of the property and its value had the property been as represented. In connection with this rule, the plaintiff may likewise show and recover for the depreciation in the value of improvements which he may have placed upon the property. Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 510, 143 P. 729. Acting upon the request of the respondent, the trial court read to the jury an instruction which embodied the first rule. No other instruction concerning the measure of damages was given. The instruction was more favorable to the appellants than they were entitled to. However, be that as it may, there was no evidence before the court from which the jury could compute what was the actual value of the estate which the plaintiff took and enjoyed. The jury were wholly unable, therefore, to apply the first rule.

Although the jury was not instructed as to the elements of the second rule, there was introduced some evidence regarding the cost of improvements installed by the respondent, but there was no evidence showing depreciation in the value of those improvements either before or after the restaurant was abated, neither was there any evidence introduced by either party of the actual value of the estate bargained for, to wit, a one-fourth interest in the restaurant for a period of 6 months, nor was any evidence introduced by either party showing the value of a one-fourth interest in the restaurant for 4 months and 7 days. From the face of the verdict, it appears that the jury adopted an interpretation of the instructions which it had received that was at variance with each of the rules which we have stated. In arriving at what it considered compensatory relief, the jury awarded to the plaintiff the total amount of all his expenditures and did not charge him with anything of value as having been received and retained by him; whereas, as the case was presented to the jury, there was no showing to the contrary but what the properties received by the plaintiff were worth as much or more than the plaintiff paid therefor, and that he had not been injured at all. The contention of the appellants, that the evidence on the elements of damage was insufficient, must be sustained. Munson v. Fishburn, 183 Cal. 206, 219, 220, 190 P. 808; Stouffer v. Eymann, 41 Cal. App. 556, 183 P. 210.

[3] The appellants urge that the complaint failed to state a cause of action because it did not directly allege that the plaintiff was injured and the elements of his injury. The authorities cited by the appellants are not exactly in point. This case falls within the doctrine stated in George Cople Co. v. Hindes, 34 Cal. App. 576, 170 P. 155.

Marriage between adult woman and boy under 21 but over 18 years old, without written consent of his parents, guardian, or person having charge of him, is not void, but voidable, and only by him, in view of Civ. Code, § 56, as amended by St. 1921, p. 333, providing any male under 21 and over 18 years with consent of parents or guardian is capable of consenting to and consummating marriage, and in view of sections 69, 80, 82, subd. 1.

2. Appeal and error 🔑882(19)—In action for annulment of marriage on ground of defendant's insufficient age, where defendant defaulted and subsequently filed answer asking for annulment, but did not take further proceedings, plaintiff might not urge that court should have granted defendant relief.

In action for annulment of marriage on ground of defendant's insufficient age, where defendant's default was entered December 28th, and defendant, on February 8th, filed an answer admitting the allegations of complaint and asking for annulment, but was not present nor represented on trial and did not appeal or file brief on appeal, held, plaintiff might not urge that court should have granted relief to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ira F. Thompson, Judge.

Action for annulment of marriage by Bertha Maye Campbell against James Stanley Campbell. Judgment of dismissal, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank G. Falloon, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

L. R. Godward, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem. This is a suit brought by a wife, an adult, against her husband, a minor, to have her marriage to the minor husband annulled. Defendant appeared by his guardian ad litem and admitted the allegations of the complaint, and prayed for like relief. The record shows that the case came on regularly for trial on February 19, 1924, the plaintiff appearing by counsel, "the defendant not being present and not being represented," etc. The court found the facts as follows:

> "I. That plaintiff and defendant are residents of the county of Los Angeles, state of California; that a marriage license was issued to them on June 12, 1922, by the county clerk of San Bernardino county, Cal., and that they thereafter, and pursuant to said marriage license, went through a marriage ceremony.
> "II. That at the time of said ceremony defendant was under the age of 21 years, and he did not then and there, or at all, have the consent, either verbally or written, of either one of his parents or of his guardian to said marriage, and no written consent of any kind, character, or nature whatsoever was filed with the county clerk of San Bernardino county at the time of issuing the marriage license under which said marriage was solemnized.
> "III. That the parties hereto have not cohabited or lived together since August 1, 1922; that defendant will not be 21 years of age until March 5, 1924."

And as conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court concludes:

> "I. That plaintiff does not have the right to bring this action. Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiff is denied relief, and said action is hereby dismissed."

This is an appeal upon the judgment roll. The respondent has filed no brief. Appellant has filed a very short brief of only three pages.

[1] The findings above quoted show that at the date of marriage, June 12, 1922, the defendant husband was under 21 years of age, but over 18 years of age, and that no written consent was filed with the clerk issuing the marriage license, and that at the time of the trial of the case the defendant was under 21 years of age.

The court evidently denied plaintiff relief on the theory that subdivision 1 of section 82, Civil Code, prevented plaintiff from instituting the case. Subdivision 1 of section 82, Civil Code, which has remained substantially unchanged since enactment in 1872, reads:

> "82. Causes for Annulling Marriages.—A marriage may be annulled for any of the following causes, existing at the time of the marriage:
> "One. That the party in whose behalf it is sought to have the marriage annulled was under the age of legal consent, and such marriage was contracted without the consent of his or her parents or guardian, or person having charge of him or her; unless, after attaining the age of consent, such party for any time freely cohabited with the other as husband or wife." (Italics ours.)

The plaintiff is, of course, "the party in whose behalf it is sought to have the marriage annulled," and she was not "under the age of legal consent", etc., at the time of the marriage, as the findings above quoted show, and it would seem that the action of the trial court was proper and should be upheld if subdivision 1 of section 82 of the Civil Code is to be given full force and effect.

*Hearing denied by Supreme Court September 16, 1926.

Section 80 of the Civil Code treats of void marriages, and reads:

> "80. Void Marriages.—Either party to an incestuous or void marriage may proceed, by action in the superior court, to have the same so declared."

Section 69 of the Civil Code deals with marriage licenses, and, among other matters, contains the following:

> "If the male is under the age of twenty-one years, or the female is under the age of eighteen years, and such person has not been previously married, no license must be issued by the county clerk unless the consent in writing of the parents of the person under age or one of such parents, or of his or her guardian is presented to him, duly verified by such parents or parent, or guardian; and such consent must be filed by the clerk, and he must state such facts in the license. For the purpose of ascertaining all the facts mentioned or required in this section, the clerk, at the time the license is applied for, may, if he deems it necessary in order to satisfy himself as to matters in this section enumerated, examine the male applicant for a license on oath, which examination shall be reduced to writing by the clerk, and subscribed by him." Amendment approved 1907, St. 1907, p. 305.

Prior to an amendment approved May 23, 1921, section 56 of the Civil Code read:

> "56. Capability of Minors to Contract Marriage.—Any unmarried male of the age of twenty-one years or upwards and any unmarried female of the age of eighteen years or upwards, and not otherwise disqualified, is capable of consenting to and consummating marriage."

By an amendment approved May 23, 1921, the following was added to section 56 of the Civil Code:

> "Provided that any male under the age of twenty-one years and over the age of eighteen years and any female under the age of eighteen years and over the age of sixteen years, with the consent in writing of the parents of the person under age, or one of such parents, or of his or her guardian, where such written consent is filed by the clerk issuing the marriage license, as provided in section sixty-nine of the Civil Code, is capable of consenting to and consummating marriage."

See St. 1921, p. 333.

It will be seen that the amendment to section 56 of the Civil Code, adopted May 23, 1921, raised the ages of parties "capable of consenting to and consummating marriage" from 18 to 21 years in males, and from 16 to 18 years in females, and also added the proviso above set forth.

The appellant contends that the addition of the proviso by the amendment of May 23, 1921, to section 56 of the Civil Code, the Legislature intended to make void ab initio the marriage of a male under the age of 21 and a female under the age of 18, unless the consent in writing of the parents of the person under age is filed with the clerk issuing the marriage license, and, therefore, as such a marriage is absolutely void, either party can have such a marriage so declared. We do not think the Legislature intended such a result. We think the purpose of the proviso added to section 56 of the Civil Code in 1921 was to raise the age of consent of a female from 15 to 16 years, and was a re-enactment in legal effect of the portion of section 69, Civil Code, relative to the issuing of marriage licenses.

A construction that such language does not make a marriage so contracted void is in harmony with the weight of authorities. In 38 Corpus Juris, p. 1305, it is there stated:

> "By statutes now in force in practically all the states the consent of parent or guardian is required to the marriage of an infant, but the general rule is that, unless the statute expressly declares a marriage contracted without the prescribed consent to be a nullity, it is to be construed as only directory in this respect, so that this marriage will be valid, although the disobedience to the statute may entail penalties on the licensing or officiating authorities"—citing authorities including In re Ambrose, 170 Cal. 160, 149 P. 43.

The same doctrine is stated in California Jurisprudence, vol. 16, p. 913, where it is stated:

> "The marriage of a minor below the age of consent is voidable only"—citing People v. Souleotes, 26 Cal. App. 309, 146 P. 903.

To the same effect is the leading case of People v. Pizzura, 10 A. L. R. 405, and notes. See, also, for very full discussion, 3 Am. Ruling Cases, p. 64, where the case of State ex rel. Scott v. Lowell, 78 Minn. 166, 80 N. W. 877, 46 L. R. A. 440, 79 Am. St. Rep. 358, and where many notes will be found especially note on Infancy, p. 71.

> "A statute providing at what ages marriage may be entered into will not change the common-law rule, and statutes prohibiting a marriage under an age specified, in the absence of an express declaration that it should be void, are commonly held directory merely, and the contract not void, but voidable." Schouler on Marriage and Divorce (2d Ed.) vol. 2, § 1122.

In section 1123 of the same volume is found the following:

> "Where one of the parties is under the age fixed by the statute, but is competent by the common law, the marriage is not void, but merely voidable and is valid until annulled."

While the foregoing states the general rule, there is authority to the contrary. See Keezer on Marriage and Divorce (2d Ed.) p. 150, § 199, citing Johnson v. Alexander, 39 Cal. App. 117, 178 P. 297. This case holds that a marriage is neither void nor voidable because of the failure of the county clerk to obtain consent of the parent in issuing a license to a female under the age of 18 years, and decides an annulment of a marriage of a female is possible under subdivision 1 of section 82, Civil Code, only when she was under the age of 15 at the time of the marriage and the consent of her parents or gaurdian had not been previously obtained. This decision was handed down in December, 1918.

But in June, 1923, in the case of West v. West, 62 Cal. App. 541, 217 P. 567, the Appellate Court, Second Appellate District, Division 2, speaking through Mr. Justice Craig, decided that a male under the age of 18 at the time of marriage, which was contracted without the consent of his parents or guardian, and he and the defendant never having cohabited together, after he attained the age of 18 years was entitled to have the marriage annulled under section 82 of the Civil Code. See, also, notes in 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1202; L. R. A. 1916C, 740; 17 Ann. Cas. 94.

It will thus be seen that upon reason and the great weight of authority a marriage contracted by an adult with a minor is not void ab initio under our statutes, but voidable, only, and cannot be annulled by the adult, but by the party who, at the time of the marriage, was under the age of legal consent, as provided in subdivision 1 of section 82 of our Civil Code.

[2] The appellant contends that as the defendant (respondent minor) filed an answer admitting all the allegations of appellant's complaint and prayed for the same relief, that such answer was in effect a cross-complaint, seeking annulment, and that appropriate relief should have been granted. But the record shows that the default of defendant was entered December 28, 1923. Subsequently, however, on February 8, 1924, the defendant filed an answer. Thereafter, upon the day the case was tried, the record shows: "The defendant not being present and not being represented." The defendant took no appeal and he has filed no brief in the case upon appeal. Under such a state of the record the plaintiff and appellant cannot be heard to complain and urge that the court should have granted relief to the defendant and respondent.

For reasons stated the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

PURDY v. JOHNSON et al. (Civ. 4764.)

1. Trusts 🔑279—Trustees authorized under trust to provide for minor beneficiaries held warranted under facts in making payment for such purpose, for which they should be allowed credit.

Trustees, authorized under trust to provide for minor beneficiaries out of trust estate if beneficiaries' father failed to support them, were justified in paying sum for support and maintenance to their stepmother upon authorization of their father, as their guardian, he being without funds, and should be allowed credit therefor on an accounting.

2. Trusts 🔑219(2)—Trustees mingling trust funds with their personal funds and using them for their own advantage will be charged compound interest (Civ. Code, § 2262).

Where trustees have mingled money belonging to trust with their own funds and used them for their own advantage, courts will charge them with legal interest compounded annually, in view of Civ. Code, § 2262, to carry into effect rule that trustee shall make no unauthorized profit from use of trust funds.

3. Trusts 🔑179.

When acting in good faith, trustees should be treated with liberality and indulgence.

4. Trusts 🔑219(2)—Imposition of compound interest on balances found due was unjustified, where these were constructive only and trustees had acted in good faith.

Where trustees at no time had any trust funds to invest and had at all times acted in good faith, imposition of compound interest on annual balances found due was unjustified, notwithstanding inadvertent errors in their accounts, where these balances were constructive only.

5. Trusts 🔑315(2)—Compensation of $500 per annum to each of two trustees for management of estate, consisting of agricultural property valued at over $120,000, held reasonable.

Compensation of $500 per annum, allowed each of two trustees, held a reasonable amount, where the estate consisted of agricultural property originally valued at over $120,000, and which had during their management trebled in value, and where their duties were onerous.

6. Trusts 🔑321—Upon casting new account with consent of trustees, disallowance of compensation to them and charging interest on compensation previously allowed held unwarranted.

Where trustees consented to have their prior accounts vacated and that a new account be taken, action of court in disallowing trustees any compensation and charging them with interest on reasonable compensation allowed them on settlement of prior account, held unwarranted, notwithstanding errors in their accounts, when made in good faith.

7. Trusts ⚿219(1)—Allowance of sum to trustees for current accounts from annual balances found due with interest charge on remainder held improper, where disbursements exceeded receipts.

That trustees were allowed to retain sum to meet current accounts from each annual constructive balance found in favor of beneficiary on casting their account and were charged interest upon remainder for failure to invest held unwarranted, under showing that for several years disbursements exceeded receipts with such allowance permitted to be retained.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Benito County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Anita Christal Purdy against Robert Johnson and another, as trustees under the will of Alberto Trescony, deceased, to enforce a trust and for an accounting. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed as modified.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellants.

Houghton & Houghton and Edward T. Houghton, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Appeal by defendants from a judgment obtained against them in an action to enforce a trust and for an accounting. This is the second appeal in the case.

At the first trial the court found a balance in favor of the defendant trustees in the sum of $8,996.17. An appeal was taken by the plaintiff and the judgment was reversed. Purdy v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 521, 163 P. 893. Upon retrial a different department of the superior court found a balance in favor of the plaintiffs amounting to the sum of $10,981.74. The present appeal is from this judgment.

The plaintiff is the granddaughter of one Alberto Trescony, who died testate in the year 1892. The appellants J. A. Trescony and Robert F. Johnson were respectively son and son-in-law of the testator and were the executors of his will, and they were also named therein as trustees of an undivided one-third of the residue of the estate for the benefit of the plaintiff and her brother, Leo A. Christal, who were the children of a deceased daughter of the testator. At the close of the administration of the estate a decree of distribution was made by the terms of which one-third of the residue of said estate was distributed to the defendants as trustees for the benefit of plaintiff and her brother until they should reach the age of 30 years, at which time their respective shares were to be transferred over to them upon certain conditions. The estate was distributed April 2, 1894, and for a time all of the real property was managed as a whole, but on August 2, 1895, partition was had, and through these proceedings there was set apart to the defendant trustees some 15,336 acres of land in severalty in lieu of the one-third interest theretofore distributed to them.

The complaint contains two counts, the second of which charges misconduct and impropriety on the part of the defendants in the management of the trust estate. It is there alleged that while acting as trustees defendants filed some six accounts of their transactions, five of which were settled by the court and had become final. It is then charged that plaintiffs did not have notice or knowledge of the presentation of these accounts, or of the hearing and settlement thereof. Then follow averments that defendants have carelessly and negligently managed their trust in certain particulars and so carelessly kept the accounts thereof as to deprive plaintiff of a large amount of rents, income, and assets to which she is entitled. With reference to the sixth account it is charged that as a result of the failure of the trustees to keep proper accounts the plaintiff has been wrongfully debited with a sum of money as due from her to the trustees, whereas, in truth and in fact, the trustees are indebted to her in a sum exceeding seven thousand dollars. The prayer of the complaint is that the court enforce the trust by directing that defendants convey to plaintiff an undivided one-half interest in the trust property; that the orders of the superior court settling the first five accounts be set aside and corrected and modified to conform with the true facts; and that said trustees be compelled to account to the plaintiff for all their dealings and transactions with the property of the trust estate; that on such accounting the trustees be charged with interest from the time of the reception by them of all funds wrongfully withheld.

The answer of the trustees denies all of the alleged misconduct and declares the willingness on their part to transfer to plaintiff her share of the estate. It alleges that plaintiff is indebted to defendants in a sum approximating $14,000. The answer further denies all of the charges affecting the propriety or conclusiveness of the settling of the first five accounts, but declares that, "inasmuch as the plaintiff seems to be dissatisfied with the accounts referred to in her complaint," the defendants join in plaintiff's prayer and ask that the orders settling said five accounts be vacated, and that a new account be taken covering the entire period of the duration of the trust, and that upon payment of the amount found to be due by or to the plaintiff, she receive from the defendants a conveyance of her interest in the trust property.

Upon the first trial as above indicated judgment went in favor of defendants in the sum of $8,996.17. All of the charges made by plaintiff with reference to concealment, misconduct, or negligence by the trustees were there negatived by the findings. It was also found that, while there were some errors in the accounts, such errors were inadvertently made, and that in all matters connected with the trust estate and the management thereof the trustees had acted with the utmost fidelity toward the beneficiaries and had conducted their trust with prudence and economy. Among the findings was one to the effect that the sum of $500 per annum was a reasonable amount to be allowed to said trustees as their compensation.

The findings were attacked on appeal. The judgment in favor of the trustees was reversed. Several of the disputed items in the account were reviewed on this appeal, and it was there held that the allowance of these disputed items by the lower court justified a reversal of the judgment. The case was therefore remanded for the taking of a new account in accordance with the established principles of equity. In reversing the judgment the court had occasion to point out that the lower court adopted a course with reference to the trial that was irregular. The plaintiff had insisted that the trustees prove the correctness of the account. The course adopted permitted them to take the stand and subject themselves to cross-examination without any direct examination on their own behalf. This was held to be a fundamental misapprehension of the nature and extent of the obligation of trustees to account to their beneficiaries. It was declared that the burden of proof was upon the trustees to establish affirmatively the propriety of the charges and credits which were assailed, and that, while the adherence of this rule might result, considering their method of keeping the accounts, in the trustees being compelled to forego repayment of sums which they may have had properly and in good faith expended for the benefit of the trust, and being charged with having received money in cases where they had not in fact received it, their good faith could not save them from the consequences of this neglect, and whatever doubts might arise from their failure to keep proper records, or their inability to establish all the items of their accounts, must be resolved against them.

Appellants do not here complain of this rule, as it is admitted that the trustees were farmers, unfamiliar with bookkeeping, and who had large interests of their own to attend to and did not keep full and accurate accounts of their transactions, in consequence of which they are mulcted in a large sum of money for which they are morally entitled to credit. They do contend, however, that, although the trial took place some 24 years after the creation of the trust, the record shows clearly that as to certain of the disallowed items everything necessary to support them as proper charges fully appeared. The denial of a credit of these charges, and the infliction of compound interest as a penalty, it is claimed, accounts for the wiping out of the balance which was found in favor of the trustees at the first trial, as predicted by the court on appeal, and is largely responsible for creating the heavy balance now found against them, a sum, it is admitted, considering the passing of time and the accumulation of legal interests, with annual rests, has reached such proportions as will tax the ability of appellants to pay. One of the items which it is contended was wrongfully disallowed has reference to the sum of $2,500 claimed to have been paid by the trustees for the maintenance and support of the beneficiaries. With reference to this item the record shows that on November 9, 1895, the trustees filed their first account, which included the item in question. The trial court on the instant hearing refused to allow the trustees credit for this expenditure, and charged them 7 per cent. simple interest thereon from November 30, 1894, to November 30, 1908, a period of some 14 years, aggregating in principal and interest the sum of $4,950. The facts in connection with this item show that one Dr. J. F. Christal, a son-in-law of the testator, was the father of the two beneficiaries. That there was ill feeling between these parties is evidenced by the will of Alberto Trescony, for it is provided therein that in case Dr. Christal shall fail, for any reason, to properly provide for these beneficiaries, the trustees shall pay out of their interest in the estate such amount as will, in their judgment, suitably and properly provide for them. The will also contains a direction that in no event shall any of the moneys so paid or expended be placed in the hands of or be handled by Christal. In this connection the will further declared it to be the unqualified wish and direction of the testator that the executors and trustee see to it that the said Christal did not enjoy or get into his hands anything that the testator ever owned.

The will was admitted to probate in October, 1892. Thereafter Dr. J. F. Christal, the father of the beneficiaries, was appointed guardian of their persons and estates, and these beneficiaries, through their guardian, brought an unsuccessful proceeding to revoke the probate thereof. S. F. Geil and Messrs. Pierson and Mitchell were the attorneys representing the guardian in this litigation. The beneficiaries during the early years of the trust resided with their relatives, the trustees, and also at times with their father and Nellie Christal, their stepmother. Dr. Christal, being without means, addressed a communication as guardian of the minors to the trustees on April 3, 1894, authorizing and directing them to pay to Nellie Christal the sum of $2,500 for the maintenance and support of the minors from the date of the death of Alberto Trescony to the date of the order, a period of some two years. The notice further authorized them to continue the payment of the sum of $200 per month from the date of the order until written notice to the contrary. The trustees were further advised that a receipt for the amount of $2,500 had been intrusted to Nellie Christal, who had placed the same in the hand of Pierson and Mitchell and S. F. Geil for the purpose of collection.

Acting upon the authority given them under the will and in pursuance of the demand of the guardian, the trustees paid the amount, and a receipt was given to them signed by the guardian, Dr. Christal, and his wife, Nellie Christal, and countersigned by the attorneys above mentioned. Thereafter an order was made by the superior court directing the trustees to pay to the guardian the sum of $250 monthly for the care and maintenance of the minors. The first account filed by the trustees included the charge of $2,500. This account was prepared by the attorney for the trustees, and in listing the expenditures in the account he recited that it was paid to Geil under an agreement with the executors of the estate of Trescony. The instant account was prepared by an expert accountant, who listed the item as "S. F. Geil, Legal Expenses." The first account was settled and allowed on May 16, 1896, and from that time until the commencement of this action on November 21, 1911, a period of some 15 years, no objection was ever made to it. Plaintiff had been represented by a guardian until March 21, 1898, when the period of her minority ended. She reached the age of 30 years on March 21, 1910, and on November 18, 1911, she instituted the present litigation, the other beneficiary not joining. In passing upon this particular item of the account in the instant proceeding the trial court was of the opinion that it was an improper payment to attorneys employed by the guardian to contest the will of Trescony, and for that reason rejected it.

We are of the opinion that there is no evidence in the record to support this action. While it appears that an order was on September 6, 1893, made by the superior court authorizing the guardian to enter into a contract with the attorneys for such purpose, the order expressly provided that compensation should be paid to them in the event only of a successful prosecution of such contest. The litigation being unsuccessful, they were entitled to nothing. The voucher accompanying the accounts shows that the item was paid for the support and maintenance of the minors. It recites the demand of the guardian upon the executors for the amount covering the period above mentioned, the receipt of the sum, signed by both the guardian and his wife, and countersigned by the attorney. The manner of the listing of the item by the parties who prepared the different accounts no doubt controlled the court in reaching the conclusion that the expenditure was for legal services. The voucher disproves any such theory, and the positive testimony of the trustee, Trescony, shows that he was no party to any agreement that the sum should be used for the payment of attorney's fees, but that, on the contrary, the payment was made for the support and maintenance of the minors for the period stated as recited in the vouchers from which the accounts were made up. There is nothing in the record to dispute this evidence. It is true that during his examination he stated that he presumed that some of it might have been used for attorney's fees, but that he knew nothing at all about the matter. The only fair construction to be given to his testimony as a whole is that the trustee paid the sum for the support of the beneficiaries under the power given to them and in compliance with the imperative demand of the guardian and his attorneys. Mr. Geil, Mr. Mitchell, Dr. Christal, and Nellie Christal were all dead at the time of the instant hearing, and in consequence no evidence could be obtained from them on the subject. Even conceding that an improper use of the funds had been made by the guardian of the beneficiaries, the trustees were in no position to control such a situation. That was a matter to be settled by the court appointing the guardian when his account came up for settlement. However this may be, and in conclusion upon this subject, we are of the opinion that there is no evidence in the record from which the trial court could rightfullly conclude that the item in question was paid for any other purpose than that stated in the voucher, namely, for the support and maintenance of the minors.

[1] The trustees were authorized under the express terms of the trust to make such a payment, and were justified under the facts in doing so. The rejection of this item therefore was without warrant, and the trustees should receive credit for the same. Appellants further complain that the portion of the decree which charges them with compound interest with annual rests is neither equitable nor just, as there was no actual bad faith or intentional wrongdoing on their part. The theory upon which this charge was imposed is reflected in the findings of the trial court to the effect that the trustees failed to invest the trust funds, and wrongfully and fraudulently mingled a large amount thereof with their own, for their private use and benefit. It is claimed that there is nothing in the record that supports this conclusion.

[2] The rule is firmly established in this state by a long and unbroken series of decisions, and may now well be regarded as one of the elementary truths of the law, that where trustees have mingled money belonging to a trust with their own funds and used them for their own advantage, courts will charge them with compound interest. Section 2262 of our Civil Code provides, in substance, that if a trustee omits to invest trust funds he must pay simple interest thereon, if such omission is negligent, and compound interest if it is willful. The latest expression upon this subject is found in Gaver v. Early, 191 Cal. 123, 215 P. 394. This principle is indisputable and in fact it is not here disputed. The rule is not adopted for the purpose of punishing the trustee for any intentional wrongdoing in the use of the trust funds, but rather to carry into effect the principle, enforced by courts of equity, that a trustee shall not be permitted to make any profit from the unauthorized use of such funds; it is intended to secure fidelity in the management of trust estates in order to fully realize any profit that the trustee may have made. In cases where the rule is properly applied legal interest compounded annually will be charged. Miller v. Lux, 100 Cal. 609, 35 P. 345, 639. The question whether such interest should or should not be charged depends, however, upon the circumstances of the particular case, and they may be such that a mere restoration of the property, or its value, without any interest, would be all that justice may require. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 474, 111 P. 360.

The record in the case is very voluminous, consisting of several thousand pages, covering receipts and expenditures for a period of over 15 years. We have read the same carefully, and a somewhat extended review of the facts becomes necessary for a complete understanding of the situation. While the estate consists of a large acreage, the lands are arid, and in consequence their yield is uncertain, and during dry years they are practically unproductive. Under these circumstances the rents and profits from the estate have been comparatively small, though the value of the estate is admitted to be greatly in excess of $300,000.

As indicated above, the testator died in the year 1892. Since that time and up to the commencement of this action, some 18 years thereafter, the trustees had filed five accounts. They were not more frequently filed for the reason that there was little or no balance to account for. These accounts had all been settled, and no appeal was ever taken from any of them, and they had become final. In the present action fraud on the part of the trustees was charged. Defendants thereupon consented to have the settlement of the accounts vacated and set aside so that the truth of the charges might be investigated. Upon the first trial the findings of the court were against plaintiff's charges, it being determined that the trustees had acted in good faith and without any intent to deceive or overreach the plaintiff in any way. Our Supreme Court, in passing upon the finding, expressed the view that it did not dissent from this conclusion and that it was fully supported by the evidence. Purdy v. Johnson, 174 Cal. 521, 527, 163 P. 893. The case was reversed, however, for the reasons heretofore stated. Upon the present trial the court found defendants to have been guilty of fraud and with failure to invest the trust funds, and it imposed the interest here complained of, with the result that the amount of defendants' former judgment was completely wiped out and the present judgment resulted. A perusal of the first five accounts shows that the trustees at no time during the period covered by them had, as a matter of fact, any funds whatsoever to invest, but, on the contrary, the estate was indebted in a large sum. The balance which the trial court here found to be due is a constructive one merely, and is made up by the rejection of certain items contained in the original accounts, including the $2,500 item above discussed, together with the rejection of all claims for any compensation whatsoever to the trustees covering the many years of their stewardship and the imposition of compound interest with annual rests on yearly balances, except upon the amount of $2,500, paid for the maintenance and support of the minors and the amount allowed the trustees as compensation for their services, upon which items simple interest was charged. But for this action of the trial court no balance would have existed each year, and there would have been, in consequence, no funds to invest. The present accounting includes a calculation only to November 30, 1908. The trial took place in 1918. If the action of the trial court finds support in the evidence it will result in the accounting for the intervening nine years in penalizing these defendants with 7 per cent. interest compounded annually on the present balance, which additional interest amounts to the sum of $10,829.93. Had the other beneficiary joined in this action the sum would be twice the amount. It is conceded by plaintiff that the judgment here recovered, considering the passage of time, will tax the ability of the defendants to pay. Of course, if the evidence justifies this result defendants cannot complain. In support of their contention that they have acted in good faith, our attention is called to the circumstance of their agreement to have the settlement of their former accounts, which had long been settled and had become final, set aside, an act it is claimed they would have not consented to had they been dishonest or disloyal to the trust reposed in them. These accounts, as has been stated, showed that at no time did the trustees have any funds to invest, and but for the fact that they had waived any right to stand upon the same, a large balance would appear in their favor.

[3] When acting in good faith, trustees should be treated by a court of equity with liberality and indulgence. Ellig v. Naglee, 9 Cal. 695. It has been said that the hardest demand that can be made in equity is to hold a trustee answerable for what was never in his hands, or for a loss not caused by his willful default. Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 451, 44 P. 182. From a careful reading of the voluminous record we are of the opinion that there is nothing therein contained to show that there was any serious malversation of the trust, as by mingling the trust funds with the private funds of the trustees or misappropriating or losing them. There is no claim here made that every cent received by defendants from the estate has not been fully accounted for. They were farmers and inexperienced with the proper method of keeping accounts, but they attempted to do so in their own way. They had large farming interests to look after. They kept proper vouchers, however, for all their expenditures except in a few instances. They were late at times in crediting sums collected, but such funds were all fully accounted for. They made some mistakes, but with no desire on their part to defraud their young relations. These errors did not always operate in their favor. On two occasions the trustees, in anticipation of the allowance of the annual compensation awarded them, drew checks upon the trust fund for their own private purposes before an account was approved and settled. On one occasion, through mistake, they charged the entire cost of a division fence to the estate, when the charge should have been but one-half only. These omissions and errors were fully explained and accounted for by them, and no attempt was ever made to conceal the true state of facts. There were, in the five accounts rendered, hundreds of items of receipts and expenditures, but comparatively few of these were challenged. Some were disallowed, and properly so, as they could not be satisfactorily explained. Our Supreme Court, however, on the former appeal predicted that this very condition would happen, for it is there said, that, considering the circumstances of the case, that in the taking of a new account it would be probable these trustees would be compelled to forego repayment of sums which they had properly and in good faith expended for the trust, and would be charged as having received money in cases where they had not, in fact, and could not with reasonable diligence have received it.

[4, 5] As above recited, in their original accounts the trustees were allowed an annual compensation for their trusteeship. Under the present accounting these items were rejected and the trustees are charged with simple interest upon these sums. It does not seem equitable or just to declare that these amounts should have been invested by them when under the order settling the accounts the trustees were declared to be entitled thereto. The retention by the trustees of these sums was legal and justified at the time they were withheld. The evidence is voluminous, but enough has been reviewed to indicate the character of the wrongdoing that is charged. The estate, however, so far as the record shows, has lost nothing, but all receipts have been fully accounted for, and the former accounts as settled and allowed showed no balance of funds at any time that could have been invested. The present annual balances are, as before stated, constructive only, and are entirely built up and created in the manner above indicated. Under these circumstances we are of the opinion that the imposition of compound interest on the annual balances was unjustified. The same may be said of the action of the court in denying the trustees any compensation for the long period of their stewardship. It is not disputed that when the original application was made by the trustees for compensation the sum of $500 per annum each was allowed at the suggestion of the trial court. No formal order was made fixing this amount, but it formed the basis of the charge made thereafter by the trustees, and the amount was never subsequently objected to. That this sum was a reasonable amount there can be no question. The estate was a large one, being originally valued at over $120,000, and the statement of counsel for appellants that it has since trebled in value and been preserved intact is not denied. The duties of the trustees were onerous. They consisted of the overseeing of the properties, the keeping up of the buildings and fences, borrowing and advancing money for the payment of taxes and the support of the beneficiaries and other expenses, keeping accounts, procuring tenants, looking out for the grain when it was threshed, the placing of insurance, the building of roads, digging of wells, and other active duties incident to the proper management of an estate of this character.

[6] The trustees in the settlement of their various accounts were allowed the sum stated for their services, and in consequence were justified in retaining the same to their own use. The court in casting the instant account disallowed any allowance whatever to them, and they are penalized with a charge of 7 per cent. simple interest on these sums so previously allowed for their failure to invest the same for the benefit of the estate. The disallowance was made on March 30, 1922, some 13 years after the entry of the order settling the trustees' fifth account and 26 years after the decree settling their first account, at which time their compensation had been definitely fixed. Under these circumstances it seems manifest to us that the action of the court in disallowing the trustees any compensation whatsoever, and charging the interest mentioned upon sums that the trustees were found to be entitled to and which they were therefore under no obligation to invest for the benefit of the estate at the time they were received, was without warrant. Conceding them to have been entitled to compensation, the amount allowed them was certainly reasonable considering their duties, and, as suggested by appellants' counsel, it would be a hard task to procure a manager, good or bad, for the vast estate involved for the allowed compensation.

[7] Complaint is also made of the action of the court in permitting the trustees to retain only the sum of $1,000 to meet current accounts and charging compound interest continuously upon the remainder found to be due. It appears from the record that the 30th day of November of each year was fixed by the court as the date for casting annual balances. The trustees were allowed to retain the sum of $1,000 from each annual balance found in favor of the beneficiary to cover expenditures for current operating expenses for the succeeding year before any new income could be derived from the trust property. That this sum was entirely inadequate for a number of the years there is no question. It is not disputed that for at least seven years the disbursements exceeded the receipts even with the allowance of the $1,000 permitted to be retained, and yet the trial court in the present account under the adopted method, in effect, charged the trustees with interest on the amount they actually paid out under approved vouchers for failure on their part to invest the same. The action of the court in this particular cannot be sustained. And, finally, appellants complain of the disallowance of certain items that had been approved in the former accounts. A review of each of these items would involve a critical statement of the facts concerning each expenditure and add to this lengthy opinion without answering any useful purpose. It is sufficient to say, so far as this objection is concerned, that we have examined the evidence upon the items, and are of the opinion that, while there is doubt concerning some of them, the court was justified in resolving that doubt against the trustees.

In conclusion it may be said that, while the record contains some errors affecting the trustees' accounts, it appears therefrom that such errors arose through inadvertence and without any intention on the part of the trustees to commit a deliberate wrong or to take advantage of their relations, and the evidence is insufficient to justify the penalizing of the trustees by the imposition of compound interest and the forfeiture of any commission for the services performed by them for the benefit of this large estate. As above indicated, the annual balances found to be due are constructive ones merely, made up in the main by the rejection of the $2,500 item discussed; the rejection of all claim for services and the imposition of interest for failure to properly invest funds which were never actually in the hands of the trustees, but for the rejection of the items previously allowed.

The finding of the trial court, therefore, that the trustees wrongfully mingled the trust funds with their own and failed to invest the same, finds no support in the evidence, as there were no actual funds in their hands at any time which they could possibly have invested. Plaintiff and defendants both join in the request that in the event of a reversal no new trial be ordered, but that the trial court be directed to modify its judgment as will in the opinion of this court do justice between the respective parties. In compliance with this request it is ordered that the court below strike a new account, in which the trustees be credited with the $2,500 item expended by them for the support and maintenance of the beneficiaries, that the trustees be allowed a reasonable sum for their compensation in accordance with equitable principles, and that simple interest only be charged against them for the amount, if any, found to be due the plaintiff.

With this modification the judgment will stand affirmed.

BANK OF ITALY v. SIERRA VALLEY BANK. (Civ. 3057.)

Estoppel ⚷72—Bank held not negligent in forwarding note and collateral for collection to bank of which maker was president, or precluded from recovering amount of note from such bank by statute affecting rights as between innocent persons, one of whom must suffer.

Bank held not negligent in forwarding note and collateral security for collection to bank of which maker was president nor precluded by Civ. Code, § 3543, relative to rights as between innocent persons, one of whom must suffer from act of a third, from recovering amount of note from collecting bank which permitted the collateral to get into its president's, the maker's, possession without obtaining payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sierra County; W. I. Redding, Judge.

Action by the Bank of Italy against the Sierra Valley Bank for conversion of personal property. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. E. McLaughlin, of Sacramento, and Louis Ferrari and Richard Fitzpatrick, both of San Francisco (J. J. Posner, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, and Henry B. Neville, of Downieville, for respondent.

BARTLETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. By its complaint in this action appellant, a banking corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, seeks judgment against respondent, also a banking corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, for the sum of $60,000, in which amount appellant claims it has been damaged through an alleged conversion of certain personal property by respondent belonging to appellant. At the time of the transactions out of which the action arises the principal place of business of appellant was at the city and county of San Francisco, Cal., and that of respondent was at Loyalton, Sierra county, Cal., and between the two places there was a daily communication by United States mail.

The evidence introduced at the trial of the action, and which consists largely of undisputed letters and telegrams passing between the parties, shows that on August 16, 1921, two individuals, named Mont Berg and W. H. Duncan, appeared at the head office of appellant in San Francisco, and that Berg made application for a loan of $25,000 to be secured by 250 shares of the capital stock of a bank known as the Indian Valley Bank of Greenville and 176 shares of the capital stock of the respondent Sierra Valley Bank of Loyalton. Said Mont Berg signed a note for $25,000 in favor of appellant and left the note with appellant with an authorization to appellant to pay a draft drawn on said Berg signed by said W. H. Duncan, in care of the Bank of Italy, and accompanied by 176 shares of the capital stock of the respondent. The note was not dated, but one of the vice-presidents of the appellant, one A. J. Gock, with whom this transaction was had, was authorized to insert the date in the note when the draft was presented. With the note and authorization Berg also left with appellant a collateral agreement pledging collateral and 250 shares of purported capital stock of the Indian Valley Bank. Nothing further occurred until August 23, 1921, when W. H. Duncan appeared at the Bank of Italy in San Francisco with a messenger from the Crocker National Bank of San Francisco and presented a draft for $25,000, accompanied by 176 shares of the capital stock of the respondent bank. Appellant paid the draft by a cashier's check and delivered the same to the messenger from the Crocker National Bank, which cashier's check was subsequently paid through the clearing house. The draft was mailed by appellant to Mont Berg, the 176 shares of capital stock of respndent were placed with the other collateral, the note was dated and put in force, and the loan transferred to the note department of appellant and carried as a loan evidenced by the promissory note of said Mont Berg secured by the said capital stock of respondent and the Indian Valley Bank.

On August 25, 1921, appellant received at its place of business in the city of San Francisco the following telegram from Mont Berg:

"Loyalton, Cal. Aug. 25, '21. 8:40 A. M. 4839.

"Bank of Italy, San Francisco, Cal. Attention Mr. Fickett. I have made arrangements for the payment of my note. Please forward same together with collateral to Sierra Valley Bank Loyalton for collection.

"Mont Berg. 9:07 A. M."

This telegram was received by appellant at 9:07 a. m., August 25, 1921, and upon its receipt the note of Mont Berg to appellant for $25,000 and the shares of capital stock of the Indian Valley Bank and of the respondent deposited as collateral with said note were transferred from the note department of appellant to its collection department, and sent to the Sierra Valley Bank at Loyalton, Cal., by registered and insured United States mail, for collection. The written instructions as to collection contained a direction to "deliver documents only on payment," and special instructions, "collect interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from 8—23—21 to date of payment," "collect $2.50 for postage charges," and gave as list of property: "Note, 250 shares of Indian Valley Bank #103–117, 176 shares of Sierra Valley Bank, attd. #124–126–137–136 106–133–132–139–103–121."

The note and collateral reached the post office at Loyalton, Cal., on August 27, 1921, and the package containing the same was on the same day delivered at said post office to one G. C. Brooks, who was then the assistant cashier of the respondent, and who signed the registry card for the package, the signature thereon being as follows: "Sierra Valley Bank, G. C. Brooks, Asst. Cashier." After its signature by said assistant cashier of respondent this card was forwarded to appellant at San Francisco, Cal., and received by it.

Respondent's assistant cashier, Brooks, after receiving the registered and insured package containing the note and collateral stock, proceeded with the same to the place of business of the respondent and laid the package with other mail upon his desk, which Mr. Brooks testifies passed on August 27, 1921, into the possession of Mr. S. H. Sherwood, the cashier of respondent, and Mr. Mont Berg. Several days passed without appellant receiving any further information concerning the collection, and it thereupon sent what is denominated a tracer, a card written in red ink, directed to Mont Berg asking payment of the $25,000. This card came into the hands of S. H. Sherwood, the cashier of the respondent, who states that on taking the same to Berg that he was informed by him that it was a proposition he (Berg) was handling, and that Berg dictated the following letter, which he, Sherwood, signed as cashier and mailed to appellant on September 7, 1921:

"Loyalton, Cal. September 7, 1921.

"Bank of Italy, San Francisco, Calif. Attention of Mr. Gock—Gentlemen: We are in receipt of your collection No. 666217, note and collateral of Mr. Mont Berg. We got in touch with Mr. Berg today, and he informs us that he will be in a position to pay this up within a very few days, as he is expecting to consummate the sale of some live stock. We shall forward draft immediately upon receipt of payment.

"Yours very truly,
"S. H. Sherwood, Cashier."

This communication was received by the appellant on September 8, 1921, at its main office in San Francisco. On September 10, 1921, Mr. Sherwood, the cashier of respondent, wrote and mailed appellant the following letter, relating to the collection, which letter was received by appellant at its San Francisco place of business, this letter, like the one of September 7, 1921, being written upon the letterheaded paper of the Sierra Valley Bank:

"Loyalton, Cal., September 10, 1921.

"Bank of Italy, San Francisco, Calif. Attention Mr. Gock—Gentlemen: Referring to your collection No. 666217, note and collateral of Mr. Mont Berg, we are sorry to report that Mr. Berg was compelled to go into the St Mary's Hospital at Reno, Nevada, for an operation last Friday morning. This will delay the payment of this collection for a few days, as the sale of Mr. Berg's live stock will go on just the same, and with your permission, we shall hold this note and collateral until we hear further from Mr. Berg.

"Yours very truly,
"S. H. Sherwood, Cashier."

No further information regarding the collection being received by appellant on October 5, 1921, it wired respondent to ascertain the fate of the collection, and received a reply from respondent to the effect that the note and collateral sent by appellant for collection had been stolen with other notes and bonds by bandits. In response to this notification appellant wrote respondent to have the stolen certificates canceled and new ones issued. On November 3, 1921, appellant again wired respondent concerning its collection, and was wired by respondent in effect that remittance in full would be made the next day. On November 30, 1921, demand was made by appellant for the payment of the collection and was refused by the respondent.

Neither the note nor the stock hypothecated as security for the same nor the money represented thereby has ever been returned to appellant, the evidence showing that the capital stock of respondent that was pledged was surrendered on August 28, 1921, by Berg to the secretary of respondent, who issued to Berg new certificates in lieu of the ones deposited with appellant as security. These new certificates the evidence shows Berg used as pledges with other banks on loans made to him. The new certificates, at the request of Berg, were dated back to August 23, 1921.

At 3 o'clock p. m. of August 23, 1921, a purported special meeting of respondent's board of directors was held at Loyalton. The bylaws of respondent did not provide a mode of procedure for calling special meetings of its directors, and no written notice was given any of the directors of this meeting, but verbal notice was given to all but two of them. At this meeting the directors who were present proceeded to elect Mont Berg president of the Sierra Valley Bank to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of one Raffaelo Dotta, former president of the bank. After this election on August 23, 1921, and after 3 o'clock p. m. of that day, the following letter, written on stationery of the respondent bank, by S. H. Sherwood, its cashier, was sent to the appellant at its main office in San Francisco, Cal.:

"Loyalton, Cal., Aug. 23, 1921.

"Bank of Italy, San Francisco, Calif. Attention Mr. Fickett—Gentlemen: At a meeting of the board of directors of this bank held this day, Mr. Mont Berg was elected president succeeding Mr. Raffaelo Dotta; Mr. Dotta, together with Mr. A. P. Laffranchini, remains as vice president.

"Authorization was also made for the depositing of our San Francisco reserve account with your institution. This will be done immediately upon receipt of the necessary permission from the state banking department, which has been already requested. Kindly forward signature cards.

"Assuring you that we will look forward to our future relations with a great deal of pleasure, we are,

"Very truly yours,
"S. H. Sherwood, Cashier."

The foregoing communication was received by the appellant and the following answer sent by appellant to respondent written and mailed at San Francisco, Cal., on the 25th of August, 1921:

"San Francisco, Cal., August 25, 1921.

"Mr. S. H. Sherwood, Cashier Sierra Valley Bank, Loyalton, California. Dear Mr. Sherwood: We have your letter of the 23d of August, addressed to Mr. Fickett, and note that Mr. Mont Berg was elected president of your institution at a meeting of the board of directors. We also note that you have applied for permission to designate our institution as a depository for you in San Francisco. As required, we herewith inclose signature cards, and would ask that you have two of the cards signed by the officers who will be authorized to draw against your account with us.

"Very truly yours, Vice President."

The evidence shows that a letter mailed on a given date in Loyalton would reach San Francisco in one day after leaving Loyalton, and that all mail deposited at Loyalton after 3 o'clock p. m. of any day would stay over until the next day at three o'clock p. m., at which time it would leave Loyalton.

By its answer respondent sets forth a special defense of nonliability to appellant because of alleged negligent acts on the part of appellant through which Mont Berg as an individual became possessed of the note and stock in controversy, and that by his individual fraudulent acts therewith, and not because of any act on the part of respondent, the injuries complained of resulted to appellant. This special defense was upheld by the trial court, and judgment was given that appellant take nothing as against the respondent by the action. From said judgment this appeal has been taken by respondent.

When appellant, in response to the telegram which it received from Mont Berg on August 25, 1921, mailed to respondent for collection the note and collateral which appellant then held, was such sending such negligent act on its part as to preclude a recovery against respondent in this action because of respondent's failure to carry out the instructions accompanying said collection, is the question presented for solution. This telegram is a most important instrument in the transactions involved in this action. There is nothing in the telegram itself which would warrant a suspicion that any fraudulent act was being contemplated on the part of Mont Berg concerning his note and the collateral accompanying the same at the time the telegram was sent to the Bank of Italy. While the note in question was not due at the time of the sending of the telegram, that fact would not have justified appellant in declining to send the collection, as the telegram said nothing as to the amounts of money Berg would pay to satisfy the collection on presentation. The telegram was sent from Loyalton, the place of business of respondent. It was the only bank doing business at that place. The shipment was carefully made. It was registered and insured. It was addressed to the Sierra Valley Bank, and no one had a right to receive the package from the United States post office at Loyalton save the Sierra Valley Bank or its authorized representative. A return receipt for the package was requested by the sender. The package was delivered to an officer of the respondent at the post office in Loyalton. It was receipted for at said post office by the Sierra Valley Bank through its assistant cashier. This receipt was transmitted to appellant, and it had no reason to believe the note and collateral were not in the possession of the respondent until it received from respondent on October 5, 1921, the telegram in which it was stated "Mont Berg note and collateral taken by bandits together with all other papers." If this statement was true it would indicate that respondent had the note and collateral in its possession up to the date of that telegram. The evidence shows that respondent did not deny its liability for this collection until November 30, 1921, and none of its communications, either letters or telegrams, prior to that date to appellant, indicate a dispute of its liability to appellant for the collection.

Respondent urges that because of the provisions of section 3543 of the Civil Code, "Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer," the appellant is not entitled to any relief in this action. The act claimed as the negligence on appellant's part barring relief is appellant's not preventing the delivery of the package containing the note and collateral after appellant was notified that Mont Berg had been elected president of respondent. A number of authorities are cited in respondent's brief wherein it has been held in some jurisdictions that the sending of a collection by a bank to the bank which is to pay the collection is a negligent act. The authorities are not uniform, however, in this regard, and there are decisions holding that such action is not negligence of itself, and that it is not negligence where there are no other banks in the place where the collection is to be made. In the case at bar the only bank at Loyalton was the Sierra Valley Bank, to which the collection was sent.

Section 3543 of the Civil Code has received but few constructions in the appellate courts of this state. The case of Walsh v. Hunt, 120 Cal. 46, 52 P. 115, 39 L. R. A. 697, is an apparently clear one determining when the section should be applied. There a mortgagor had signed a mortgage for $500 which the agent raised to $1,200 and then transferred to an innocent third party for the $1,200. The amounts in the mortgage were written in pencil, and the claim was made that the mortgagor in signing a mortgage in pencil, the amount of which could be raised, was so negligent that the terms of section 3543 of the Civil Code should be applied. But the Supreme Court of this state in reversing the judgment of the lower court held that this section did not apply where the result would come from the wrongful act of the third party, even if it was made possible by reason of some act of one of the innocent parties. Applying this ruling to the facts in the case at bar, respondent is precluded from receiving the benefit of the section invoked, for the acts of Mont Berg with the note and collateral cannot be considered as other than a wrongful act towards both appellant and respondent. Besides, the section can be applied only where there are two innocent parties. The facts in this case will not justify considering respondent an innocent party such as section 3543 of the Civil Code applies to. In due course of business respondent received by registered mail from appellant a package addressed, not to Mont Berg or any other individual officer of respondent, but to the Sierra Valley Bank, the package showing on its address that it was from appellant and the amount of stamps thereon showing that it contained inclosures of a large value. It came into the possession of the assistant cashier of the bank, an officer authorized to receive it, and from that moment it must be deemed in the possession of the Sierra Valley Bank. Respondent nowhere questions that at this time the assistant cashier who received the package, and the cashier, Sherwood, and the president, Mont Berg, were qualified officers of the respondent. Whatever was thereafter done with the package by any of these three parties cannot be held to be other than an act of the Sierra Valley Bank. If Mont Berg took possession of the properties, as it clearly appears he did, his possession was without right, and respondent was responsible for the loss of the properties to appellant.

It cannot well be said that respondent should be regarded in any sense as an innocent party in the transactions herein involved. Its actions towards appellant from the time appellant sent its tracer concerning the collection are not such acts as would have been performed by an innocent party. Both its assistant cashier and cashier knew that a valuable package sent it by the Bank of Italy had disappeared, and that it was not among the papers of the bank; the cashier demanded its return from Mont Berg, he requested its payment, and, still knowing it was not paid and knowing that Berg had received it and had transferred to himself some of the collateral sent in the collection, wrote in the name of the bank that the collection would be paid, and at no time informed appellant that respondent did not have the note and collateral in its hands.

Banks, like all other business institutions, are liable for the acts of their officers. Those who deal with them in due course of business are entitled to protection, and they have a right to presume that their officers are men of integrity and trust. Should it be held otherwise the worth of credit on which so much of modern business transactions is conducted would be most seriously impaired.

As this action turns upon the question of whether or not section 3543 of the Civil Code applies, and it seems clear to this court on the evidence in the action that the section does not apply, it is not necessary to discuss the other propositions argued in the briefs.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: HART, J; PLUMMER, J.

CAINE v. BRISCOE. (Civ. 3073.)

1. Brokers 🔑84(1)—Burden was on defendant, in broker's action for commissions, to prove contents of writing not produced by which he was to have right to inquire into financial standing of buyers and refuse to consummate contract, if their standing was unsatisfactory.

In broker's action to recover commissions, burden was on defendant to prove contents of writing, not produced, by which it was agreed that, before sale was to be completed, defendant was to have right to inquire into financial standing of buyers, and, if they were not satisfactory, to refuse to accept their offer.

2. Brokers 🔑86(1)—Defendant held not to have proved contents of instrument, not produced, defeating broker's right to commissions.

In broker's action for commissions, defendant failed to sustain burden of proving contents of instrument, which was not produced, that before sale was completed he was to have right to inquire into financial standing of buyers, and to refuse to accept their offer, if such inquiry did not result satisfactorily to him.

3. Brokers 🔑88(1)—Whether defendant sustained burden of establishing contents of instrument defeating broker's action for commissions held for jury.

In broker's action for commissions, whether defendant sustained burden of establishing contents of instrument by which he was to have right to inquire as to financial standing of buyers, and to refuse to accept their offer, if inquiry did not result satisfactorily, held for jury.

4. Evidence 🔑186(7).

Secondary proof of contents of written instrument, imposing obligations on parties thereto, should be clear, or not of doubtful character in probative worth.

5. Brokers 🔑54.

Where customer procured by broker was accepted by employer, he was thereafter estopped from denying purchaser's ability or willingness to complete the contract.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Implied finding of jury on conflicting evidence held conclusive on reviewing court.

In broker's action for commissions, implied finding of jury, on conflicting evidence, that broker did not waive his right to compensation for procuring purchasers of property, held conclusive on reviewing court.

7. Brokers 🔑63(1)—Broker procuring purchasers for defendant's property held entitled to commissions, notwithstanding defendant's failure to execute deed of conveyance.

Where broker's obligation was to negotiate sale of the properties, and he procured purchasers ready, willing, and able to buy same, and but for defendant's acts sales would have been effected according to defendant's own terms, broker was entitled to his commissions, notwithstanding failure of defendant to execute deed of conveyance to buyers.

8. Brokers 🔑52—Offer of purchasers and acceptance by seller constituted agreement of sale, entitling broker to his commissions.

Offer of purchasers to buy property placed in broker's hands for sale at price and terms set forth in writing, and written acceptance thereof by seller, constituted agreement of sale entitling broker to his commissions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by C. L. Caine, doing business under the firm name and style of C. L. Caine & Co., against E. V. Briscoe. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George Cosgrave, of Fresno, for appellant.

N. Lindsay South, of Fresno, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover a judgment from the defendant for the sum of $10,000, alleged to be the amount of the compensation which defendant agreed to pay plaintiff for negotiating the sale of certain real property and certain personal property belonging to the former. The issues of fact were tried by a jury, who returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $4,000. Judgment was entered accordingly, and this appeal is by the defendant from said judgment, upon a record made up according to the terms of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The real property involved herein consists of 120 acres, with improvements, the property of defendant, and is situated in Fresno county. Eighty acres of the land, at the time of the negotiations herein concerned, were in producing grapevines of the Alicante variety and 40 acres in producing grapevines of the Thompson variety.

In July, 1922, the defendant, Briscoe, entered into a written agreement with C. L. Caine, plaintiff, a real estate broker of the city of Fresno, authorizing said Caine to sell said property. Said agreement is, in part, as follows:

> "I hereby appoint C. L. Caine Co., of Fresno, my agent with exclusive right to sell the property described on the reverse side of this card, for the price and under conditions hereon described or for any less amount hereafter authorized by me, and receive deposit on the same. I agree to furnish deed and abstract showing clear title in me to date, and should C. L. Caine Co. sell such property or be instrumental in selling the same, I agree to pay them. And for and in consideration of the sum of one dollar paid to me by C. L. Caine Co. receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, I do hereby grant to said C. L. Caine Co. during the life of this agreement the exclusive option to buy said property for said price, less the amount of said commission, and upon said terms and conditions.
> "This authorization is to remain in full force and effect for 5 days only, $10,000.00 Com.
> "Name: E. V. Briscoe.
> "Address: Kerman, R. R. 2, Box 79.
> "Phone: ——."

The "reverse side" of said agreement contained a description of the real property, the several buildings, including the residence, situated thereon and an enumeration of various articles of personal property—equipments commonly employed in the cultivation and growing of grapes, also wagon, horses, other cattle, chickens, etc. The terms were:

> "Cash $50,000; balance, $50,000 every year; $50,000 out of this year's crop above $240,000, Jan. 1, 1923."

Acting upon the foregoing authorization, the plaintiff immediately started negotiations for the sale of the properties described in the writing to Vincent Masciello, Nick Iannello, Dominican Masciello, and Louis Albino, residents of Brooklyn, New York, who had been for some time and were engaged as copartners in the business of buying, shipping, and selling grapes in said city, and who were at the time of said negotiations, in the city of Fresno. These parties thought favorably of the proposition of sale and purchase upon the description of the properties given by the plaintiff, and, accordingly, either upon the day the agreement between plaintiff and defendant was executed, or the day following, accompanied one Harry Faith, a clerk in the office of plaintiff, to the land and inspected the properties. It appears that no particular price to be paid for the properties was stated by plaintiff or Faith to Albino and his partners before arriving at the ranch. The buyers, as we shall hereafter refer to Albino and his partners, looked the properties over and, stating that they desired to consider among themselves the proposed deal before reaching a conclusion with respect thereto, returned with Faith to the city of Fresno. On the following day they again, accompanied by Faith, visited the premises, and examined and inspected the properties. On this occasion the buyers, for the first time, met Briscoe, the owner of the properties and the defendant herein. The former discussed the properties and the proposition to buy the same with Briscoe, and then asked him the total amount he desired for the properties and as to the terms of payment. Briscoe asked the total sum of $300,000, or approximately that sum, for the properties. After some discussion as to the price, the proposed purchasers offered Briscoe the sum of $270,000 for the ranch and the personal property specified in the listing agreement executed to plaintiff by Briscoe. The latter agreed to accept the last-mentioned sum and the terms of payment were also agreed upon. On the 25th day of July, 1922, in pursuance of an understanding to that effect, Briscoe and the proposed buyers met at the office of the plaintiff in Fresno and there the proposed buyers executed a written offer and agreement to purchase the properties. Upon the execution of said written offer or agreement the proposed buyers delivered to plaintiff for defendant and in the latter's name their certified check for the sum of $5,000. The initial language of said writing expresses acknowledgment of the receipt of the check just referred to "as and for deposit and partial payment of $270,000, the full purchase price of certain real property" (described), together with certain described personal property, including a large crop of grapes, "which the purchasers agree to purchase" for the total sum above named, payable as follows:

> "15,000 cash (including the amount herein receipted for) upon the execution and delivery of a good and sufficient deed or contract for a deed conveying said property to purchasers, together with abstract or certificate of title, to be furnished at the owner's expense, showing title to said property to be in the said owner, free and clear of all incumbrances whatsoever, except as otherwise herein expressly stated.
> "Balance of the purchase price to be secured and paid as follows: By contract payable $35,000 October 15, 1922. It is understood that this $35,000 will be secured by promissory > notes made in the sum of $1,000 each from the date that the first car of grapes reaches its destination, then the balance of the notes shall become due in 45 days. Purchasers agree to make a payment of $50,000 on January 1, 1923. Balance of $170,000 shall be paid on the following terms: $50,000 in 1924, January 1, and $50,000 each year thereafter until the purchase price has been paid. It is further agreed that the seller will guarantee 1922 crops to be 800 tons of green grapes on the above described property. It is understood that in case a frost shall damage the crops growing on the above described property to make less than 400 tons of green grapes second party for that year only shall pay interest and no principal.

> "Time is made of the essence of this agreement, and it is understood and agreed that the sale of said property upon the terms herein set forth is subject to the approval of the owner of said property, but that said terms and conditions shall be agreed to and accepted by said owner within three days from this date, or the deposit herein receipted for shall be refunded to said purchasers immediately thereafter, upon demand. * * *
> "If the purchaser does not complete the purchase as hereinbefore provided within five (5) days after notice from the owner of his ability and readiness to convey said property as herein provided, then the said deposit shall be forfeited as liquidated damages, and it shall thereupon be paid, less the commission of the undersigned agents, to the owner." (Signed by buyers.)

The terms of said offer were, immediately or on the same day that the offer was executed, accepted in writing by defendant, the same being indorsed or written on the sheet or sheets of paper containing the offer itself. The acceptance was in the following language:

> "I hereby agree to all the conditions herein contained.
> "Telephone: ——— Address: ———.
> "I hereby accept the above price and terms, and agree to execute and deliver a good and sufficient deed or contract for a deed conveying said property to said purchaser as above stated, together with abstract or certificate of title showing title to said property to be free and clear from all incumbrances except as otherwise herein expressly stated, and I further agree to pay C. L. Caine Co. $10,000 as their commission for negotiating said sale.
> "Telephone E. V. Briscoe, Owner.
> "Address: ———.
> "Duplicate."

The above documents were prepared in triplicate, one being retained by the buyers, one by the seller (defendant), and the third by the plaintiff. For reasons to be hereinafter explained, the defendant refused to convey the properties to the buyers.

The foregoing embraces a general statement of the facts. They are substantially so stated in the complaint, together with the allegation that the plaintiff, after being authorized as indicated to negotiate the sale of the properties, procured, within the time specified in the authorization, purchasers ready, willing and able to purchase the same on the terms prescribed by and in the writing last referred to.

The answer denies the averments of the complaint, except as to the writing vesting plaintiff with the authority of agent to sell or negotiate the sale of the properties and the written offer by the buyer to purchase the properties and the like acceptance by defendant of said offer. As to these agreements, the answer alleges:

> That, on the real property described in said documents and in the complaint, there was, at the time of the execution thereof, "a crop of grapes of the value of $75,000; and defendant stated to plaintiff that the said Exhibit B (the writing last above referred to) was not satisfactory to him because, by the execution thereof, the purchasers would be able to and would convert the said crop upon said premises to their own use, and defendants would have no security for the further and additional payments, and unless the said purchasers were financially responsible, he would not agree to sell upon the terms and conditions contained in said Exhibit B; that plaintiff then and there advised defendant that he could take a reasonable time to investigate the financial standing and worth of the said purchasers named in said contract, being plaintiff's said Exhibit B, and unless he were satisfied with the result of such inquiries, defendant need not accept the said contract; that said Exhibit B was written in duplicate and one copy thereof delivered to defendant; that plaintiff thereupon indorsed upon defendant's copy of said Exhibit B, a writing to the effect that defendant should have a reasonable time in which to inquire into and ascertain the financial standing and worth of the said purchasers named in said contract, and would then notify plaintiff whether or not he elected that said contract became effective; that within said time, defendant made such injury and ascertained that the said proposed purchasers were not financially responsible and thereupon notified plaintiff that the result of his inquiry was not satisfactory and by reason thereof the said contract never became effective and was never executed on behalf of defendant."

The defense thus set up presents the point first relied upon for a reversal by defendant. The second point urged is that the written offer and acceptance (Exhibit B) "contemplated an additional and complete agreement between the parties when, and when only, the sale would be completed, and that the purchasers found by respondent were never willing to enter into such an agreement." A third point is practically that the jury were instructed upon matters of fact.

The point first adverted to arises out of the following circumstances: Within a few minutes (15 or 20) after Exhibit B and the acceptance of the terms thereof were executed, respectively, by the buyers and the defendant, the latter, with Faith, entered another and separate room from that in which the documents were executed, and there entered into and executed a writing, the nature of the real tenor of which is in dispute. This writing, which was upon a "slip of paper," could not, after this action was instituted by plaintiff, be found, and was therefore not available at the trial, although defendant, so he testified, attached it to Exhibit B, and delivered it as so attached to his attorneys. The loss of the "slip" having been shown, an attempt was made to prove the contents thereof by parol. The defendant testified that said writing embraced an agreement between him and Faith to the effect that the sale should not be consummated until he, after a reasonable time, was able to secure a report from New York on the financial responsibility of the buyers to purchase the properties and fulfill in every material particular the terms of Exhibit B.

Mark Hall, assistant cashier of the Valley Bank of Fresno, but at the time the transactions involved herein were in progress, holding a like position in the Fidelity Bank, of the same place, testified that he was familiar to some extent with said transactions; that, while he never saw the "slip of paper" containing an agreement between Briscoe and Faith, to the effect that the former, before consummating the sale, was to be accorded an opportunity to investigate the financial standing of Albino and his partners in New York, he had, nevertheless, heard it discussed by Faith and Briscoe, and, in effect, he said, from such discussion, understood that such an agreement was contained in said "slip," signed by Faith and Briscoe.

[1-4] Faith testified that, within a short time after Exhibit B was executed by Briscoe and the buyers, he and the former stepped into an adjoining room primarily for the purpose of discussing the matter of the time at which the buyers should be given possession of the properties and also the proposition of selling his furniture to the buyers. Faith testified that the writing on the "slip of paper" prepared by Briscoe, and signed by the latter and the witness, so far as he was able to recall, referred entirely to the sale of the furniture to the buyers, the latter having agreed to pay the sum of $5,000 therefor. Faith, further referring to said "slip of paper," stated that, after it was signed by him and Briscoe, the latter took possession of it and that he (Faith) had never thereafter seen it, nor did he know what Briscoe did with it. This is substantially all the testimony relative to the stipulations of the writing now in question. The burden was upon the defendant to prove the contents of said writing. This is so for the reason that the allegation of the answer that by said writing it was agreed that, before the sale was to be completed, the defendant was to have and exercise the right to inquire into the matter of the financial standing of the buyers, and if such inquiry did not result satisfactorily to him, the defendant might refuse to accept the offer of the buyers, as set forth in Exhibit B, involved special or an affirmative defense. It is manifest, from the face of the record, that defendant failed to sustain that burden. The testimony introduced by the defendant respecting the contents of said writing seems upon its face to be unsatisfactory. Indeed, the only direct testimony as to the nature of the stipulations of said writing, so far as defendant's position was concerned, was Briscoe's testimony. Hall's testimony amounted to no more than a conjecture that the alleged stipulation accorded to the defendant a reasonable time, after he accepted the offer of the buyers, within which to prosecute an inquiry with regard to the financial ability of the latter before the offer and the acceptance were to become binding upon him. The only testimony, other than that of Briscoe and Hall, bearing upon the matter, was that of Faith, testifying for the plaintiff. His testimony, it is true, was not of a positive character, but it represented his best recollection, and, as seen, was to the effect that the said writing contained no stipulation that defendant was to be given an opportunity to investigate the financial standing of the buyers before he would be required to convey the properties to Albino and his copartners, he stating, however (it may here be added), that subsequent to the making and the signing of the writing regarding the sale of the property, and consequently, after Exhibit B was executed by the buyers and the terms thereof accepted by him, the question of the financial ability of the buyers to consummate the deal according to the terms of the written offer and acceptance (Exhibit B) was, for the first time, raised by the defendant.

The question whether the defendant succeeded in sustaining the burden cast upon him to establish the special defense now being considered was, of course, one for the jury. Peculiarly is it true in cases where, as here, the contents of a lost or destroyed written document must be proved by parol testimony, thus placing sole reliance, for the support of an important issue, upon the frailties, or, as truly it may be said, the treachery, of human memory, the burden of proving the fact necessarily carries with it more than the usual measure of responsibility. In other words, secondary proof of the contents of a written instrument imposing duties or obligations upon the parties thereto should be clear or not of a doubtful character in probative worth. Whether, therefore, we say that the testimony of Faith appears to be sufficient to have justly warranted the jury in concluding that the burden upon defendant to prove said special defense had not been satisfactorily supported or that Faith's testimony was such as to create in the evidence upon the question involved in said defense a substantial conflict, the result is the same. The trial court specifically instructed the jury upon the question and to the effect that if they found from the evidence that the plaintiff and defendant agreed in writing that the last named should have a reasonable time within which to inquire into and ascertain "the financial standing and worth of the purchasers," that defendant signed the contract to sell on the condition that he be given the opportunity to prosecute such inquiry, and that, upon making such inquiry, he "notified plaintiff that he was not satisfied with the financial responsibility of the purchasers," then the "contract to pay (plaintiff) the commission never became effective." The court further instructed the jury that, before plaintiff would be entitled to recover in this action, the jury would be required to find that he (plaintiff), within the time specified in the contract vesting him with authority to sell or negotiate the sale of the properties, procured "purchasers who were able, ready and willing to buy on terms satisfactory to the seller."

[5] Thus the special defense in question was directly submitted to the jury, and the verdict necessarily implies a finding by the jury that the writing executed by Briscoe and Faith immediately after Exhibit B was executed by the buyers and Briscoe contained no stipulation giving to Briscoe the right or an opportunity to investigate the financial standing of Albino and his copartners before the terms of said Exhibit B were to become binding upon Briscoe. The situation as it is presented to this court, then, is this: That Briscoe, without previously raising any objection to the proposed purchasers, either upon the ground that they were not possessed of the financial ability to carry out the deal or upon the ground that they were not willing to do so, entered into an agreement to sell the properties to the buyers and accepted their check for $5,000 as a payment. There was and is no claim made by defendant that he was induced to accept the offer of the buyers to purchase the properties by any act of fraud on the part of the plaintiff or that such acceptance was brought about through a mutual mistake regarding the facts or the terms of the offer. Hence the case, so far as the present point is concerned, falls within the rule stated as follows in 4 Ruling Case Law, page 309:

> "Once the customer procured by the broker is accepted by the employer, the latter is thereafter estopped from denying the purchaser's ability or willingness to complete the contract, inasmuch as he is not bound to accept the offer of such person without a reasonable opportunity to inquire and satisfy himself in relation to it. Consequently his acceptance should estop him from alleging anything against the claim except fraud on the part of the broker in inducing the acceptance."

The said rule has been approved by a number of California cases among which are Carrington v. Smithers, 26 Cal. App. 460, 461, 147 P. 225, and Wood & Tatum Co. v. Basler, 37 Cal. App. 381, 384, 173 P. 1109, an application for a hearing in the Supreme Court in the latter case having been denied. See, also, Freeman v. Creelman, 60 Cal. App. 14, 23, 24, 212 P. 56.

[6] It is next contended that plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action because, as is the claim, the contract of sale was rescinded by the mutual agreement of the buyers and the defendant, and that the plaintiff, in the transaction, culminating in the rescission, agreed to waive any right he might have to a commission from defendant for negotiating the sale of the properties. This proposition was set up in the answer as a special defense. Upon that issue the evidence was in sharp conflict, and the court specifically instructed the jury that, if they should believe from the evidence that plaintiff, as alleged in the answer, waived his right to compensation for procuring purchasers of the property, it would be their duty to find for defendant and also stated he converse of that proposition. It follows that the implication from the verdict is that the jury concluded that the plaintiff made no such waiver, and this conclusion is conclusive upon this court.

In view of the foregoing considerations, it is not necessary that we should minutely examine herein the testimony disclosing the controversy which led to a refusal by the defendant to perform the terms of the contract of sale. It is enough to say that defendant claimed that a report he received as to the financial ability of the buyers to carry out the contract on their part was unsatisfactory to him; that, after much bickering between the defendant and the buyers followed the execution of Exhibit B, it was finally agreed that the contract of sale should be rescinded upon the payment by the defendant to the buyers of the sum of $750, and that said agreement was carried out. Albino testified that he and his copartners were at all times able and willing to purchase the properties upon the terms set forth in Exhibit B. One Luscher testified:

> That, just prior to the time when the agreement of sale was canceled by the parties, he met the defendant in plaintiff's office; that he then said to defendant: "I heard you sold your place out at Biola," to which defendant replied that "he could sell it, if he wanted to go on with the deal, but the price of Alicantes had advanced so fast that he considered it a bad deal and wanted to get out of it; and I said, 'Maybe you can't;' and he said he didn't know. He wasn't going on with it, if he could help it. I suggested to him that, if he would settle with Caine on the commission end of it, I was sure Caine would help him get out of the deal and he went out, saying that he would rather pay the commission than go on with the deal."

This testimony would seem to have had the effect of weakening the foundation of defendant's special defenses. The jury, we may assume, so viewed said testimony.

[7, 8] The point that the language of Exhibit B clearly indicates that, before the sale should be completed, the parties contemplated and intended that an additional agreement involving or amounting to an actual sale of the properties should be executed, that plaintiff's right to the specified commission depended entirely upon the execution by the parties of such contract of sale, and that, no such contract having been executed, the plaintiff, therefore, did not earn the commission prescribed, is without merit. The plaintiff's obligation was to negotiate a sale of the properties, or to be "instrumental in selling the same." He procured purchasers ready, willing, and able to buy the properties, and but for the act or acts of the defendant the sale would have been effected according to the defendant's own terms. Indeed, the offer of Albino and his copartners to buy the properties at the price and on the terms set forth in the writing designated in the record and herein as Exhibit B, and the written acceptance of said offer and the terms thereof by defendant, constituted an agreement of sale. The execution of a deed of conveyance by defendant to the buyers was not required as a prerequisite to the right of plaintiff to claim and recover his commission. As above suggested, the failure to consummate the deal, as we are authorized to assume from the verdict, was due entirely to the defendant, and his failure to perform in full his part of the contract cannot have the effect of denying to the plaintiff his right to the compensation for the services he rendered defendant, as the same was fixed by the agreement between them.

The last point urged for a reversal involves an attack upon one of the instructions given to the jury by the court. It is said that the instruction "ignored the element of the admitted facts in evidence concerning appellant's special defenses." There are, as above shown, no "admitted facts" relative to said special defenses. The criticism of the instruction is wholly devoid of merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

78 Cal. App. 536

LE BARON et al. v. BERRYESSA CATTLE CO. (Civ. 5529.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 26, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 23, 1926.)

1. Pleading 🔑354(2)—In minors' action to rescind purchase of cattle restored to seller February 10, seller's pleading that, between sale on November 15 and February 1, cattle decreased in value $20 per head, was properly stricken out.

In action to rescind contract for purchase of ranch and cattle, possession of which was restored on February 10, 1921, defendant's pleading that, between the time of the sale on November 15, 1920, and February 1, 1921, cattle decreased in value $20 per head, was properly stricken out because not showing that cattle were not worth as much when returned as when sold, and because change in value was contrary to experience and common knowledge.

2. Evidence 🔑474(19).

Where party alleged that cattle decreased in value $20 per head in 2½ months after November 15, his witness, who had not seen the cattle after August 1, was not qualified to testify as to their value on November 15.

3. Equity 🔑65(2)—In minors' action to rescind purchase of cattle, where seller alleged they decreased in value $20 per head during minors' possession for 2½ months, whether restoration was sufficient need not be determined, since seller was in equity without clean hands (Civ. Code, § 35).

In minors' action to rescind purchase of cattle, where seller alleged they decreased in value $20 per head during the 2½ months before restoration to him, court need not determine whether restoration in kind was sufficient, under Civ. Code, § 35, though the market value through no fault of the minors decreased, since defendant was asking for equitable relief without clean hands.

4. Infants 🔑72(1).

Seller may not recover from minors rescinding purchase of ranch for failure to properly till and sow the land, or for loss of opportunity to lease it.

5. Infants 🔑31(2)—Where minors, rescinding purchase of ranch, offered to execute any paper to cover return of cattle brand, seller might not complain of failure to transfer it to him.

Where infants, rescinding purchase of ranch, offered to return entire consideration received upon return of the entire consideration given by them, which offer seller refused, but seller accepted return of all property, including cattle brand, and in complaint in and trial of action to rescind they renewed offer and during trial offered to execute any paper to cover the matter of the cattle brand, seller might not complain that minors did not transfer the cattle brand to him.

6. Infants 🔑31(1).

Minors, who, after purchase of cattle ranch, bore expense of caring for it and the cattle, on rescission, were entitled to recoupment therefor from the seller.

7. Appeal and error 🔑931(7)—That trial court considered right of recoupment would be presumed in support of judgment.

In minors' action for rescission of purchase of cattle ranch, court may presume in support of judgment that trial court considered right to recoupment for caring for ranch before rescission, where it tried case as if such was pleaded, and found that entire consideration had been returned.

8. Infants 🔑98.

Evidence held to sustain finding that minors, attempting to rescind purchase of ranch and cattle, had returned the entire consideration received by them.

9. Infants ⚷73—Minor's action for rescission is equitable.

Action of minor over 18 years to rescind contract by restoring or offering to restore the consideration, or paying its equivalent, as required by Civ. Code, § 35, is equitable, and vests in the trial court broad discretion to see that equity is done.

10. Infants ⚷31(2)—When minors attempt to rescind, equities running through entire transaction might be balanced, to determine whether consideration or its equivalent had been restored.

Where minors, attempting to rescind purchase involving various classes of property and a number of separate transactions, offered return of entire consideration received on return of entire consideration given by them, and the sellers accept what the minors claim to be the entire consideration received, equities running through the entire transaction may be balanced to determine whether the consideration or its equivalent has been restored.

11. Infants ⚷31(2).

Under Civ. Code, § 35, allowing a minor to disaffirm his contract on restoring consideration or paying its equivalent, payment of the equivalent may be in cash, property, or benefits received.

12. Infants ⚷31(2).

Minors, rescinding contract of purchase, are entitled to interest on the money paid to the seller from date of its payment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by Henry C. Le Baron, a minor, by Lora Le Baron, his guardian ad litem, and another, against the Berryessa Cattle Company, to rescind a contract for the purchase of real and personal property, for recovery of money paid thereunder, and for the cancellation of notes and a chattel mortgage. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles E. Trower, of Napa, J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, and J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, for appellant.

E. M. Norton, of Healdsburg, J. R. Leppo, of Santa Rosa, and Fred W. McConnell, of Healdsburg, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. The plaintiffs, who are husband and wife and both minors, sued the defendant for the rescission of a contract for the purchase of real and personal property, for the recovery of $20,000 paid under the contract, and for the cancellation of two promissory notes, aggregating $30,000, and a promissory note of $55,000, and a chattel mortgage securing the same. Judgment went for the plaintiffs, as prayed, and the defendant has appealed upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

On the 15th of November, 1920, the plaintiff Henry C. Le Baron was of the age of 19 years, and the plaintiff Leota Le Baron was of the age of 17 years. They both sue herein through their guardian, Lora Le Baron, but the two minors will hereafter be referred to as the plaintiffs. On the date mentioned they entered into a written contract with the defendant corporation, wherein the plaintiffs agreed to buy from the defendant real and personal property located in Napa county for the total purchase price of $340,000. Pursuant to the terms of the contract and at the time of its execution, the plaintiffs paid to the defendant the sum of $20,000 in money, and executed and delivered to it their two joint and several promissory notes each in the principal sum of $15,000, and also their joint and several promissory note in the sum of $55,000 secured by a chattel mortgage on the personal property described in the written contract. The plaintiffs immediately entered into possession of the premises and continued in possession thereof until the 10th day of February, 1921, when possession was delivered to the defendant in accordance with their notice of disaffirmance and rescission, which had been given to the defendant in writing on the 28th day of January, 1921. The trial court held that at that time the plaintiffs restored and returned to the defendant the entire consideration moving to them from said defendant under the contract, but that the defendant refused and has still refused to return the sum of $20,000 which had been paid by the plaintiffs, and that it also refused to deliver up or cancel any of the promissory notes or the chattel mortgage.

At the time of the execution of the contract and as a part of the same transaction, the defendant executed to plaintiffs its bill of sale reciting that, in consideration of the sum of $62,500, all the personal property, including a large number of farm implements, 20 head of horses, 20 head of sheep, and approximately 1100 head of cattle was transferred to the plaintiffs, and of this personal property plaintiffs also took immediate possession. In the agreement of sale of the premises, the purchase price of the real property was stated to be $277,500 and the purchase price of the personalty was recited to be $62,500. On January 28, 1921, while both the plaintiffs were still in their minority, they notified the defendant in writing that they each disaffirmed and rescinded the contract and every part thereof, and then offered to restore to the defendant the entire consideration for the contract, and demanded the return to them of everything of value received from them by the defendant. On or about the 1st day of February following, the plaintiffs left the premises in the care of competent employees, and, in accordance with stipulation of counsel, the actual transfer of possession from the plaintiffs to the defendant took place on February 10th, following, without any of the parties hereto being present. From that date on, the defendant retained possession of all the property, both real and personal, covered by the contract except as hereinafter stated.

Included in the bill of sale of the personal property were about 200 tons of hay and 20 tons of cotton seed meal. During the plaintiffs' occupancy of the premises they fed to the stock in their possession about 100 tons of this hay and about 10 tons of the cotton seed meal. These were the only items of all the property transferred which were not returned to the defendant in kind, and the trial court found that the reasonable value of the hay used by the plaintiffs was about $1,000 and that the reasonable value of the cotton seed meal was about $800. It was found that this hay and meal had been fed to the cattle in the regular daily course of care and proper treatment of them, and was necessary for the purpose of nourishing them and keeping them in a healthy condition. A second cause of action was in the form of a common count praying for judgment for $20,000, as for money had and received.

The defendant answered, admitting the execution of the contract and the minority of the plaintiffs, but denying the allegation that they offered to restore the consideration for the contract and that they disaffirmed the same. As a separate defense the defendant alleged that the plaintiffs had willfully and fraudulently concealed from the defendant the fact that each was a minor, and had conducted themselves in such manner as to lead the defendant to believe that they were adults and competent to contract; that, in accordance with the provisions of the written contract and the bill of sale hereinbefore referred to, the defendant on the 15th day of November, 1920, delivered to the plaintiffs 1,100 head of cattle, which were then of the reasonable value of $70 per head, but that between that date and the 1st day of February, 1921, said cattle had declined and diminished in value to the amount of $20 per head, so that the total value thereof had decreased from $77,000 on November 15, 1920, to $55,000 on February 1, 1921. As a second defense, the defendant alleged that as a part of the contract the plaintiff had undertaken to till and plant to grain about 1,000 acres of the land conveyed, and that they failed to do so to the damage of the defendant in the sum of $15,000. As a third defense, the defendant alleged that by reason of the occupany of said land by the plaintiffs the defendant had been unable to secure a tenant for the premises; that the reasonable rental value for the land for the year beginning November 15, 1920, was $15,000, and that the defendant was therefore damaged in that sum. As a counterclaim the defendant pleaded all the facts appearing in its first, second and third defenses as just noted and claimed a set-off to the extent of the damages which they had pleaded in their various defenses. In this same pleading the defendant affirmatively alleged, contrary to the preceding denials in its answer, that the plaintiffs did, as alleged in their complaint, notify the defendant of their election and intention to disaffirm and annul the contract, and that they did propose to return to the defendant the consideration which they had received. As a second counterclaim the defendant pleaded, that within the 2 years last past, it had sold to the plaintiffs 100 tons of hay of the reasonable value of $1,500 and 20 tons of cotton seed meal of the reasonable value of $1,500.

As a first cross-complaint, the defendant repeated the allegations of its first separate defense relating to the depreciation in the value of the cattle; as a second cause of action and cross-complaint, it repeated the allegations relating to the plaintiffs' failure to till and sow the land; as a third cause of action and cross-complaint, it repeated the allegations relating to the loss to the defendant through its inability to lease the premises; as a conclusion to the entire pleading, the defendant prayed for judgment against the plaintiffs in the sum of $20,000.

The plaintiffs demurred to the answers, counterclaims, and cross-complaints and moved to strike out portions of each. The demurrer was sustained to certain portions and overruled as to other portions, and the motion to strike out was granted to all those portions of the pleading relating to the depreciation in the value of the cattle, the loss through the failure to till and sow the land, and the loss through the inability of the defendant to procure a tenant for the premises. It was denied as to the second counterclaim relating to the sale of the hay and cotton seed meal.

With the pleadings so framed the cause went to trial before the court without a jury, and evidence was offered without contradiction tending to prove all the material allegations of the complaint. The written notice of disaffirmance and rescission of the contract, due service of which was admitted, was offered in evidence, and from this it appears that on January 27, 1921, the plaintiffs notified the defendant in writing that because of their minority they elected to disaffirm, cancel, annul, and abrogate the agreement, and every part thereof, and that they thereby offered to restore to the defendant the entire consideration moving to them at the residence located upon the premises on the 10th of February, 1921. This notice contained the specific offer to restore the entire consideration for the agreement and all property received by either of the plaintiffs and was accompanied by the demand that, at the same time and place, the defendant return to them everything of value which it had received from them, and particularly the sum of $20,000 which they had paid on November 15, 1920.

Evidence was further offered to the effect that, by stipulation of counsel for both parties, neither of the principals would be required to appear upon the premises on the day mentioned, but that the transfer would be effected by counsel at that time without any prejudice to either party by reason of the absence of the principals.

The defendant offered no testimony in contravention of the allegations of the complaint, or in support of the allegations of its answers, other than a witness who was asked to testify as to the value of the cattle covered by the contract. An objection to this line of inquiry was sustained, and defendant's counsel thereupon offered to prove by this and another witness that the value of said cattle was on the 15th day of November, 1920, approximately $72 a head and that on the 10th day of February, 1921, they were valued from $18 to $20 less per head. This offer was also rejected, and the defendant rested with the stipulation that the reasonable value of the hay consumed by the cattle during plaintiffs' occupancy of the premises was $10 a ton. During the course of the trial the defendant brought out that, as a part of the transaction of November 15, 1920, the defendant had conveyed to the plaintiffs all his right, title, and interest in a certain cattle brand which had been used by the corporation, and that no reconveyance of this cattle brand had been made to the defendant. The plaintiffs insisted that their offer to restore the entire consideration was broad enough to include the cattle brand, and that they were at all times ready and willing to make such transfer or conveyance thereof as the defendant might indicate. At the same time the plaintiffs executed a written conveyance and quitclaim of all their right, title, and interest in this cattle brand, but this the defendant refused to accept. The conveyance was thereupon filed with the papers in the case, and the plaintiffs renewed their offer in open court to execute any paper which the defendant might demand for the purpose of clearing up the title to the cattle brand.

The case rests upon an interpretation of section 35, Civil Code, relating to the right of a minor to disaffirm his contract and which reads as follows:

> "In all cases other than those specified in sections 36 and 37, the contract of a minor, if made whilst he is under the age of eighteen, may be disaffirmed by the minor himself, either before his majority or within a reasonable time afterwards; or, in case of his death within that period, by his heirs or personal representatives; and if the contract be made by the minor whilst he is over the age of eighteen, it may be disaffirmed in like manner upon restoring the consideration to the party from whom it was received, or paying its equivalent."

The appellant's position is that, under this section, a minor may not disaffirm his contract without restoration to the other party of the full value of the consideration which passed to the minor, while the respondents' position is that the section permits the restoration of the consideration in kind, or that if this cannot be done, the payment of its equivalent.

[1-3] Taking up the first item relating to the depreciation in value of the cattle, it will be noted that the appellant in all portions of its answer alleged that the value of the cattle on November 15, 1920, was $70 per head and that the value of the same cattle on February 1, 1921, was $50 a head. These allegations are made in face of the written stipulation of the parties, contained both in the written contract and in the bill of sale, that the purchase price of all the personal property conveyed, including not only these same cattle, but a number of horses, mules, sheep, chickens and farm implements, and all the furniture of the house, was but $62,500 on November 15, 1920. Thus, without any explanation of this discrepancy, the appellant has alleged that the value of the cattle alone was $77,000 or $14,500 more than the stipulated purchase price of all the personal property. In all portions of its pleading the appellant alleged that the value of the cattle had declined $20 per head on the first day of February, 1921. Inasmuch as the admitted pleadings all showed that all these cattle had been restored to the appellant on the 10th day of February, 1921, the value on the first day of that month was, of course, a matter of no importance. If their value could decrease so rapidly from November 15, 1920, to February 1, 1921, it is not altogether improbable that this value might have increased from February 1 to February 10, the day upon which they were returned to the possession of the appellant. In any event, the admitted pleadings are that on February 10, 1921, the appellant accepted the respondents' offer to restore the cattle and actually received them into its possession, and it does not appear in any portion of the pleadings what value they had at that time.

There is, therefore, nothing in the pleadings to show that when the cattle were returned to the appellant they were not of the same value as when they were delivered to the respondents, or, in other words, that the respondents did not on February 10, 1921, restore to the appellant, and that the appellant did not at the same time accept from the respondents, the entire consideration so far as the cattle alone were concerned. All these pleadings regarding the rapid change in the value of the cattle are so contrary to human experience and common knowledge that they appear to be merely sham and frivolous, and the trial court must have viewed them in the same light when it granted the motion to strike out. If, however, any error occurred in striking out these pleadings, the appellant was nevertheless at liberty upon the trial to prove that the respondents had not restored or offered to restore the full consideration. For this purpose it offered to prove by a witness who was a cattle buyer in the neighborhood the value of the cattle on November 15, 1920. In attempting to qualify this witness for that purpose he testified that he had not seen these cattle since August 1, 1920. The question covering his opinion as to the value of those particular cattle per head on November 15, 1920, was objected to upon the ground that it was incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant. This objection was sustained, and properly so. If, as alleged in their pleadings, these cattle were of such a nature that their value would change $20 per head in a period of 2½ months after November 15, 1920, the information of the witness on August 1 previous was not sufficient to qualify him to give an opinion as to their value on the later date. It is not, therefore, necessary to pass upon the legal question involved as to whether the restoration of the property in kind is sufficient under section 35, Civil Code, though the market value thereof has through no fault of the minors decreased since the time of the execution of the contract, because upon this feature of the case, at least, the trial court was sitting in equity and must have assumed from the character of the answer that the appellant was asking for equitable relief without clean hands.

[4] Appellant does not seriously claim error in the order striking out the portions of its pleading relating to the failure of the respondents to properly till and sow the land or as to the appellant's loss of the opportunity to lease the premises to another. The obvious answer to both propositions is that to permit appellant to recover on either issue would be nothing more than to award it damages for respondents' failure to carry out the contract. As under section 35, Civil Code, a minor may disaffirm and rescind a contract by restoring the consideration, it is patent that the other party may not by way of counterclaim or cross-complaint have a specific performance or recover damages for the minor's failure to carry out the terms of the contract which is rescinded. See 1 Black on Rescission and Cancellation, § 312, pp. 790, 791.

[5] Appellant makes mention of the point that, at the time of the delivery of the possession of the premises, the respondents did not actually transfer to the appellant by written conveyance their right to use the cattle brand. The facts are that the cattle brand itself was left upon the premises and the appellant had used it continuously from February 10, 1921, to the time of the trial. The written notice of disaffirmance expressly offered to transfer to the appellant the entire consideration which the respondents had received. This offer, it will be remembered, was conditional upon the return to the respondents of the consideration which the appellant had received. This condition the appellant refused to meet. It did, however, accept from the respondents all the real and personal property, including the cattle brand itself. It is also to be remembered that, in the original complaint and during the trial of the action, the respondents expressly renewed their offer, and that during the course of the trial they specifically offered to execute any paper which the appellant might demand to cover the matter of the cattle brand. This offer was again refused and the appellant cannot be heard at this time to complain.

[6-8] The further contention is made that the trial court erred in refusing to allow the appellant a set-off upon its counterclaim for the use of the hay and cotton seed meal which had been fed to the cattle during the time of respondents' occupancy of the premises. The trial court made the general finding that the respondents had restored and returned to the appellant the entire consideration moving to them under the contract. Upon the special issue of the use of the hay and cotton seed meal, the court found that the respondents fed to the cattle, purchased under the contract, about 100 tons of the hay and about 10 tons of the cotton seed meal, all of the reasonable value of $1,800, and "that said feeding of the said hay and meal to said cattle was done daily during said time in the regular daily course of proper care and treatment of said cattle, and was necessary for the purpose of sustaining and nourishing said cattle and keeping them in a healthy condition during said time. That all other hay and meal, except as fed to said cattle as aforesaid, were returned and restored." Inasmuch as it became respondents' duty under section 35, Civil Code, to either restore the consideration received in kind or to pay its equivalent, the finding that they had done either in respect to the hay and meal would have been sufficient to support the judgment. We do not understand that the code section requires a restoration of the consideration in kind or a payment of its equivalent in cash. Payment of any obligation may be made in cash or other property, when the obligatee is satisfied to accept other property in lieu of cash. When this is done the obligation is, of course, satisfied even though the terms of the obligation call for payment in cash.

A reasonable interpretation of the findings of the trial court, taken as a whole, is that the entire consideration moving to the respondents under the contract was returned to the appellant either in kind or its equivalent; that the appellant accepted what was offered in satisfaction of respondents' obligation under the Code section; and that there was, therefore, nothing due from the respondents to the appellant under any item of the transaction. During the period of respondents' occupancy of the premises they assumed the entire responsibility of caring for the ranch, as well as all the personal property transferred to them, including the feeding of the cattle and other live stock and all the expense thereof was borne by the respondents. For this expense and service they were entitled to recoupment from the appellant, and it is fair to assume in support of the judgment that the trial court took all these matters into consideration when it found that the entire consideration moving to the respondents had been returned to the appellant. Though it is true that the respondents did not in their pleading demand compensation for their services in caring for the properties or for the expense incurred, the case was tried as if such pleading had been made, and the trial court, therefore, had before it all the evidence covering the question of the benefits which had come to the respondents out of the contract, as well as the matter of what they had outlayed for the benefit of the appellant. Offsetting the one against the other, the trial court found that the entire consideration moving to the respondents had been returned, and we cannot say on the record before us that there was any error in his finding.

[9-11] The demands of the Code section are that a minor over the age of 18 years may disaffirm his contract upon restoring or offering to restore the consideration which he had received, but that if this cannot be done he must pay its equivalent. In seeking to avoid a contract under these circumstances the minor is governed in many respects by the ordinary rules relating to rescission of contracts in general, and in such a case, the action being in equity, the trial court is vested with a broad discretion to see that equity is done. When the contract involved includes various classes of property and a number of separate transactions, it is not necessary for the court in equity to segregate the contract into its separate parts, and to demand a restoration in kind of the separate items of property involved, but where, as here, the contract is disaffirmed upon an offer to restore the entire consideration upon the condition of the return to the minors of the consideration which passed from them, and the other parties accept from the minors the return of that which the minors claim to be the entire consideration which they received, the trial court should be permitted to balance the equities running through the entire transaction and to determine whether the consideration or its equivalent has not in fact been restored. The purpose of the Code section is to place the party dealing with the minors in statu quo, as far as this may be done, either by the return of the entire consideration in kind or by the payment of its equivalent (which may be in cash, property, or benefits received). The reasonable interpretation of the finding of the trial court, taken as a whole, is that this has been done, and we are satisfied that in this respect the findings are sustained by substantial evidence.

[12] Finally, it is argued that the trial court erred in awarding respondents interest on the sum of $20,000 from the date of payment rather than from the date of their disaffirmance of their contract. In reply the respondents point out that, in so far as Leota Le Baron is concerned, the contract in question was absolutely void as she was at the time of its execution a minor under the age of 18 years. As to the respondent Henry C. Le Baron, he being over the age of 18 years at the time the contract was made, his contract become void ab initio upon his disaffirmance. This being so, the money paid to the appellant by the minors was in effect an advancement without legal consideration on their part. The appellant enjoyed the use of this money from the date of the execution of the contract and upon its recovery was liable for interest from that date.

WOOD v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5672.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 28. 1926.)

1. Certiorari ⚷64(2)—Jurisdiction of superior court to reverse order of justice court, made after final judgment, only question on certiorari to review.

On certiorari to review an order of superior court reversing an order of justice court, made after final judgment, only question before reviewing court is jurisdiction of superior court to enter order complained of.

2. Justices of the peace ⚷184.

An appeal from a default judgment in the justice court raises questions of law alone.

3. Justices of the peace ⚷147(6).

There is no right to a separate appeal from an order of the justice court refusing to set aside default after judgment has been entered, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 874.

4. Justices of the peace ⚷183(½).

Superior court held without jurisdiction to set aside order of justice court, made after final judgment, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 980, where appeal to superior court was not heard on a statement of the case.

Application by Charles V. Wood for certiorari to review an order of the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for Alameda County and Hon. J. D. Murphey, Judge thereof, reversing an order of the justice court, made after final judgment. Order annulled.

Hill & Mays, of Oakland, and E. Coke Hill, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Richard Liebman and Stanley R. Sterne, both of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding in certiorari to review an order of the respondent court which reversed an order of the justice court made after final judgment, which denied a motion to set aside a default of one of the defendants. The proceeding in the justice court was an action for damages for personal injuries in which the petitioner herein was plaintiff. The default of the defendant Campana was duly entered upon his failure to appear after service of process, and judgment was thereafter duly entered against him. Notice of judgment was served upon him in accordance with the requirements of the Code, and more than ten days thereafter he served and filed his notice of motion to set aside the judgment as to him. This motion was denied, and thereafter that defendant served and filed his notice of appeal from the default judgment and from the order of the court denying his motion to set aside his default. This notice of appeal recited that the appeal was taken on questions of both law and fact, and it was not accompanied by any statement of the case.

On the hearing of the appeal in the superior court the petitioner herein objected to a trial of the case de novo upon the following grounds: That the appeal from the judgment, being one from a default judgment, was necessarily an appeal upon questions of law alone; that the appeal from the order denying the motion to set aside the defendant's default was not authorized by the Code, and the superior court was therefore without jurisdiction to hear it; that, no statement of the case having been filed, the only question before the court was one of law upon the face of the judgment alone; and that accordingly the superior court was without jurisdiction to review any order made after the judgment. The superior court apparently held with the petitioner on the first two objections urged, but, overruling him as to the last, proceeded to hear the case de novo on the question of the discretion of the justice court in denying the motion to set aside the default. Evidence was taken on this subject the same as if the matter was one arising originally in the superior court and addressed to the discretion of that court. Following the hearing the superior court ruled that the justice of the peace had improperly exercised his discretion in refusing to set aside the default and that the order should have been granted. Judgment followed reversing the order of the justice of the peace and directing him to set aside the default.

[1-3] On this proceeding the only question before us is the jurisdiction of the superior court to enter the order complained of. It is apparently conceded, as it must be, that an appeal from a default judgment in the justice court raises questions of law alone (Lugo v. Superior Court, 55 Cal. App. 561, 203 P. 812), and that there is no right to a separate appeal from an order of the justice court refusing to set aside the default after judgment has been entered. Section 974, Code Civ. Proc.

[4] The only question remaining is whether when a party appeals from a judgment of the justice court on a question of law alone without a statement of the case he may have a review of orders made after the entry of the judgment. Concededly the only power of the superior court to review such orders is found in section 980, Code of Civil Procedure. The section reads in part:

> "Upon an appeal heard upon a statement of the case, the superior court may review all orders affecting the judgment appealed from, and may set aside * * * proceedings subsequent to * * * such judgment." (Emphasis ours.)

It will be noted that this right of review of orders made subsequent to the judgment is dependent upon a statement of the case, and it is only when an appeal is presented in that manner that a review of orders made subsequent to the judgment can be had. Such was the ruling of the Supreme Court in Wells v. Torrance, 119 Cal. 437, 441, 51 P. 626, and such is the unmistakable meaning of the Code section cited. For this reason we are satisfied that the respondent court was without jurisdiction to hear and determine any question affecting orders made after the final judgment in the justice court because the appeal to the respondent court was not heard upon a statement of the case.

Order annulled.

SCHAINMAN v. KIERCE. (S. F. 11842.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1926.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑356.

Appeal not taken within 60 days from entry of judgment, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 939, must be dismissed on motion, in absence of motion for new trial.

2. Appeal and error 🔑348(1).

Code Civ. Proc. § 939, does not require service of notice of entry of judgment to set time for appeal running.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Paul Schainman against F. J. Kierce. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Harold Jacoby, of Oakland, and Milton Shepardson and F. J. Kierce, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hilton V. Christensen, Jacob W. Ehrlich, and Leon Samuels, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. Motion to dismiss an appeal. The plaintiff on July 28, 1923, commenced this action to quiet title to certain property situated in the city and county of San Francisco. An answer was duly filed by the defendant and a trial had upon the merits, which resulted in the rendition of a conditional judgment in favor of the defendant, wherein the defendant was ordered to pay to the plaintiff certain sums of money expended by the plaintiff in pursuit of his title to the property, and requiring that such payment be made before the title should vest in defendant, in accordance with the terms of said judgment. The defendant failed to make the payment above required, with the result that on May 1, 1924, a decree quieting title was entered in favor of the plaintiff. No motion for a new trial was made, nor does it appear that any notice of the entry of said judgment was given. On November 1, 1924, the defendant served and filed a notice of appeal to this court. On November 13, 1924, the defendant filed his request for a transcript on appeal, under the alternative method. On October 31, 1925, said transcript on appeal was filed with the clerk of the trial court by the court reporter who reported the proceedings in said action. On the 7th day of November, 1925, the plaintiff served notice of motion to dismiss this appeal, and the hearing thereon was had before this court on April 6, 1926. Thereafter and on May 10, 1926, the said motion was submitted to this court for decision.

[1] It would seem clear that the motion to dismiss this appeal must be granted.

The time within which an appeal from a judgment or order of the superior court may be taken is fixed by the provisions of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which section provides that such appeal must be taken within 60 days from the entry of said judgment or order, unless proceedings on motion for a new trial are pending, in which case the time of appealing from the judgment shall not expire until 30 days after entry of the order determining such motion, or other termination of the proceedings upon such motion in the trial court. No motion for a new trial having been made in this action, the time within which the defendant could have taken this appeal expired on July 1, 1924. The defendant's notice of appeal was not served until October 30, 1924, nor filed until November 1, 1924, both of which dates were long after his right to take and prosecute such appeal had expired, under the foregoing provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] The defendant's contention that he was entitled to 6 months' time within which to take such appeal, in view of the fact that no notice of entry of judgment had been served upon him, is without merit, since the foregoing section of the Code does not require the service of notice of entry of the judgment in order to set the time running within which an appeal from a judgment may be taken.

It follows that the appeal must be dismissed, and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Louis Nagy was convicted of arson in the first degree, and he appeals. Reversed.

Samuel Hamburg, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary and H. H. Linney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

SEAWELL, J. [1-3] The appellant was convicted of arson of the first degree. The grounds urged upon this appeal for a reversal of the judgment are the insufficiency of the evidence generally to justify a verdict of guilty of arson in any degree, and more specifically the total absence of any legal evidence to support the implied finding of the jury that there was present in the building described by the information at the time the fire was created a human being or human beings, proof of which is necessary to constitute arson of the first degree. The only evidence offered by the prosecution which tends at all to support that portion of the implied verdict of the jury that a human being was in said building at the time the alleged offense was committed is the purest kind of hearsay. We have made careful examination of the evidence, which, though circumstantial in its incriminatory bearing, was nevertheless sufficient to sustain a finding that the burning of the building was the willful and malicious act of the defendant, done with the intent to destroy it. Applying the well-known tests, the deductions made by the jury from the facts and circumstances would have supported a verdict of first degree arson had legal proof been made that a human being was in said building at the time the fire was started. In other words, we are of the opinion that the facts and circumstances were of such an incriminatory nature that the jury may well have found that there was no reasonable theory upon which the defendant could be innocent provided said facts and circumstances were true. Circumstantial evidence is legal evidence and may be as conclusive in its convincing force as the testimony of direct witnesses to the overt act. Circumstances very largely control the conduct of men in the most important affairs of life and may be sufficient to justify a conviction of crime where they are such as to exclude any other reasonable theory than that of the guilt of the accused. We will not enter into a discussion as to the evidentiary weight or effect of each particular circumstance or the relation of any one to the many other circumstances that appear in the record and from which a legal deduction of guilt may have been drawn. The case must be reversed upon the single ground that there was no legal evidence adduced by the prosecution to establish arson of the first degree. A brief statement of the facts is sufficient to illustrate the failure of the proof. The defendant occupied the upper flat of a two-story building. The lower flat was inhabited in the sense that it was occupied by tenants. But the burning of a building that is inhabited is not sufficient to justify a conviction of arson of the first degree. In addition thereto it must be "an inhabited building in which there is at the time [of the burning] some human being," etc. Pen. Code, § 454. The presence of a human being in the building at the time of burning is an ingredient absolutely necessary to sustain a conviction of arson of the first degree. People v. Abrams, 174 Cal. 172, 162 P. 395. Proof of this essential element must be established by competent evidence. Section 1845, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

> "A witness can testify of those facts only which he knows of his own knowledge; that is, which are derived from his own perceptions, except in those few express cases in which his opinions or inferences, or the declarations of others, are admissible."

The witness in this case had no knowledge derived from his own perception concerning the presence of said persons in the building at the time it was burning, nor does he come within any of the few exceptions mentioned in the statute. "Hearsay evidence is not, as a rule, competent to establish any specific fact which in its nature is susceptible of being proven by witnesses who can speak from their own knowledge (1 Greenl. Ev. sec. 99)." Pfister v. Dascey, 68 Cal. 572, 10 P. 117.

[4, 5] The evidence offered to prove the presence of human beings in the building at the time of the fire falls far short of meeting the plain requirements of the statute. The only witness who testified at all as to the issue was the fire marshal. Asked whether or not he knew of his own knowledge that the lower flat was occupied, he answered that he did. No claim is made that any person other than the defendant was in the upper flat. Counsel for the defendant objected to the question on the ground that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial. The examination proceeded:

> "Q. Was it occupied? A. Yes, I interviewed the woman down there if she could tell me. (Italics supplied.)
> "Q. And she was living there that night that the fire was discovered? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Sleeping there? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Anybody else besides the woman sleeping there? A. Yes, sir; members of her family.
> "Mr. Hamburg: I object to that as calling for a conclusion, and it, necessarily, is based upon hearsay testimony.
> "The Court: You yourself did not go into the lower flat? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. And in going into it you saw these people? A. Yes; spoke with them and talked with them.
> "Q. And they were occupying it at that time? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. Did you go into their bedrooms? A. Yes; I was in the front bedroom talking to the woman who ran the flat.
> "Q. The bed appeared to have been used? A. Yes, sir.
> "The Court: I will overrule the objection.
> "Mr. Skillin: Q. And you say besides the woman there were how many? A. There were three or four more; the house was occupied."

The foregoing is all the evidence given as to this issue. Waiving its hearsay character, it is weak, inconclusive, and unsatisfactory. At no time did the witness state that the woman tenant or any of the other persons was in the building at the time the fire was started. In a general sense the persons mentioned were occupants of the lower flat and slept there, but the requirement of the statute was not squarely met. The witness did not arrive at the building until 2:30 a. m., almost an hour after the fire had been extinguished and the firemen had departed. Whether the conversation which he had with the lady occupant of the lower flat occurred upon his first visit, or whether it was after 8 o'clock of the same morning upon the return of the witness to the premises, is not made clear, but the sequence of events would indicate that the interview occurred upon the second visit. But whatever construction may be reasonably placed upon the foregoing evidence, the fact remains that it was hearsay as to a specific, material fact, and the defendant cannot be deprived of the right which the statute and Constitution guarantee to every person accused of the crime. to wit, the right to be confronted by his accusers. In the instant case the defendant was denied the opportunity of cross-examining the only persons whom it is claimed were in the building at the time the fire was created, and the question of the degree of the crime was left to extrajudicial statements alleged to have been made by parties who were not placed under oath at the time and whose absence at the trial was unaccounted for. No circumstance of sufficiently conclusive character was offered to show the presence of said persons in the building at the time it was burning. Whether the defendant was guilty of arson of the first degree or of the second degree was a very important matter as arson of the first degree is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than two years and may extend to the entire life of a person convicted, while arson in the second degree is punishable by imprisonment of not less than one year nor more than twenty-five years. We are presented with a somewhat anomalous situation. The evidence in our opinion is sufficient to sustain a judgment of conviction of arson of the second degree, and insufficient to sustain a conviction of arson of the first degree, as found by the jury, and this court has neither the constitutional nor statutory authority to modify or interfere with the verdict of the jury in any respect. It is within our power only to affirm or reverse judgments in criminal cases. The case must therefore be remanded for a new trial.

[6, 7] Appellant complains of certain rulings of the court limiting him in the cross-examination of certain witnesses. The subject-matter of the examination in which this occurred was not very important. The better practice, however, is either to permit cross-examination of witnesses on all matters brought out in direct examination or to strike out the testimony of the witness deemed by the court to be immaterial or irrelevant. The ruling which resulted in the exclusion of the testimony of two character witnesses called by the defendant was not prejudicial. The defendant did not show that the witnesses were competent to testify as to his general reputation. The competency of a witness to so testify is largely a matter of discretion with the court, and we cannot interfere with the court's adverse ruling unless it appears to amount to an abuse of discretion. It does not appear that there was an abuse of discretion in the instant case. The matters complained of will probably not arise in case a retrial is had.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

PEOPLE v. MARTIN et al. (Cr. 2881.)

1. Criminal law 🔑912—Order granting new trial before expiration of time for pronouncing judgment after denial of former motion held a nullity (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Order granting defendants' second motion for new trial before expiration of time for pronouncing judgment held a nullity, in absence of showing that order, from which appeal was announced, denying first motion was entered prematurely or inadvertently, or that any application for relief or showing pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 473, was made.

2. Criminal law 🔑912—Court could not reconsider motion for new trial or similar one after announcement of appeal from order denying motion (Pen. Code, §§ 1182, 1237).

Defendants having announced appeal, which lies under Pen. Code, § 1237, from order denying motion for new trial, before pronouncement of judgment under Pen. Code, § 1182, court could not reconsider motion or similar one and enter order thereon unless appeal was premature.

3. Criminal law 🔑912 — Defendants granted new trial pending appeal from order denying former motion, before expiration of time for pronouncement of judgment held entitled to new trial after expiration of such time without judgment (Pen. Code, § 1191).

Order granting second motion for new trial pending appeal from order denying first motion before time for pronouncement of judgment had expired under Pen. Code, § 1191, being a nullity, defendants are entitled to new trial at trial court's hands after expiration of such time without judgment having been pronounced.

4. Criminal law 🔑913(1)—Trial court may order new trial when judgment is not pronounced within statutory time (Pen. Code, § 1191).

When judgment is not pronounced pursuant to verdict within time prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1191, jurisdiction continues in trial court to order new trial and proceed to verdict and judgment.

5. Criminal law 🔑950 — Supreme Court cannot order new trial, for failure to pronounce judgment within statutory time, on appeal from order granting second motion for new trial before expiration of such time (Pen. Code, § 1191).

Supreme Court cannot order new trial for failure to pronounce judgment against defendants within time prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1191, on appeal from order erroneously granting new trial, before expiration of such time, pending appeal from order denying former motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; F. C. Drumm, Judge.

Frank Martin, Mrs. J. Wall, E. R. Wall, and Mrs. E. S. Ward were convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a minor. From an order granting them a new trial, the People appeal. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Alex. P. Nelson, Dist. Atty., of Santa Ana, for the People.

Wm. T. Kendrick, of Los Angeles, Frank H. Gray, of Burbank, and Oscar M. Gipson, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHENK, J. The defendants were jointly tried in the the superior court of Orange county on an information charging them with contributing to the delinquency of a minor, one Ivory Shields, a youth over the age of 20 years, in that they did solicit, induce, and procure said Shields to purchase for them eight ounces of intoxicating liquor, in violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), and did furnish and give said intoxicating liquor to said Shields to drink.

On March 24, 1925, the jury returned a verdict finding the defendants guilty as charged in the information. On the same day the defendants presented a motion for a new trial on numerous grounds. The motion was denied, and the defendants gave immediate no tice of appeal from the order. The court thereupon continued the matter to March 27th for judgment and sentence or to entertain an application for probation. On March 27th the defendants presented a new motion for a new trial on substantially the same grounds set forth in the motion, which was denied on March 24th, with the additional specification, however, that the jury received evidence out of court. The court permitted the new motion to be presented and received oral evidence on the additional specification to the effect that two of the jurors who tried said cause were present at the preliminary examination of the defendants and had heard the evidence there presented. After the taking of said evidence was concluded the court granted said second motion for a new trial. The matter is now before us on appeal by the people from the order granting the said motion.

[1] It is the contention of the Attorney General, among other things, that the order appealed from was a nullity and in nowise affected the status of the case with respect to the order denying the first motion. The point is well taken. There is no statutory or other authority for the presentation or consideration of a second motion for a new trial under the circumstances here shown. There was no showing that the order denying the first motion was entered prematurely or by inadvertence, as was disclosed in Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 P. 8, nor was there any application for relief or showing pursuant to section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and at the time the second motion was made the time for pronouncement of judgment had not expired. If such a proceeding were sanctioned the results pointed out in Coombs v. Hibberd, 43 Cal. 452, would be apparent, and the time limited within which a motion for a new trial might be made would be enlarged, and new trial proceedings would become interminable. See, also, People v. Center, 61 Cal. 191; Odd Fellows' Sav. Bank v. Deuprey, 66 Cal. 168, 4 P. 1173; Dorland v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 484, 6 P. 135; Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 596, 19 P. 174; Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 P. 11. While the cases cited involved new trial proceedings in civil cases no authority has been noted which prescribes a different rule in criminal cases.

[2] Furthermore, an order denying a motion for a new trial in a criminal case is an appealable order. Pen. Code, § 1237. The appeal from the order denying the first motion was announced in open court by the defendants immediately after the denial of the motion and prior to the pronouncement of judgment. Pen. Code, § 1182. Assuming that the said appeal was not premature, it would follow that said new trial proceedings were removed from the jurisdiction of the trial court by the taking of the appeal. This would afford an additional reason why the court could not thereafter, under the facts here shown, reconsider the same or a similar motion and enter an order thereon.

[3] In reply to the position taken by the Attorney General, the defendants contend that they are entitled to a new trial by operation of law for the reason that judgment was not pronounced against them within the time prescribed by law, nor at all, citing Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 106 P. 718, People v. Winner, 31 Cal. App. 352, 160 P. 689, and People v. Boling, 32 Cal. App. 42, 161 P. 1169. It is clear that the defendants' appeal from the order denying the first motion did not operate to stay the hand of the court in proceeding to pronounce judgment. As the order granting the second motion was a nullity, the time within which the court was required to pronounce judgment pursuant to the verdict expired March 29th, or five days after the verdict (Pen. Code. § 1191); by reason whereof the respondents are entitled to a new trial at the hands of the trial court.

[4, 5] Jurisdiction still continues in that court to order a new trial and proceed with the cause to verdict and judgment when, as here, judgment has not been pronounced pursuant to the verdict within the time prescribed by law. Rankin v. Superior Court. supra. The power to order the new trial does not inhere in this court on the record before us, but would vest only upon appeal from an order denying a new trial to the defendants upon their application therefor on the ground that judgment was not pronounced against them within due time. The only matter now before this court is the validity of the order appealed from, and, as its entry was without authority of law, it should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

KENNEDY v. CITY OF GUSTINE.
(Sac. 3720.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑231(2)—Contract to pay for engineering work held not void on ground that engineer was officer interested in street improvement contract (Improvement Act 1911, § 41).

City's agreement to pay for specified engineering work 7 per cent. of cost of street improvements held not void on ground that engineer was city officer, interested to such extent in contract, trustees' minutes and contract clearly showing that he was employee, appointed pursuant to Improvement Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 751), § 41, though referred to as "city engineer."

2. Officers 🔑1—Whether position is public office depends on powers, duties, functions, etc., irrespective of formal designation.

Whether position is public office depends on power granted and wielded, duties and functions performed, and other circumstances manifesting its true character, irrespective of formal designation by statute or otherwise.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑288(1).

City is not primarily liable for cost of street improvements, under Improvement Act of 1911, but such cost becomes lien on property benefited.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑220(2)—One appointed to discharge duties of city engineer is entitled to reasonable compensation (Improvement Act 1911, §§ 17, 41, 79, subd. 3).

Under Improvement Act 1911 (St. 1911, pp. 737, 766, §§ 17, 79, subd. 3), one appointed by city, under section 41, to discharge duties of city engineer is entitled to reasonable compensation for services.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑220(2)—Fixing compensation at percentage of cost of improvements does not invalidate contract with one appointed to discharge duties of city engineer (Improvement Act 1911, § 41).

Fixing compensation of one appointed by city, under Improvement Act 1911 (St. 1911, p. 751), § 41, to discharge duties of city engineer, at 7 per cent. of cost of street improvements, does not invalidate contract with him.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑220(8).

One suing city for compensation for engineering work need not show that funds in treasury were sufficient to pay claim and that latter did not exceed income for year.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by C. C. Kennedy against the City of Gustine. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for appellant.
Nathan B. McVay, of Modesto, and Hugh K. Landram, of Merced, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice WILLIAM M. FINCH of the District Court of Appeal, Third Appellate District, while sitting as a justice pro tem. of this court, is adopted as the decision of the court:

The defendant is a city of the sixth class. At the times herein mentioned it had no city engineer, unless it can be said that the plaintiff was appointed to that office. The relation between the parties is shown by the minutes of the board of trustees of defendant and the contract entered into between the trustees and the plaintiff. In the minutes of July 12, 1920, the following appears:

"Mr. C. C. Kennedy, from Berkeley, being present, talking with the board in regard to street grades and so forth for the city of Gustine. On motion made and seconded, Mr. C. C. Kennedy was appointed as city engineer, his compensation to be 7 per cent. of cost of construction work."

The minutes of August 16, 1920, recite:

"The agreement between C. C. Kennedy and the city of Gustine was read, a motion was made and recorded that the president of the board of trustees be authorized to execute agreement."

Thereupon, at the same time, the agreement referred to was executed by the president of the board and the plaintiff. The agreement provides:

"This agreement made and entered into this 16th day of August, 1920, by and between the city of Gustine, state of California, and a city of the sixth class, party of the first part, and C. C. Kennedy, of the county of Marin, state of California, the party of the second part, witnesseth:

"That for and in consideration of the compensation to be paid by the party of the first part to the party of the second part at the times and in the manner hereinafter provided, the party of the first part hereby employs said party of the second part as city engineer of the said city of Gustine, for the purpose of performing the engineering work and supervising the construction of certain street improvements in said city of Gustine; namely, the construction of curbs, sidewalks, and pavement upon [naming certain streets] during the present and next succeeding calendar year.

"In the prosecution of the work of making said improvements, the party of the second part hereby agrees to perform the following services, to wit: To make all surveys, run all levels, cross-sections and profiles; to prepare all data necessary to the fixing of grades for the entire city of Gustine; to make all necessary maps and designs for the carrying out of said work; to prepare or pass upon all ordinances, resolutions, and notices required to be adopted or posted in the conduct and prosecution of such improvements; to prepare all specifications and inspect all work performed and materials furnished in said work; to prepare or pass upon all contracts and estimates, diagrams and certificates relating to such work from the commencement to the completion thereof.

"In consideration of said services, said city of Gustine hereby agrees to pay to said party of the second part in accordance with law, the sum equal to 7 per cent. of the total cost of the construction of each of said improvements hereinabove referred to, payable in the following manner, to wit: Two and one-half per cent. of the estimated cost upon the completion and filing of the plans and specifications and estimate of quantities, 2½ per cent. of said estimated cost upon the completion of 50 per cent. of the work of construction, and the balance of the total 7 per cent. of the actual cost of construction upon the completion and filing of the engineer's certificate, the completion of the assessment roll, and diagram covering the cost of said improvement. In the event that any of said improvements are rescinded or postponed by the city, the party of the first part shall pay to the party of the second part as compensation the proper pro rata in accordance with the preceding schedule."

The plaintiff duly performed all services required of him by the agreement until the defendant abandoned the contemplated improvements. The proceedings were taken under the Improvement Act of 1911. Stats. 1911, p. 730. The complaint contains two counts. From the allegations and proofs it appears that the proceedings relative to the contemplated improvements referred to in the first count were carried forward to the point of advertising for and receiving bids and then abandoned, and that those referred to in the second count did not proceed further than the adoption of grades. The defendant thereupon "rescinded and canceled" all proceedings had in the matter and notified the plaintiff "that his services as city engineer are no longer required and for him to present his bill." The plaintiff duly presented his claims for $1,824.65 for services in connection with the first contemplated improvements, and $350 for the second. The defendant refused to allow the claims and this action followed. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for half the amount of each claim, and the defendant has appealed.

The complaint alleges the foregoing facts and that the amounts stated are the reasonable value of plaintiff's services. The answer admits the execution of the contract and the performance of the alleged services by plaintiff, alleges that such services were performed "under and pursuant to the agreement," denies the alleged reasonable value of plaintiff's services, and alleges that he has been fully paid therefor.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the agreement is void on the ground that at the time of its execution the plaintiff was an officer of the city, and that he was interested in any contract that might be made for street improvements, in that he was to receive 7 per cent. of the contract price thereof. It is clear, however, that the plaintiff was not an officer of the city, but that he was employed, not to discharge the general duties of the office of city engineer, but only the particular engineering work specified in the contract. Section 41 of the Improvement Act of 1911 provides:

> "In all those cities where there is no city engineer, the city council thereof is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint a suitable person to discharge the duties herein laid down as those of city engineer, and all the provisions hereof applicable to the city engineer shall apply to such person so appointed. Said city council is hereby empowered to fix his compensation for such services."

[2] From the minutes of the board of trustees and the contract itself, it is clearly apparent that the plaintiff was not an officer of the city, but an employee thereof. Any reference to him in the minutes, or the contract, or in the evidence as "city engineer" is not controlling. Whether a position or office is a public office depends "not upon what the particular office in question may be called, nor upon what a statute may call it, but upon the power granted and wielded, the duties and functions performed, and other circumstances which manifest the true character of the position, and make, and mark it a public office, irrespective of its formal designation." Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 186, 201 P. 120, 123; Logan v. Shields, 190 Cal. 661, 662, 214 P. 45; Curtin v. State of California, 61 Cal. App. 377, 390, 214 P. 1030.

[3-5] A city is not primarily liable for the cost of street improvements made pursuant to the terms of the act of 1911, but the same becomes a lien on the property to be benefited, if the improvements are actually made. Section 17 of the act, however, provides: "In case the work is abandoned by the city before the letting of the contract, the incidental expenses incurred previous to such abandonment shall be paid out of the city treasury." Section 79, subd. 3, provides: "The term 'incidental expenses,' as used in this act, shall include the compensation of the city engineer for work done by him." It thus appears by the terms of the act, as well as by the terms of the contract between the parties, that the plaintiff is entitled to reasonable compensation for his services. The percentage method of fixing such compensation does not render the contract invalid. Skidmore v. West, 186 Cal. 212, 220, 199 P. 497.

[6] Appellant says:

> "It was incumbent upon the respondent to allege and prove that there were funds in the treasury of the city of Gustine sufficient to pay the claims of respondent, and that said claims did not exceed the income and revenues provided for the year in which the indebtedness was incurred. Admittedly, there was no allegation whatsoever as to the condition of the funds, and there was no showing made whatsoever at the trial in reference thereto."

The burden was not upon the plaintiff to make such showing. In overruling a like objection in Johnson v. County of Yuba, 103 Cal. 538, 540, 37 P. 528, 529, it is said:

"Nor is it any ground of demurrer that it is not alleged that there was money in the county treasury to meet the demand, or that the allowance of the demand against the county would not exceed the limit of liability which the county was authorized to contract for the fiscal year. This was purely matter of defense, if it existed."

See, also, Dillon's Municipal Corporations, (5th Ed.) § 208, and 15 Corpus Juris, 575.

The evidence is amply sufficient to support the judgment, whether based upon the terms of the act or those of the contract. The evidence is also sufficient to show that plaintiff has not been paid for his services. The other errors assigned by the appellant are based upon contentions hereinbefore considered, and are without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONTEREY COUNTY et al. v. RADER.
(S. F. 11973).

1. Sheriffs and constables 🔑27—Sheriff, without organizing posse, may orally summon any person to assist in making arrest, and such person has all authority of formally deputized officer (Pol. Code, § 4157, subd. 5; Pen. Code, §§ 150, 723).

Sheriff, without organizing formal posse comitatus, may orally summon any person to assist him in effecting arrest, and such person has all authority of formally deputized officer under Pol. Code, § 4157, subd. 5, and Pen. Code, §§ 150, 723.

2. Master and servant 🔑364—One compelled by sheriff to assist in making arrest held employee (Pen. Code, § 150; Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 7, and section 8, subd. [a]).

One compelled by sheriff to perform service of deputy sheriff, under Pen. Code, § 150, in assisting sheriff to make arrest, was employee in service of employer, within Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 7 and section 8, subds. (a) and (b), being St. 1917, p. 835, when killed by one sought to be arrested.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employé.]

3. Master and servant 🔑348.

Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), must be liberally construed.

4. Master and servant 🔑364—Persons in service of public officer under appointment held not excluded from Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 7, and section 8, subd. (a); "employé."

Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, subd. (a), being St. 1917, p. 835, including within term "employee" every person in service of employer, as defined in section 7, under "any appointment or contract of hire," and "all elected and appointed paid public officers," held not to exclude persons in service of public officer under appointment, not of hire.

5. Master and servant 🔑364—Deputy sheriff not appointed for his own convenience is entitled to benefits of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, subd. (a).

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, subd. (a), being St. 1917, p. 835, deputy sheriff, not appointed for his own convenience, is entitled to benefits, especially in view of controversy because of which 1917 amendment was enacted.

6. Evidence 🔑45.

Supreme Court will take judicial notice that many deputies, such as deputy sheriffs, are appointed at their own request to serve their personal interests.

7. Master and servant 🔑364—Inclusion of appointed paid public officers within benefits of Workmen's Compensation Act held not to annul provisions as to deputies (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917, § 8, subd. [a]).

Inclusion of "appointed paid public officers" within benefits of Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, § 8, subd. (a), by amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 835), does not vitiate or annul subsequent provisions as to deputy clerks, sheriffs, etc., not expressly excluded by act, such amendment being intended to apply to heads of departments.

8. Master and servant 🔑386(1)—Compensation for death of one compelled to assist sheriff is based on average annual earnings of deputy sheriff (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917).

Compensation under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), for death of one compelled by sheriff to assist in making arrest, should be based on average annual earnings of deputy sheriff of such sheriff's county.

9. Master and servant 🔑364—Right to compensation for death of one performing service of deputy sheriff is not affected by prior statutes authorizing sheriff to organize posse (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917; Pen. Code, § 150).

Right to compensation, under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act 1917 (St. 1917, p. 831), for death of one compelled by sheriff to perform service of deputy sheriff, under Pen. Code, § 150, is not affected by prior statutes merely authorizing sheriff to organize posse, as public necessity requires.

Petition by the County of Monterey and the State Compensation Insurance Fund for a writ of review to annul an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission to Nellie Pearl Rader, by Anna K. Rader, her guardian ad litem and trustee, for the death of N. H. Rader, employee. Award affirmed.

Frank J. Creede, Thos. W. Slaven, and B. E. Pemberton, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This matter is before us upon a petition for a writ of review praying for the annulment of the award made by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of respondent, Nellie Pearl Rader, the minor daughter of N. H. Rader, killed under circumstances hereafter related. Anna K. Rader is the mother of and guardian ad litem of said Nellie Pearl Rader, but she makes no claim for herself.

The facts of the case are these: N. H. Rader, father of said Nellie Pearl Rader, was, on July 6, 1925, a citizen of the county of Monterey, this state, and engaged in the business of conducting a secondhand store at the city of Salinas, county of Monterey. He had attended a meeting of a fraternal organization on the night of July 6, 1925, and was returning to his home at about the hour of 11 o'clock, at which time he was commanded by the sheriff of Monterey county, who was then organizing a party of officers for the purpose of apprehending and placing under arrest certain violators of the Wright or Volstead Acts (St. Cal. 1921, p. 79; U. S. Comp. St. § 10138¼ et seq.) who were criminally connected with landing or seizing by force a cargo of intoxicating liquors, and who had earlier in the evening while engaged in said unlawful enterprise, fired upon the sheriff's deputies, and were lurking under cover of night at or near Moss Landing, said county, to join said party of officers in the pursuit of said violators of the law. The sheriff, as he was about to depart for Moss Landing, observed the presence of N. H. Rader, and commanded his services. The party then consisted of the sheriff, a regularly appointed deputy sheriff, and the chief of police of the city of Salinas. The sheriff had been in search of the constable of Salinas township to complete his aide, but, being unable to find him, mustered said Rader into service in his stead. A firearm, furnished by the deputy sheriff, was placed in the hands of Rader. Upon arriving at the objective spot at about 12 o'clock midnight, the party or posse was divided into two groups. While they were in the act of being stationed at certain points to block the avenues of escape and there to await the coming of day, they were viciously fired upon by the persons whom they were attempting to place under arrest and who were armed with machine guns, with the result that a bullet fired from a machine gun operated by said persons pierced the heart of Rader, and he was instantly killed.

The proceedings are governed by the act as amended in 1917, approved March 23, 1917, and which became effective January 1, 1918, St. 1917, p. 831. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded his daughter, 14 years of age, and wholly dependent, a death benefit of $4,900, payable at the rate of $20.83 a week, and $100 burial expenses. The death benefit is based upon the annual, actual wages or salary fixed by law as the compensation of a deputy sheriff of Monterey county. The commission found, and the finding is sustained by the evidence, that Rader had served the sheriff and county as an officer in other emergency cases. His per diem for previous services was fixed at $5, which was paid as a county charge upon one or two occasions, and by the sheriff from his personal account upon other occasions. Nothing was said in the instant case as to compensation. Petitioners insist that the commission exceeded its jurisdiction in making the award, for the reason that the deceased cannot be regarded as an employee within the terms and meaning of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, inasmuch as he was required to perform the services demanded of him by the sheriff by virtue of the statutory law of the state, and not by virtue of any contract entered into between him and the sheriff or the county. It is argued by petitioners that the deceased was commanded or conscripted by the sheriff under the provisions of statutory law which give the sheriff authority to summon a posse comitatus, and when killed he was but performing a duty which every citizen owes to his sovereign, the state, there being no warrant or authority in the law providing for the payment of wages or compensation to a person thus pressed into service.

The right of the respondent minor child to recover compensation on account of the death of her parent, caused in the manner herein related, exists, if at all, by virtue of the provisions of sections 7 and 8 (a), Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act. Statutes and Amendments 1917, p. 831. The term "employer," as used in said section (section 7), is declared to mean the state, and each county, city and county, city, school district, irrigation district, all other districts established by law, and all public corporations and quasi public corporations and public agencies therein, and every person, firm, voluntary association, and private corporation, including any public service corporation, "who has any person in service under any appointment or contract of hire, or apprenticeship, express or implied, oral or written, and the legal representative of any deceased employer." (Italics supplied.) Section 8 (a) defines the term "employee" to mean:

> "Every person in the service of an employer as defined by section 7 hereof under any appointment, or contract of hire, or apprenticeship, express or implied, oral or written, including aliens, and also including minors, whether lawfully or unlawfully employed, and all elected and appointed paid public officers, and all officers and members of boards of directors of quasi-public or private corporations, while rendering actual service for such corporations for pay, but excluding any person whose employment is both casual and not in the course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer, and also excluding any employee engaged in household domestic service, farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural, or horticultural labor, in stock or poultry raising, and any person holding an appointment as deputy clerk, deputy sheriff, or deputy constable appointed for the convenience of such appointee, who receives no compensation from the county or municipal corporation or from the citizens thereof for services as such deputy; * * *"

[1] Clearly the deceased was in the service of the county of Monterey by the appointment of its sheriff, who was vested with power to confer upon the deceased the authority of a deputy sheriff or peace officer of said county. Pol. Code, § 4157, subd. 5; Pen. Code, §§ 150 and 723. The sheriff may, without organizing a formal posse comitatus, orally summon to his assistance any person when he deems it necessary to effect an arrest. 2 R. C. L. p. 491. The person thus summoned has all the authority of a formally deputized officer in such matter, and is in fact a de jure deputy sheriff. The deceased was at the time he was slain in the service of the county under appointment by a county officer, to wit, the sheriff.

[2] The next question presented for solution is whether he was excluded from the term "employee," as it is defined by said section 8 (a). It will be observed that said section by a general clause includes within the term employee "every person in the service of an employer as defined by section seven hereof under any appointment or contract of hire or apprenticeship," and then, out of an abundance of caution, proceeds, for reasons that will hereafter be related, to bring within the meaning of the term "employee," by specific mention, "all elected and appointed paid public officers."

The section concludes by specifically excluding from the meaning of the word "employee" all employees engaged in household domestic service, farm, dairy, agricultural, viticultural, or horticultural labor, etc., and "any person holding an appointment as deputy clerk, deputy sheriff or deputy constable appointed for the convenience of such appointee, who receives no compensation from the county or municipal corporation or from the citizens thereof for services as such deputy. * * *" The exclusion of persons rendering service from the benefits of the act must be considered in the light of subdivision (b) of said section 8, which provides:

> "Any person rendering service for another, other than as an independent contractor, or as expressly excluded herein, is presumed to be an employee within the meaning of this act." (Italics supplied.)

The service rendered by the deceased by no means excluded him from the definition of the term employee. That he was acting in the course of the business or occupation of the sheriff there is no room for question, and that he was in the service of his employer by appointment by the sheriff, who was the county's legally authorized officer or agent in such cases, is beyond cavil.

[3, 4] We are next confronted with the proposition that, because "all elected and appointed paid public officers" are expressly mentioned as being within the benefits of the act, it must follow that all other persons in the service of a public officer under any appointment not of hire are excluded from its compensatory provisions even though said appointees do not come within the class of those persons who are expressly excluded by the act. We are not convinced that the act intended to exclude from its benefits all persons in the service of a public officer by any appointment, and that "any appointment," means that such persons must, in order to come within the provisions, be in service under an appointment "of hire." The class of servants upon which the benefits of the act are expressly conferred includes "persons in service under any appointment, or contract of hire, or apprenticeship." Three distinct relationships are thus specified, and, in view of the liberality of construction that must be indulged in favor of the award and the positiveness of the language required to justify exclusion from the benefits of the act, it cannot be said that it was the clear intent of the act that there be read into it, following the words "any appointment," the qualifying words "of hire," as such words appear after the word "contract."

[5, 6] Section 8 (a) ex industria provides that "all elected and appointed paid public officers" are employees within the meaning and purposes of the act and only such persons as hold by appointment, as "deputy clerk, deputy sheriff, or deputy constable appointed for the convenience of such appointee, who receives no compensation from the county or municipal corporation or from the citizens thereof for services as such deputy," are excluded from the benefits of the act. It is fair to conclude from the foregoing language that a deputy officer, such as a deputy sheriff, who is not appointed for his own convenience (and we will take judicial notice that many such are appointed at their own request to serve their personal interests), is entitled to the benefits of the compensatory provisions of the act. There is much reason to sustain the construction which we are required to place upon the section, not alone by reason of the peculiar phraseology of said section, but also in view of the history of the legal controversy which arose out of the circumstances of the slaying of the sheriff of Mono county, as set out in the case of Mono County v. Industrial Accident Commission, 175 Cal. 752, 167 P. 377. The Legislature, with the purpose of saving such cases from the peril of annulment, extended the term "employee" to include elected heads of public offices and inserted in the amendment of 1917 the italicized words "all elected and appointed paid public officers," words not in the acts of 1911 and 1913. The slaying of the sheriff of Mono county occurred in 1915, and the court held that, inasmuch as the law as it then stood (Stats. 1913, p. 279) did not make provision for the compensation of "elected" officials, and the office of sheriff not being one filled by appointment, the death of said sheriff was not compensable. Mono County v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra. The sheriff in that case was killed while engaged in an attempt to apprehend offenders against the law in July, 1915. A writ of certiorari was issued out of this court in October, 1916, and an opinion was filed August 27, 1917, annulling the award.

There can be no doubt but that the legal and public controversies that grew out of the uncertain situation as to whether the sheriff (an elected officer) was entitled to compensation, under the wording of the statute as it then stood, furnished the reason for the amendment of 1917. There is no room to doubt that the Legislature had in mind but one particular class of officers, to wit, elected officials, whose right to enjoy the benefit of the act was under attack in that case, and not deputies, whose right to compensation was not at issue. As to the latter, the act provides that "any person holding an appointment as deputy clerk, deputy sheriff, or deputy constable" who receives no compensation from the county or municipal corporation, nor from the citizens thereof for services rendered as such deputy is excluded from the act, only in case such deputy is appointed for his own convenience. The decedent did not fall within the foregoing or any other clause of exclusion. He was a deputy sheriff designated by his principal to perform an official act, and necessarily clothed with all the executive power in the premises that any commission could have conferred upon him.

[7] By the amendment of section 8 (a), supra, which was made for the purpose of including within the benefits of the statute "elected officers," the Legislature also added "appointed paid public officers." We are of the opinion, as expressed above, that the Legislature by the amendment had in mind the principals or heads of the various departments of government considered with respect to two classes of public officials, to wit, those who receive no compensation for their services but are allowed their expenses, or a stated fixed per diem deemed sufficient to cover actual expenses while engaged in occasional service, and those who receive a fixed salary for the performance of continuous duties. But the inclusion by amendment of "appointed paid public officers," which we think was intended to apply to the heads of departments, does not vitiate or annul the subsequent provisions of the act which relate specifically to deputy clerks, deputy sheriffs, and deputy constables—officers not within the express exclusion provisions of the act.

Village of West Salem v. Industrial Commission, 162 Wis. 57, 155 N. W. 929, L. R. A. 1918C, 1077, is direct authority for the commission's award in the instant case. Voeck, a private citizen, was called upon by the city marshal of the village of West Salem to assist in arresting a person who was resisting legal process. In attempting to execute the command of the marshal, Voeck was killed by the person resisting arrest. Section 1, Compensation Act of Wisconsin (St. 1913, § 2394—7) corresponding with section 8 (a) of our act, provides that the term "employee" as used in the act shall be construed to mean:

> "(1) Every person in the service of the state, or of any county, city, town, village, or school district therein under any appointment, or contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, except any official of the state, or of any county, city, town, village, or school district therein."

The court, in applying the law, as declared by said section, to the facts of the case, said:

> "By command of the village marshal Voeck was required to perform duties of the same kind as those of the marshal, namely, police duties to suppress a breach of the peace and to enforce the criminal law. The transaction in fact conferred on Voeck the powers and duties of a police officer for the purposes and the exigencies of the occasion. From this it logically follows that Voeck was engaged with the marshal in performing police duties in the village at the marshal's command. The duties and powers thus imposed on him under authority of the village marshal, by force of the statutes, constituted an appointment of Voeck to perform police service for the village. State ex rel. Brown v. Appleby, 139 Wis. 195, 120 N. W. 861; McCumber v. Waukesha Co., 91 Wis. 442, 65 N. W. 51; 3 Cyc. 877; 2 Ruling Case Law, p. 491, section 52. The result is that Voeck acquired the status of a police officer of the village and was engaged in the execution of the criminal law at the time of his death. * * *
> "It is considered that Voeck, as we have shown, was in fact rendering services under an authorized appointment of the village within the power conferred by statute upon the marshal; that he acted in the capacity of a temporary policeman for the village by authority of law; and that the deceased was performing policeman's service within the contemplation of the Workmen's Compensation Act. * * *"

[8] The court held in the foregoing case that the award should be based on the earnings of one doing police service in the village of West Salem at the time Voeck was killed. In the instant case, under the rules above announced, compensation would be fixed, as computed by the commission, upon the average annual earnings of a deputy sheriff of the county of Monterey. This basis of computation is also approved in Millard County v. Industrial Commission, 62 Utah, 46, 217 P. 974. The facts of that case are quite similar to the facts of the instant case, and the Workmen's Compensation Act of Utah does not differ from our act in material respects. Upon principle it is an authority supporting the commission's award.

[9] Petitioners assert with much emphasis the claim that the status of N. H. Rader was that of a member of a posse comitatus, and that neither under the common law nor the statutes of this state could he be regarded as an officer or as a person serving by appointment. The right of the respondent to receive compensation is derived by virtue of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, and this right is not affected by statutes passed many years prior to the adoption of said act, and which merely confer authority upon the sheriff to organize a posse as public necessity may require. Those statutes have to do with the public peace and safety of the state, and do not purport to give the slighest consideration to the objects or purposes made paramount by recent legislation, which makes compensable injuries received by persons while engaged in both private and public service.

The decedent in the instant case was compelled by the sheriff of the county of Monterey to perform the service of a deputy sheriff of that county (Pen. Code, § 150), and was charged with the performance of the same duty that would have rested upon a regularly appointed deputy sheriff under like circumstances, and, while so acting, he was killed. Under such circumstances he will be held to be within the protection of the law in assuming the risks incident to his office. We feel satisfied that, when killed, he was performing the service of a deputy sheriff, within the contemplation of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, of this state.

The award is affirmed.

MANOS v. CODINA. (Sac. 3675.)

Appeal and error ⚷781(7).

Appeal by defendant from order appointing receiver for defendant's business held to present only moot question after judgment allowing defendant benefits of such order, which he accepted and satisfied judgment, and defendant will be held to have abandoned appeal.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Claude F. Purkitt, Judge.

Action by Pedro Manos against Alfonso Codina. From an order appointing a receiver to take charge of defendant's business on the ex parte application of W. A. Simms, defendant appealed. Appeal dismissed.

C. I. Baker, of Orland, and Arthur Brand and Russell P. Tyler, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Geo. R. Freeman, of Willows, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order made by the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Glenn, appointing a receiver to take charge of the business of defendant and appellant upon the ex parte application of one W. A. Simms, who was not a party to the action, but who procured the ex parte order upon the filing of an affidavit setting forth a certain interest which he claimed in the personal property affected by said action. It appears from the record that the receiver, when thus appointed, qualified and took possession of the property in dispute, and proceeded to administer and dispose of the same in accordance with the terms of the order appointing him such receiver. Thereafter the defendant and appellant duly filed his notice of appeal from the order appointing such receiver, and also his notice in due time and form for the preparation of the transcript upon appeal, which transcript was duly prepared and filed. Appellant also in due time filed his opening brief herein, to which the respondent presented and filed no reply brief, whereupon, the time having expired for the filing of such respondent's brief, the appellant presented to this court a petition for an order submitting said appeal for decision.

Thereupon the respondent appeared and presented an answer to appellant's petition to have said appeal submitted for decision, setting forth in substance that the above-entitled action had, since the taking of said appeal, been finally and fully settled by the parties thereto after a trial of said cause upon the merits and the entry of a judgment therein. In connection with the respondent's answer and in support thereof, he presented the certificate of the clerk of the county of Glenn, in which said action had been pending, and wherein said clerk certified that said action had been brought to trial and tried on the 29th, 30th, and 31st days of January, 1925; that judgment had been entered therein on February 27, 1925; that, by said judgment, it was determined that of the sum of $3,786.46 which had been received by the said receiver from the sale of the nursery stock in question, which had come into his hands as such receiver by virtue of the order herein appealed from, there should be paid to the plaintiff the sum of $897.15, and to the defendant the sum of $2,889.31; that no appeal was taken from said judgment by either of the parties thereto and that said judgment had become final; that on April 24, 1925, the clerk of said court had received from the receiver the entire sum of $3,786.46, and had paid the same to the respective parties in the proportions fixed by the judgment of the court; and that the judgment had been satisfied by the respective parties by satisfactions duly filed with said clerk. When the matter came on for hearing and consideration by this court, it appeared that no response or denial of any kind had been made by the defendant and appellant to the showing thus made by the respondent, whereupon the whole matter was submitted to this court for decision.

In the foregoing state of the record we must accept the certificate of the clerk of the trial court as correctly stating the status of the case in that court and hence, that the matters presented upon this appeal have become moot. The appellant, by accepting and receiving the full benefit resulting from the order appointing the receiver, and having thereupon satisfied the judgment of the trial court awarding him such benefit, and having allowed such judgment to become final, must be held to have abandoned this appeal.

It is, therefore, ordered that the appeal be and the same is hereby dismissed.

Original mandamus proceeding by Adolph Uhl against John B. Badaracco and others, as Board of Supervisors of City and County of San Francisco, and another. Peremptory writ granted.

Maurice T. Dooling and F. A. Devlin, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and John J. Dailey, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion, prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice TYLER, when sitting pro tempore for Mr. Justice LENNON, is adopted as the opinion and decision of the court:

Petition for mandate to compel the respondents to appropriate and use certain receipts obtained from the operation of the hydroelectric power plants of the Hetch Hetchy project to meet the interest and sinking fund payments on the outstanding bonds of such project and to compel respondents in levying and fixing the tax rate for 1926–27 to include a tax therein of such amount only as represents the difference between such receipts and the necessary amount required to meet such obligations. Petitioner institutes the proceeding as a citizen, resident, and taxpayer, and also as a bondholder of the Hetch Hetchy water bond issue of 1910.

For a proper discussion of the case, a brief history of the acquisition and purposes of the public utility in question becomes necessary. In the year 1901, the city and county of San Francisco, through its then mayor, initiated certain proceedings having for their object the acquisition of a water supply for such city. Thereafter application was made to the Secretary of the Interior of the United States for permission to enter upon the lands within the boundaries of the Yosemite National Park and the Tuolumne Forest Reserve to construct the necessary works for storing and conveying waters beyond the boundaries of said park and reserve lands, and ultimately to San Francisco and the bay region for use by the city and county. On the 11th day of May, 1908, Hon. James R. Garfield, then Secretary of the Interior of the United States, rendered his decision granting to the city and county certain rights to develop the storage of the waters from Lake Eleanor and Cherry creek sections, together with rights to thereafter develop the Hetch Hetchy sources of water supply.

Under the terms of the said permit so granted, the city and county were obligated within two years to submit the question of said water supply to a vote of its citizens. In conformity with this requirement and in the year 1909, the board of supervisors duly enacted an ordinance calling for a special election to be held for the purpose of submitting to the electors two propositions, the first of which was one to incur a bonded debt of $45,000,000 for the acquisition, construction, and completion of a water supply and works to be owned and controlled by the city of sufficient capacity for all purposes, the source of such supply to be Lake Eleanor, the waters of the Tuolumne river and its tributaries, in Tuolumne county. The other proposition had to do with the acquisition of the Spring Valley Water Company, an existing public utility. On January 14, 1910, the voters of San Francisco adopted the first proposition and rejected the second. Thereafter bonds in the sum of $45,000,000 were issued by the city, which were sold and the proceeds thereof were placed in the treasury of said city. Subsequently, the Secretary of the Interior caused to be served a notice upon the city to show cause why the right granted to the city should not be revoked. It was later decided that the Secretary of the Interior had no authority in the premises, and that it was necessary to secure a grant from Congress to permit the city to enter upon the forest reserve and park lands for the development of the water resources in question. Such a bill was introduced in Congress commonly known as the Raker Act (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 4748a–4748c), which was finally passed and it provided for the necessary authorization. It was only upon the final passage of this act that the city's rights in the Hetch Hetchy region were made permanent.

Under the terms of the Raker Act, certain conditions were imposed upon the city in the development of the water rights and privileges granted to it by the act. Many of these conditions, so it is alleged, were more onerous than those contained in the original permit, as they required the development of water and hydroelectric power not contemplated under the original grant. Thereafter, and by reason of these alleged newly imposed conditions, the city made radical changes in its plans. It was decided that the main storage should be located in Hetch Hetchy valley. It was also decided to build one large power plant at Moccasin creek instead of the many smaller ones originally contemplated. With the proceeds of the sale of the bonds, construction of the work was then commenced and proceeded with. A structure known as O'Shaughnessy Dam was erected at the end of Hetch Hetchy valley to impound the waters of the Tuolumne river, and a system of aqueducts and tunnels was built to convey the water to the power plant. There was also erected two hydroelectric generating plants, known as the Early Intake and Moccasin creek power plants, to be used to generate hydroelectric power by use of the water developed in the construction of the water system, and a transmission line was also constructed from the Moccasin creek plant to the town of Newark. All the expenditures necessary for these improvements were made out of the 1910 bond proceeds. At this stage of the development of the works the funds became exhausted, and, during the year 1924, an additional $10,000,000 was authorized for the work by the electors of the city. These bonds are being sold and the proceeds thereof are to be expended in the development of the enterprise, but they are not here involved. The water system at present is still far from complete and it is admitted that it will require an additional sum in an amount estimated at about $24,000,000 to complete the same to a point where it will be possible to deliver water to the boundaries of the city and approximately another $40,000,000 to acquire or construct a distributing system before avail of the water can be made by the consumers of the city. On July 1, 1925, the power plant was ready to function and generate hydroelectric energy, and on said day the board of public works of the city of San Francisco, pursuant to authorization, entered into a contract with the Pacific Gas & Electric Company for the temporary distribution of the hydroelectric energy to be generated at the Moccasin creek power plant as transmitted to Newark over the constructed transmission lines.

The petition alleges that, under and by virtue of this contract, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company has paid to the city for electric energy the total sum of $2,017,130.49, and of this sum, after deducting operating expenses, there remains a balance of not less than $1,752,769.63. The outstanding water bonds of 1910 amount to $38,000,000, and they are being redeemed at the rate of $1,000,000 a year. The interest and sinking fund requirements on these bonds for the fiscal year 1926–27 amount to the sum of $2,830,685.35. It is charged in the petition that respondents have taken proceedings by ordinance to create a special fund, designated as the Hetch Hetchy Power Operative Fund, and have provided that all moneys received from the power plants on the Hetch Hetchy project shall be deposited to the credit of such fund. Ordinance No. 6980, N. S. Under this ordinance the sum of $166,666 was appropriated during the fiscal year 1926 for operating expenses, the further sum of $83,333 as a depreciation reserve fund, and a sum for the payment of interest on and redemption of $9,000,000 only of the water bonds of the issue of 1910. The ordinance provides that at the beginning of the fiscal year, July 1, 1926, the balance remaining in such fund shall be held for and applied exclusively towards the acquisition or construction of a transmission line and step-down station for carrying the electric energy generated at the Moccasin plant from Newark to San Francisco. It is further charged that, in pursuance of the design to wrongfully divert and use the earnings of these plants, respondents intend to make interest and sinking fund payments on $9,000,000 only of the water bonds of 1910, and to divert the balance to the construction of a transmission line from Newark to San Francisco, and the step-down station, and to this end the board of supervisors adopted a resolution (No. 25364, N. S.) by which they purported to appropriate $20,000 from the Hetch Hetchy fund as created by them for the expense of preparing plans, specifications, and estimates for the completion of the transmission line and station referred to. The estimated cost of these improvements will be approximately $1,800,000, and it is alleged that this amount is to be expended without first appropriating and setting aside from the receipts the amount necessary to take care of the total interest and sinking requirements of the outstanding bonds authorized by the electors of the city, except only an amount sufficient to meet such requirement on $9,000,000 thereof. In the estimate transmitted to the board of supervisors by the auditor of the probable expenditures of the city for the fiscal year 1926–27, pursuant to section 2, c. 1, art. 3 of the charter, it is calculated that the total amount required for bond interest and redemption on the water bonds of 1910 is the sum of $2,830,685.35, and that the portion of that amount to be paid on $9,000,000 of said bonds from the Hetch Hetchy Power Operation Fund is the sum of $530,188.16. In making up the budget for the fiscal year 1926–27 the board of supervisors accepted these figures and intend and threaten, so it is alleged, to use only this sum of $530,188.16 from said fund for meeting interest and sinking fund payments on the water bonds of 1910, and to raise the balance necessary for that purpose by taxation. This will leave a balance in the fund of not less than $1,222,581.47 which the respondents intend and threaten to use for the construction of the stated improvements mentioned. If this latter sum is used to meet the interest and sinking fund payments on the bonds, the amount necessary to be raised by taxation for that purpose will be reduced, so it is alleged, to the sum of $1,077,915.72, which will mean a saving to the taxpayers of $1,222,581.47, or approximately 20 cents on the tax rate of each $100 assessed valuation.

Respondents do not deny that they intend to use the earnings of the hydroelectric plant as alleged in the petition, but they claim that before the board can determine how much to include in the tax levy to cover interest on and redemption of outstanding bonds, it will be necessary for the board to take proper official action in the matter of determining the proportion of the 1910 bond issue used in the construction of the power system and the proportion thereof which was used in the construction of the water supply and works. They claim that in making this allocation, it will be entirely proper for the board to apportion to the power development a fair proportion of cost of conduits, lands, dams, and water supply system as recited in the Raker Act, and it is admitted that action has been taken by the board looking to this end in the passage of a resolution. The exact amount will not be determined until the allocation of expenditure from the 1910 bond funds is made officially by the board. It is petitioner's contention that, under the charter of the city, the entire surplus earnings must all be devoted to meet the interest and sinking fund payments on all the outstanding bonds of the entire water bond issue of 1910, and that such surplus earnings consist of the amount remaining after deducting only the operating expenses and costs of repair. Respondents, on the other hand, contend that it is their right under the charter provisions governing the operation of public utilities, and providing for the distribution of the revenues derived therefrom, to use the moneys which have arisen and will arise from the operation of the hydroelectric plant operated by the city, for the purposes which petitioner alleges they are threatening to do, if in their judgment it will be for the best interests of the city that it should be done. The solution of the question depends upon the proper construction to be given to the charter provisions relating to the acquisition and maintenance of public utilities by the city and the disposition of the earnings of such utilities. A review and analysis of the charter provisions therefore becomes necessary for a proper discussion of the case.

Under article 12 of the charter of the city, a complete scheme is provided for the acquisition of public utilities and the disposition of the receipts therefrom. Sections 1 and 3 of such article provide, in substance, that when the board of supervisors shall by ordinance declare that the public interest demands the acquisition, construction or completion of any public utility or utilities, or when the electors shall petition the board of supervisors in the manner provided by the charter, the board of supervisors must procure from the board of public works, through the city engineer, plans and estimates of the cost of original construction and completion by the city of such public utility or utilities.

Sections 4, 5, and 7 of the same article provide that each proposition for the acquisition of such public utility or utilities shall specify the amount of the bonded indebtedness necessary therefor, and the rate of interest thereon, and the board of supervisors shall submit to the electors at a special election the question whether such bonded indebtedness shall be incurred. A two-thirds vote is necessary to secure the acquisition of such public utility or utilities. Section 10 provides for the issuance and sale of the bonds and declares that, when issued and sold, the proceeds shall be placed in the treasury to the credit of the proper fund and shall be applied exclusively to the purposes and objects mentioned in the ordinance authorizing their issue until such objects are fully accomplished.

The charter further provides that at the time of levying the municipal tax and in making the apportionment the supervisors shall take into account and apportion to the several funds the income and revenue estimated to arise during the fiscal year from licenses, fees, and other sources, but the income to pay the interest on the bonded indebtedness and to provide for the sinking funds shall always be provided for out of the tax on property: Provided, that whenever any bonded indebtedness shall have been incurred for the acquisition of any of the public utilities named in article 12 of the charter, the surplus earnings of any such utility for the fiscal year may be applied upon the interest and sinking fund of the bonded indebtedness of such utility for the succeeding fiscal year. Article 3, c. 1, § 10.

Article 12, so far as it deals with this subject, provides that at the time of levying the municipal tax and in the manner provided for such tax levy, the supervisors shall levy and collect annually a tax sufficient to pay the annual interest on such bonds, and also such part of the bonded municipal indebtedness as will fall due within the succeeding fiscal year: Provided, that when the interest and sinking fund payments for any fiscal year on the bonds issued for any public utility can be met out of the surplus earnings of such public utility for the preceding fiscal year, no tax shall be levied for such purpose. Such taxes shall be in addition to all other taxes levied for municipal purposes and shall be collected at the same time and in the same manner as other municipal taxes are collected. Article 12, § 12.

With reference to the disposition of receipts from public utilities, it is provided that whenever any public utility shall be operated by the city, the receipts from such utility shall be paid daily into the city treasury and maintained in a special fund set aside for such utility and that the supervisors may, from time to time, make appropriations from such funds in the following manner: (a) For the payment of the operating expenses of such utility; (b) for repairs and reconstruction; (c) for payment of interest and sinking fund on the bonds issued for the acquisition or construction of such utility; (d) for extensions and improvements; (e) for a reserve fund. Article 12, § 16.

Provision is also made for this reserve fund, it being provided that whenever such fund shall exceed one-half of the payment for operating expenses in the preceding fiscal year, the supervisors shall have the power to appropriate such excess to the general fund.

It is apparent that the present controversy has its genesis in the changed conditions presented by the provisions in the Raker Act. Preliminarily it may be said that it is by no means certain that the conditions imposed upon the city by the government made imperative the construction of the extensive power plant that has been installed. While there is no question that the plan as originally submitted to the taxpayers contemplated the construction and operation of a power system for the generation of power to convey the waters from their source to the boundaries of San Francisco, it is by no means certain that the extensive improvements erected were included under the authorization of the bond issue. However this may be, we are not here concerned with the question as to whether or not the proceeds of the bonds were rightfully used or wrongfully converted in the construction of the power system, as no such question is here presented. The main point that we are called to pass upon is whether or not the entire surplus revenue remaining in the fund created by the board as alleged in the petition and admitted in the answer, must, as a matter of law, be applied toward the payment of interest on and the redemption of the entire outstanding bonds of the 1910 issue. Respondents in support of their proposed action, claim that they are now operating a public utility and receiving revenue therefrom; that they are not operating a water system; and that approximately $34,000,000 must yet be spent before the Hetch Hetchy water is brought to the city limits, and many millions more before a water distribution system can be acquired or constructed. In other words, if we correctly understand the argument of counsel for the city, the claim is made that the power plant is a separate utility, one that is distinct and apart from the water system, made so by the act of Congress in imposing additional conditions.

[1] The answer to this contention is twofold. Congress has no power to create or force a public utility upon the city, and, under the organic law of the city, a public utility can be acquired only in one of two ways: First, from funds derived from taxes levied for that purpose; second, from funds derived from the sale of bonds issued for such purpose. The water bonds of 1910 were voted for a single public utility, namely, a "water supply and works." No proposition was ever submitted to the taxpayer for a distinct power system except in so far as such a system might be included under the term "works." The power plant, therefore, is not an independent utility, but is an element of the water project only. If, as claimed, the changed conditions rendered imperative the full development of a power plant, the matter could and probably should have been submitted to the taxpayers. But this course, as we have seen, was not adopted. Assuming then the power plant to be included in the acquisition of the water utility, and it is only by doing so that there is any justification for any expenditure of the bond issue for its construction, the proceeds of the utility must be used in the manner pointed out by the charter, as they are earnings of the utility voted for.

[2-7] Respondents present the further contention that, even conceding this to be true, article 12, § 12, of the charter providing for the purposes for which the surplus earnings of the utility are to be used is applicable only where all of the interest and sinking fund requirements of the bonds issued for a public utility can be made out of the surplus earnings and is inapplicable when such earnings are sufficient to pay a part only of the sum required for such purpose. In other words, that a well-defined line can be drawn between a public utility which has been completed and one which is still under construction. In support of this contention it is claimed that under article 12, § 16, a discretion is given to the supervisors as to whether or not the earnings shall be so used, as is indicated by article 3, c. 1, § 12, which provides that whenever any bonded indebtedness shall have been incurred for the acquisition of any of the public utilities named in article 12, the surplus earnings of any such utility for the fiscal year may be applied upon the interest and sinking fund requirements. The charter makes no express distinction between the earnings derived from the utility whether completed or not, and we do not think that any implication in this particular can be drawn from the provision invoked. Such construction would be unreasonable and nullify the plain intent of the statute. See San Joaquin Irr. Co. v. Stevinson, 164 Cal. 221, 128 P. 924.

The claim, however, that article 12, § 16, by use of the word "may" gives the supervisors a discretion in the application of the use of the surplus funds, presents the real important question in the case. If the supervisors are given a discretion as to the use which may be made of the earnings, they are acting within their rights. It will be noticed from the charter provisions hereinabove set forth, that there are three separate sections which deal with the question as to the use that is to be made of the receipts of a public utility for interest and sinking fund requirements. To recapitulate, article 3, c. 1, § 12, provides in part that such earnings may be applied for such purpose. Article 12, § 12, declares that when the interest and sinking fund payments for any fiscal year on the bonds issued for a public utility can be made out of the surplus earnings, no tax shall be levied for such purpose. Article 3, § 16, provides that the supervisors may make appropriations from the receipts for the following purposes: (a) For operating expenses; (b) repairs and construction; (c) interest and sinking fund requirements; (d) extensions and improvements; (e) reserve fund. These sections were all passed at the same time, are in pari materia, and should therefore be construed as one statute. Banks v. Yolo County, 104 Cal. 258, 37 P. 900; Hayne v. San Francisco, 174 Cal. 185, 162 P. 625. In so construing them certain statutory rules of construction should be observed to ascertain their proper meaning.

Language defining the powers of municipal corporations and grants thereto are to be strictly construed, and any fair reasonable doubt concerning the existence of a power is to be resolved against the corporation. Then again, as tax proceedings are in invitum, laws pertaining thereto are to be strictly construed in favor of the taxpayer and against the taxing power. East Bay Mun. Utility Dist. v. Garrison, 191 Cal. 680, 218 P. 43; Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 204 P. 826; San Christina Inv. Co. v. San Francisco, 167 Cal. 762, 141 P. 384, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 676. So, also, where persons or the public have an interest in having an act done by a public body "may" in a statute means "must." Hayes v. Los Angeles County, 99 Cal. 74, 33 P. 766. Words permissive in form, when a public duty is involved, are considered as mandatory. Kennedy v. City of Sacramento (C. C.) 19 F. 580.

Guided by these rules, it seems clear to us that there is no question but that the word "may" when used in the provisions dealing with this subject does not confer or repose any discretionary powers in the supervisors, but must be construed as meaning must. If this were not so, the express mandatory provision contained in article 12, § 12, to the effect that no tax shall be levied for interest and sinking requirements, when they can be met out of the earnings of the utility, would be meaningless. We are likewise of the opinion that the use of the word "may" in article 12, § 16, does not give the supervisors a discretion over the order in which the appropriations therein authorized may be made. Any other construction would render meaningless and nugatory the other provisions of the charter and destroy all the safeguards that these provisions were designed to create. See City of Cincinnati v. Roettinger, 105 Ohio St. 145, 137 N. E. 6.

This construction is compelled for other reasons. The charter does not contemplate the construction or extension of a public utility except in the manner hereinabove pointed out. To use the earnings of a public utility for this purpose would be to nullify the express provisions relating to the manner in which such utilities may be acquired, and thus destroy the limitation in this regard which circumscribes the power of the board. Under the construction contended for by respondents, there could be no limit to the cost of the utility where receipts accrued therefrom, and this regardless of the express mandatory provisions declaring that cost and estimates must be submitted before the bond election is had, so that the taxpayer may know the extent of the obligation he is called upon to assume or reject. Then again, if the order of appropriations be construed as wholly discretionary, respondents could provide for the first four enumerated purposes wholly by taxation. They then could transfer to the general fund all of the reserve fund in excess of one-half of the operating expenses for the fiscal year (article 12, sub. 8, § 16) and use such funds for any municipal purpose whatsoever, thus impressing on the city the burden of a large tax rate for the purpose of meeting these obligations. Counsel for the city concedes that this condition could be brought about if the officers abused the discretion which he claims is vested in them under the provision in question. To adopt the construction contended for by the city would be contrary to common sense and the general policy of the law. Where the language of a statute is susceptible of two constructions, one of which, in application, will render it reasonable, fair and harmonious with its manifest purpose, and another which would be productive of absurd consequences, the former construction will be adopted. Goldsmith v. Bd. of Education, 66 Cal. App. 157, 225 P. 783. We must decline to give a construction that leads to a result so at variance with the general scheme of the charter provisions dealing with the acquisition of public utilities and the disposition of the revenue derived therefrom and with the general law upon the subject. It is the policy of the law in the absence of a clearly negatived intention to have the funds authorized for a particular purpose expended for such purpose. Edwards v. City of Helena, 58 Mont. 292, 191 P. 387; 15 Corp. Jur. p. 584. And bonds issued must correspond and be used for the purpose for which they were issued. 5 McQuillin on Mun. Corp. § 2203; O'Farrell v. County of Sonoma, 189 Cal. 343, 208 P. 117.

These principles are reflected in the charter provisions, and in fact a special direction to this effect is contained in article 12, § 10. From what we have said, it follows that it was never intended by the charter that the surplus earnings of a public utility could be diverted from the payment of the interest, and sinking fund requirements of all the bonds issued for the acquisition of such utility, and that such earnings should be applied to the purposes recited in article 12, § 16, in the order in which they appear, so far as they are sufficient for such purposes before any extensions or improvements of the utility can be made with such funds. This conclusion is in accord with an express provision of the charter to the effect that the proceeds of any sale of bonds shall be applied exclusively to the purposes and objects mentioned in the ordinance authorizing their issue until such objects are fully accomplished. Article 12, § 10. To the suggestion of respondents that it is extremely important in the operation of a municipal project that the surplus revenue be used at times to make ordinary extensions and improvements to the system, to keep pace with the growing demand, it is sufficient to say that the extensions here contemplated are not ordinary, involving as they do the alleged expenditure of nearly $2,000,000. The charter provides in what manner such extensions may properly be made. It is for the voters to say whether they are ready at this time to assume the costs of such extension. As stated by petitioner it would seem to be a useless expenditure of funds in the absence of a distributing plant, the acquisition or construction of which, considering its enormous cost, might possibly never be sanctioned by the taxpayer. However this may be, the power plant being but an incident of the water project, its extension under the circumstances must be provided for by a bond issue with the approval of the taxpayer, there being insufficient surplus earnings after satisfying the charter requirements to pay for such extensions. Any other conclusion would circumvent the express mandatory requirements of the organic law of the city. This being so, there is no authority in respondents to make the contemplated expenditure at this time, as surplus earnings of a public utility cannot be employed to make extensions and improvements until after the interest and sinking fund requirements have been provided for.

This conclusion renders unnecessary a discussion of the question raised by the petitioner concerning the rights of the bondholders. From what we have said, it follows that petitioner is entitled to the relief prayed for.

It is accordingly ordered that a peremptory writ of mandate issue in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

GORMAN et al. v. CALIFORNIA TRANSIT CO. (Sac. 3729).

1. Judgment 🔑138(3)—Default judgment against corporation held properly vacated for inadvertent failure to call president's attention to summons and complaint served on secretary.

Where defendant corporation's secretary immediately delivered summons and complaint served on him to head of department concerned, with direction to deliver them to president on latter's return to city, and they were inadvertently taken from department head's desk by employee, with result that matter was not called to president's attention, court properly vacated default judgment.

2. Appeal and error 🔑957(1)—Judgment 🔑139—Relief from default judgment is for sound discretion of trial court, whose action will not be set aside, unless discretion was clearly abused (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Application, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for relief from default and judgment thereon, is addressed to sound discretion of trial court whose action will not be set aside on appeal, unless abuse of discretion clearly appears.

3. Appeal and error 🔑957(1).

Doubt as to whether court abused discretion in setting aside default judgment should be resolved in favor of application.

4. Judgment 🔑143(3)—Inadvertence or neglect must be based on more than mere forgetfulness to excuse failure to respond to process in due time and authorize vacation of default judgment.

Trial court's discretion to set aside default judgment is not capricious or arbitrary, but impartial one, guided by fixed legal principles, and inadvertence or neglect must be based on more than mere forgetfulness to excuse failure to respond to process in due time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Delbert Gorman and another against the California Transit Company. From an order granting defendant's motion to set aside and vacate a default judgment, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Egerton D. Lakin, of Palo Alto, for appellants.

Sullivan & Sullivan & Theo J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order granting the defendant's motion to set aside and vacate a judgment taken against it by default, upon the ground that such default and judgment were the result of the excusable inadvertence and neglect of the defendant. The facts preceding and attending the making and entry of such default and judgment, as set forth in the affidavits filed in support of said motion and against the truth of which the appellants made no counter showing at the hearing thereon, are as follows:

On January 4, 1924, the plaintiffs commenced this action in Alameda county against the defendant, a common carrier corporation operating automobile stages, to recover damages alleged to have arisen out of the happening of an accident upon one of its stage lines. On January 14, 1924, the summons and complaint in said action were served upon the secretary of said corporation at its office in the city of Oakland, who at once delivered the same to one G. W. Tatterson, who was in charge of the traffic department of the defendant, with the direction that said summons and complaint, together with the file relating to the accident, be delivered to W. E. Travis, the president of the corporation, immediately upon his return from Los Angeles, where he then was and from which he was expected to return within a few days. Said file was placed upon the desk of Mr. Tatterson to await the president's return, but prior thereto was inadvertently taken by one of the employees of the corporation—probably a stenographer in the traffic department—from the desk of Mr. Tatterson, and returned to the compartment in which such files were ordinarily kept, and as a result thereof the attention of Mr. Tatterson, who was daily occupied with many details in connection with his immediate department, was withdrawn from said file, with the result that the matter was not called to the attention of the president upon his return, nor in fact until some days after the default of the corporation had been taken and judgment thereon entered against it for the full sum sought by the plaintiffs in the action. On March 17, 1924, several days after the entry of such judgment, Mr. Travis received a communication from the attorney for plaintiffs informing him of the entry of the judgment and demanding immediate payment of the whole amount thereof, with interest and costs. He immediately took steps to ascertain the facts relating to the commencement of said action, the service of the papers therein, and the reasons why the matter had not theretofore been brought to his attention, of which facts he was up to that time entirely unfamiliar, and, upon learning the same, he presented the matter to the counsel of the defendant for appropriate action, which action in the form of said motion to set aside said default and judgment promptly followed.

[1] The trial court, upon the hearing of the motion and presentation of the foregoing facts, made and entered its order vacating and setting aside the default and judgment, from which order this appeal has been taken. We are of the opinion that the trial court was not in error in so doing.

[2, 3] The application to be relieved from this default and judgment was made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was one addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. It is a well-settled rule of this court that the action of the trial court in the exercise of such discretion will not be set aside upon appeal, unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears, and that any doubt that may exist in that regard should be resolved in favor of the application, to the end that a trial of the cause upon the merits may be had. Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 P. 426; Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 667, 63 P. 63.

[4] It is true that the discretion thus to be exercised by the trial court is not capricious or arbitrary, but is an impartial discretion which must be guided and controlled in its exercise by fixed legal principles, and it should, therefore, appear that something more than mere inadvertence or neglect without reasonable excuse or justification existed, and that the inadvertence or neglect in question was not the result of mere forgetfulness on the part of the person or official charged with the duty of responding to the legal process in due time, but that such inadvertence or neglect was based upon other circumstances which would suffice to render the same excusable. Therein lies the distinction, we think, between the cases relied upon by the appellant in support of this appeal and the instant case, and particularly between the case of Slater v. Selover, 25 Cal. App. 525, 144 P. 298, and the case at bar. In the instant case, the inadvertence and forgetfulness of the secretary of the corporation was due to the fact that he had delivered said summons and complaint to the manager of the traffic department of said corporation with instruction to deliver the same to the president thereof immediately upon his return. The inadvertence of the manager of the traffic department in failing to carry out such instruction was attributable to the fact that the file containing said papers had been mistakenly removed from his desk by another employee of the defendant, and that his attention amid the engrossing details of his department was thus withdrawn from the same and from his duty to present the papers to the president of the corporation upon his return. It seems to us that these intervening facts furnish a sufficient basis to justify the conclusion of the trial court that the inadvertence of the officials of the defendant corporation was excusable, and justified the order from which this appeal has been taken.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WHITACRE. (Cr. 1282.)*

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 26, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑358.

Materiality of testimony offered by defendant, charged with robbery, as to whereabouts on any given date, depends on whether it rebuts evidence of prosecution thereon.

2. Indictment and information 🔑176.

People are permitted considerable latitude in proof as to when alleged offense of robbery was committed.

3. Criminal law 🔑358.

Where none of the people's witnesses fixed the date of alleged robberies other than January 17th or 18th, defendant's whereabouts on January 12th, or before the preceding Christmas, was immaterial.

4. Criminal law 🔑387.

Where the people's witnesses testified that the alleged robbery was committed in one city on a certain date, evidence that defendant was not in another city on that date was immaterial.

5. Criminal law 🔑772(4).

Unless two or more offenses be shown, on either of which jury might convict, it is proper to instruct that the date of the act is immaterial, if it occurred within three years before the filing of the information.

*Rehearing denied August 23, 1926.

CRAIG, J. The grand jury of Los Angeles county indicted the appellant and one Vincent Marsiglia, charging them jointly with having committed grand larceny and robbery in said county, on or about January 18, 1924. Appellant was tried alone upon two counts of the indictment and was convicted. A motion for new trial was thereafter presented, which was denied, and this is an appeal from the judgment and ruling upon said motion.

There is no dispute as to the robberies having been committed, as alleged and as shown by the evidence, appellant's sole defense being that he was not in Los Angeles county at the time of their perpetration. It appears from the testimony of the people's witnesses, H. C. Smith and George L. Smith, that while they were driving into the city of Inglewood, on or about the above-mentioned date, they were stopped by a Japanese, who was soon joined by the defendant Marsiglia, and were conducted to the rear room of a building occupied by said Japanese and his family. Both of the Smiths testified that as soon as they entered the building this appellant threatened them with a revolver, commanded, "Stick up your hands!" and held them at bay while Marsiglia searched them; that about $40 was taken from the person of H. C. Smith, and about $15 and other personal property from George L. Smith. The Smiths were then driven into an adjoining room, and one of them testified that appellant told them that if they attempted to leave the room within five minutes they would have their heads blown off. The witness Mainhardt testified that appellant and Marsiglia held him up and took his automobile from him in the city of Inglewood on the night of January 17, 1924.

Both of the Smiths and Mainhardt recognized appellant and pointed him out among several other men at the county jail two or three weeks before the trial of this case, and at least five witnesses positively identified him in the courtroom while testifying on June 4, 1925, nearly a year and a half after the offense was committed.

Appellant testified that he was not in Los Angeles county on the date of the robbery; that he had been sick and was unable to work, but that one Jack Stender wrote him from San Diego, offering him a job; that he went to San Diego between January 10 and January 18, but did nothing more there than work on Stender's automobile a few days, whereupon he left San Diego for the state of Illinois; that he went as far as Yuma, Ariz., on the Arizona Eastern, and there transferred to the Rock Island lines. His own counsel asked him if he was sure that he transferred to the Rock Island at Yuma, to which he answered in the affirmative. Stender testified that he was a marble setter, and that he employed appellant to help in setting stone, but that the material failed to arrive as expected, and that appellant worked on his automobile a few days and departed. This witness at first asserted quite positively that appellant was in San Diego on January 18, 1924, but finally admitted that he kept no records, and his memory being remarkably deficient as to other dates and events, at last said that he had not thought about the 18th of January being later than the second week of said month, and that he had not had time to look it up.

Two sisters and the mother of appellant testified for him, but the latter said that she did not know where he was on the date of the robbery. His counsel asked each of the sisters where he was just prior to Christmas, 1923, to which objections were sustained; one of them testified that she saw him in San Diego very nearly the 18th of January, 1924, that she bought his ticket and saw him board the train, she presumed for the east, but that she did not know where he went, and that she did not see him on the 18th. The other sister swore that she did not know whether he was at San Diego or Los Angeles on that date, but that she knew he could reach Los Angeles from the southern city within three or four hours.

It is urgently insisted from the foregoing facts that inasmuch as appellant's employer was the only witness who knew of his whereabouts on the date of the offense, and that he testified "positively that the defendant was on the 18th day of January, 1924, employed by him" in the city of San Diego, and one of his sisters purchased his ticket and saw him board the train at San Diego—although she did not know where he went—that the trial court erred in that it denied him a reasonable amount of latitude in examining the witnesses. Appellant testified that at the time in question he was "pretty positive" that he was on the train, going east. Five witnesses positively placed him at the city of Inglewood, committing robbery with a deadly weapon; and his sisters testified that they could not swear that he was not at Inglewood at that time. The jury doubtless viewed the testimony of Stender as being extremely uncertain in the face of voluminous positive testimony to the contrary. Had appellant in fact been at work in the city of San Diego on January 18th, it would not have been impossible for him to have left the train, if he had boarded one that day, and to have arrived at Inglewood within a few hours by automobile. But there is no definite proof that he boarded the train on the 18th, though there is evidence that he was in Inglewood on the night of Thursday, following the 15th of January, 1924, in a Hudson super-six automobile. It was admitted that Thursday following January 15, 1924, was January 17th, and it appears that the robbery was committed on the 18th day of January of that year. Appellant's witnesses were asked if they knew where appellant was before Christmas, 1923, or on January 12, 1924, and having shown on voir dire that they could not answer the questions, they were asked whether or not appellant was in the city of Los Angeles on the 18th of January, 1924, to which the district attorney objected that the evidence sought was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and no proper foundation laid."

[1-4] The objections were sustained, and properly so, if for no other reason than because the presence or absence of appellant in Los Angeles was not in issue. The people's witnesses had testified to the commission of the robbery in Inglewood and not in Los Angeles. The materiality of the testimony offered by the defendant as to his whereabouts on any given date is wholly dependent upon the question as to whether or not it rebuts evidence produced by the prosecution on the same subject. While the people are permitted considerable latitude in their proof as to when the offense charged was committed, this in no way varies the rules of evidence concerning the materiality or competency of rebuttal testimony. In the instant case none of the people's witnesses fixed the date of the alleged robberies as not other that the 17th or the 18th of January, 1924. Hence the whereabouts of appellant before Christmas, 1923, or even on January 12, 1924, was in no way material. Such proof would clearly have no bearing upon the issues of the alleged crime on either the 17th or the 18th of January. Evidence as to his whereabouts on other dates, or as to the fact that he was not in Los Angeles on the 18th, would be wholly immaterial, and we think, therefore, that the rulings of the trial court in this behalf were clearly proper.

[5] It is next urged that, having fixed upon the date of the offense, the trial court erred in charging the jury that:

> "It is wholly immaterial on what day or night the offenses charged in the indictment were committed, provided you believe from the evidence that they were committed by the defendant and that the same, or either of them, were committed within three years prior to the filing of the indictment in this case."

The appellant stated that he was at Los Angeles on January 10, 1924, and the offense was alleged to have been committed on or about the 18th of the same month. H. C. Smith testified that he was robbed about the latter date, and his brother averred that he was with him at the time. Mainhardt stated that as nearly as he could fix the date that he saw appellant was on Thursday, following the 15th of January. The theory advanced by appellant is that if the jury believed that the complaining witnesses were in fact robbed at Inglewood by the appellant, but were uncertain, or entertained a reasonable doubt as to whether or not he committed the crime on Friday, the 18th day of January, 1924, they should not convict him. But such is not the law. Authorities are cited by appellant to the effect that an instruction which tends to belittle or disparage a defense of this character is prejudicially erroneous. However, it was held in those cases that the jury should not be instructed that an alibi is a "defense" which must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence, and no mention is made of an instruction such as that here presented. The correct rule is that unless two or more similar offenses be shown by the evidence, upon either of which the jury might convict, it is proper to instruct that the date of the "act is immaterial if it occurred at any time within three years before the filing of the information." People v. Reynolds, 48 Cal. App. 688, 192 P. 343; People v. Carmean, 23 Cal. App. 396, 138 P. 117; Hughes, Instruc. to Juries, § 108, p. 99.

[6] Again, it is urged that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in that the photograph of appellant's alleged confederate, Marsiglia, "was constantly kept before the jury," and "was constantly referred to throughout the entire trial." There was testimony by each of the witnesses that appellant had an accomplice at the time in question, whom they later learned was the Marsiglia who was indicted with him, but was not on trial nor present in court. There is no evidence that any photograph was more than momentarily exhibited, and it is apparent that none was shown to the jury. During the examination of the first witness counsel for the prosecution prematurely exhibited a photograph and asked, "Do you know whom that photograph represents?" to which the witness replied that it was not the defendant on trial, but that it was Marsiglia. Appellant's counsel thereupon interposed objections, substantially as we have related, to which the court promptly replied, "There has not been a word said so far about any crime," and sustained the objections. Thereafter the photograph was shown to other witnesses in a similar manner, was identified as that of Marsiglia, and no objection was made to this or any other testimony of said witnesses during direct or redirect examination. It was offered as an exhibit, but was excluded, and the offer was withdrawn.

[7] Finally it is contended that the rights of the appellant were prejudiced by the trial court in its examination of the defendant and other witnesses. People v. Boggess, 194 Cal. 212, 228 P. 448, is cited in support of this point. It was there held that the trial court, over objection, repeatedly interrupted witnesses and took them out of the hands of the defendant's counsel, cross-examined them, and directly called specific testimony to the attention of the jury. No such conduct was in any manner chargeable to the court below in the instant case. Occasionally the trial court asked two or three questions of a witness for the purpose of elucidating and making clear any points that might otherwise have remained obscure, as was held to be proper in People v. Reid (Cal. App.) 237 P. 824:

"Manifestly, the purpose in all of the questions was to make more clear matters that had previously been the subject of testimony."

No error appearing, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HIGBEE. (Cr. 1258.)

1. Burglary 🔑41(1).

Evidence held to sustain conviction of burglary in the second degree.

2. Criminal law 🔑204.

Failure to support pleas of former jeopardy and acquittal with evidence held waiver.

3. Criminal law 🔑761(10).

In burglary prosecution, charge declaring that evidence tended to prove that a burglary had occurred held not error, where record disclosed beyond possible question that statement was true.

4. Criminal law 🔑768(3)—Court's comments to jury that evidence was limited, and that jury would be able to decide case at once, held not exhortation to convict.

Court's comments to jury, "I am glad the gentlemen have so concisely placed the case before you that you will be able to decide it at once; the evidence is not voluminous, and my instructions will be short, and then you can return to your homes," held not error, where evidence was limited, not being an exhortation to convict.

5. Criminal law 🔑798½—Refusal to instruct that jury might find special verdict held not error, where facts were simple and their legal effect, if believed, was certain.

Where facts were few and simple, and their legal effect, if believed, was certain, court's refusal to instruct that jury might find special verdict, if doubtful as to their legal effect, held not error.

6. Witnesses 🔑350—Where nature of felony of which state's witness had been convicted was shown, refusal to permit accused to further cross-examine concerning felony, to test credibility, held proper.

Where state's witness, in response to question whether he had been convicted of a felony, answered affirmatively, and nature of felony was shown, that accused was not permitted to further cross-examine witness as to what felony or felonies he had been convicted of, to test his credibility, held not error.

7. Criminal law 🔑1169(7)—Error in admission of evidence that associate had accused defendant when arrested held not prejudicial, where associate testified to same fact on trial.

Error in burglary prosecution, in permitting officer to testify that defendant, when arrested, was accused by his associate with having been a participant, held not prejudicial, where such associate testified to same fact and accused denied participation.

8. Witnesses 🔑288(2)—Refusal to allow defendant to show by witness why stolen property was left in defendant's room held proper, where question was not asked until redirect examination.

Refusal in burglary prosecution to allow defendant to show by witness why stolen property was left in defendant's room held not error, where no inquiry was had on the subject either in direct or cross examination of witness, and question was not propounded until redirect examination.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Merritt Higbee was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the second degree and sentenced to the state prison. He had previously been convicted under the same information of burglary in the first degree, but this judgment of conviction was reversed, and a new trial ordered upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict of first degree burglary, for the reason that there was none introduced at the trial tending to show that the store entered was either an inhabited dwelling house or an inhabited building, or that defendant was armed with a deadly weapon, or that any person was assaulted during the commission of the burglary. People v. Higbee, 70 Cal. App. 788, 233 P. 79.

Several grounds are here urged for a reversal of the present judgment, among which is a claim of the insufficiency of the evidence to warrant the conviction. There is evidence to show that one Forsythe, the prosecuting witness, owned a haberdasher's store in the city of Burlingame, county of San Mateo. Forsythe had left his store on the evening of January 28, 1924, about 6:30 o'clock, and upon his arrival next morning he discovered that a rear door had been broken open, and a lot of merchandise, including clothing, shirts, socks, and other articles had been taken therefrom. In the evening of January 28th, defendant, accompanied by others named Clinton, Dawson, Allen, and O'Connor, had driven to the city of Burlingame in an automobile. The machine was noticed by a police officer, parked in the vicinity of the store. It was occupied by two persons. Upon being interrogated concerning their business, the driver informed the officer his name was Clintel and that he resided in San Jose. At this time Dawson approached the machine and was also interrogated. The officer was evidently satisfied with the statements made to him, for, after noting the number of the machine and the address given, the parties were not detained. The next morning, upon discovering that a robbery had been committed, the chief of police of Burlingame checked up the statements of the occupants of the machine, but failed to locate the given residence. He then telephoned to the San Francisco police, giving the number of the machine. It was located, and O'Connor and Clinton were taken into custody. They confessed to their participation in the crime and informed the police of their place of residence. The police repaired to the address given and there arrested defendant, and some of the stolen articles were found in his room. O'Connor testified at the trial and admitted that he had accompanied Dawson, Allen, and Clinton, and defendant Higbee on an automobile trip to Burlingame on the night of January 28, 1924, and had driven the machine to the vicinity where the crime was committed, at which time Dawson, Allen, and Higbee left the same and returned about an hour and a half afterwards with a lot of suitcases which were taken back to San Francisco; that the party then proceeded to the room in a hotel occupied by Higbee, where the stolen property was distributed.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that this evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict. Defendant at the trial pleaded once in jeopardy and former acquittal, and asked that these special pleas be declared to the jury. The trial court disregarded the request and the jury did not find upon them. This act of the court is assigned as error. There is no merit in the contention. Defendant introduced no evidence in support of the pleas. The burden of establishing them was upon him. It was just as necessary to support the pleas as to interpose them. His failure to do so must be deemed a waiver thereof. People v. Newell, 192 Cal. 659, 667, 221 P. 622.

[3, 4] Appellant next complains of the giving of an instruction reading as follows:

> "The evidence in this case tends to show that on the night of January 28th, last year, the prosecuting witness was in the possession of a certain store here in Burlingame, and therein he had merchandise belonging to him, and that during the evening or night, the store was entered by some person, and certain articles of merchandise were stolen and carried away."

It is claimed that this instruction virtually states to the jury that a burglary had been committed; that it occurred at night and that a larceny was also committed. We do not think there is any merit in this contention. There was no claim made that a burglary had not been committed. On the contrary, it was conclusively shown that there had been one. There can be no substantial objection to a charge declaring that evidence has been offered tending to prove a certain fact, when it is disclosed by the record that the statement is true beyond any possible question. It necessarily follows that the instruction attacked did not constitute error. People v. Flannelly, 128 Cal. 83, 88, 60 P. 670. The trial court addressed the jury as follows:

> "Members of the jury, we ought all of us be happy today, and none of us have a grouch, considering the bounteous rain we are having, and I am glad the gentlemen have so concisely placed the case before you that you will be able now to decide it at once. The evidence is not voluminous, and my instructions will be short, and then you can return to your homes."

It is claimed that these remarks can be construed to be nothing more than an exhortation to the jury to convict the defendant, and to do so quickly. We do not so construe them. The evidence was in fact limited, and did not therefore require extensive consideration. Whatever result it may have produced on the minds of the jurors, whether favorable or unfavorable to the defendant, could in no manner be affected by the remarks complained of, as they in no manner indicated in what light the judge may have viewed the evidence. They could not be taken as an indication or expression of opinion of the court upon the facts or the weight of the evidence one way or the other.

[5] Further complaint is made of the action of the court in refusing to instruct the jury that, if they were in doubt as to the legal effects of the facts, they might find a special verdict. There was not error in the refusal to give this instruction, as the facts were few and simple, and the legal effect of the same, if believed, admitted of no doubt.

[6, 7] O'Connor, one of the participants in the robbery, testified on behalf of the people. He was asked whether or not he had ever been convicted of a felony, and he answered that he had. Appellant claims that he should have been permitted to further cross-examine the witness as to what felony or felonies he had been convicted of, in order to test his credibility. The nature of the particular felony he had been convicted of was fully shown, and the trial court did not limit the examination in this particular. There is no merit in this contention. Defendant, at the time of his arrest, was accused by O'Connor and Clinton in the presence of a police officer with having been a participant in the robbery. He denied the accusation. The officer was permitted to testify to this fact, and a motion was made on behalf of defendant to strike out this testimony. The motion was denied.

While it should have been granted, as it was not competent evidence of his guilt, the error was not prejudicial to defendant's rights for the reason that O'Connor testified to this same fact at the trial, and defendant took the stand in his own behalf and denied that he had participated in the robbery. Under these circumstances the error was cured. Appellant next claims that the court erroneously refused to strike out certain hearsay evidence of a police officer to the effect that the owner of the store had previously identified certain of the stolen property at a previous trial. The record shows that the trial court interrupted the examination at this point and no answer was given to the question, and no further inquiry was had upon the uncompleted objection.

[8] The further claim is made that the court erred in refusing to allow defendant to show by Dawson why the stolen property was left in his room. No inquiry was had upon the subject either in the direct or cross examination of this witness. The question was propounded upon the redirect examination, and the court did not abuse its discretion in sustaining an objection to the same. No other questions are presented.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 19, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑304(16).

Court may take judicial knowledge, on appeal from second conviction, that it reversed former conviction and directed a retrial.

2. Criminal law 🔑193.

Reversal of conviction on appeal, with direction for retrial, does not constitute former acquittal or once in jeopardy.

3. Criminal law 🔑199.

Conviction of burglary in first degree does not operate as an acquittal of burglary in the second degree.

4. Burglary 🔑37—Evidence that defendant had sledge hammer and jimmy, when arrested for burglary, held admissible.

Evidence that defendant had sledge hammer and jimmy upon his person, when arrested soon after burglary was committed, held admissible in burglary prosecution, in view of testimony that rear door of burglarized store had been hammered and forced down.

5. Witnesses 🔑277(2)—Where defendant testified he and codefendants drove to place of burglary, it was proper to ask him purpose of trip.

Where in burglary prosecution defendant testified he and codefendants drove to town where burglary occurred, and that one of their companions had since pleaded guilty to crime of burglary, that he was asked on cross-examination the purpose of the trip, and answered that he went there to and did burglarize, held proper.

6. Criminal law 🔑1169(12).

Admission of confession held not prejudicial, notwithstanding it was obtained under duress, where defendant testified to same facts upon the trial.

7. Criminal law 🔑1182.

Appellate court need not discuss alleged errors urged on behalf of defendant, where he has escaped and is fugitive from justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

James Clinton, George Dawson, and Maurice C. Allen were convicted of burglary in the second degree, and they appealed. Judgment affirmed.

See, also, 236 P. 929.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendants were charged with the crime of burglary. They were jointly tried and convicted of burglary in the second degree, and sentenced to the state prison. All three of the defendants were formerly tried upon the same charge and were convicted of the crime of burglary in the first degree. They appealed to this court, and the judgment was reversed upon the ground that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant a verdict of burglary in the first degree, and the judgment was accordingly reversed and the case remanded for retrial. See People v. Clinton et al., 70 Cal. App. 262, 233 P. 78. The facts, briefly stated, show that appellants, together with others, burglarized a haberdasher's store at Burlingame and stole merchandise therefrom, which was subsequently recovered from them in San Francisco.

Several grounds are urged for a reversal of the instant judgment. It is first claimed that the jury should have found for appellants on their special pleas of once in jeopardy and former acquittal, that the trial court erred in the admission of certain testimony, and also in its instructions to the jury. Alleged misconduct of the district attorney is assigned as error, and it is further claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the conviction.

[1-3] With reference to their first contention, it appears that appellants in support of their special pleas of once in jeopardy and former acquittal introduced in evidence the information charging them with the commission of the crime of burglary, it being the same instrument upon which they were tried upon on the former occasion and upon which their second trial was based. They also introduced in evidence certain minutes of the former trial, together with certified copies of the judgment commitments as to each of them. No proof was introduced on the part of the prosecution to show that the convictions were reversed. Notwithstanding this fact, the jury found for the people on both special pleas. While, under these circumstances the verdict on these special pleas was erroneous, it does not constitute reversible error. The former conviction relied on was, as a matter of fact, reversed by this very division of the appellate court. It is an established principle that courts may take judicial knowledge of their own proceedings in the same case. Hollenbach v. Schnabel, 101 Cal. 312, 35 P. 872, 40 Am. St. Rep. 57; Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 265, 128 P. 407. Upon the setting aside of the former conviction, a retrial was ordered. A judgment, reversed upon appeal with such direction, does not constitute former acquittal or once in jeopardy. People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 467; People v. Tucker, 117 Cal. 231, 49 P. 134. Nor does a conviction of burglary in the first degree operate, as claimed, as an acquittal of burglary in the second degree. Appellants next complain of the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury that they might find a special verdict. This objection is considered in the companion case of People v. Higbee, 248 P. 927, this day decided, as is also the further objection that the court erred in instructing the jury that the evidence tended to show that a burglary had been committed. As pointed out in the Higbee Case, there is no merit in either contention.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

[4, 5] The trial court permitted the prosecution to show that appellant Dawson was searched at the time of his arrest, and that a sledge hammer and jimmy were found upon his person. It is claimed that this evidence was inadmissible, without preliminary proof that the implements were used in the commission of the crime. There was testimony to show that the rear door of the store burglarized had been hammered and forced open and the lock twisted by means of some instrument. Evidence to show that, at or about the time the crime was committed, the accused had in his possession certain tools, with which it was or might have been committed, is relevant. 16 Corp. Jur. 546; People v. Hope, 62 Cal. 291; Fairall on Criminal Laws, p. 156. Appellant Dawson testified on his direct examination that he, Allen, Clinton, and O'Connor drove in a Stutz automobile to Burlingame; that he, Dawson, made the arrangements for the trip; and that O'Connor has since pleaded guilty to the crime of burglary. On cross-examination this witness was asked the purpose of his trip, and he answered that he went there to and did burglarize the store in question. We are of the opinion that this was proper cross-examination. People v. Maughs, 8 Cal. App. 107, 96 P. 407.

[6] At the time of his arrest Dawson made and signed a confession of his guilt, and the trial court permitted its introduction in evidence. It was objected to on the ground that it was obtained by force and violence. There was testimony to show that Dawson had been slapped by a police officer about an hour before the confession was made. Assuming that the confession was obtained under duress and was not voluntary, still we fail to see how the substantial rights of this appellant were affected thereby, as he testified to the same facts upon the trial.

[7] And finally, several objections are urged on behalf of defendant Allen. We need not be at pains to discuss these alleged errors, as it appears by affidavit of the sheriff of San Mateo county, on file herein, that Allen has escaped from custody and is now a fugitive from justice. It may be said, however, that we have considered these objections and find no merit therein.

The judgment as to all of the defendants is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court; San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by George O. Marston against the Pickwick Stages, Inc., and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Appeal from order dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Warren E. Libby, of Los Angeles, E. L. Seavey, of San Diego, and B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Charles C. Crouch, Glen H. Munkelt, and Frank A. Gazlay, all of San Diego, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries arising out of a collision between an automobile driven by plaintiff and an autostage operated in the business of the defendant Pickwick Stages, Inc., and driven by its employee, the defendant Vallad. The answer of each defendant, in addition to denying the allegations of the complaint, pleads contributory negligence as an affirmative defense. The verdict was for plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The latter appeal must be dismissed. No appeal lies from an order denying a new trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 963. As grounds for reversal appellants urge that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, that the court erred in giving certain instructions, and that it further erred in refusing certain requested instructions.

[2] The accident in which plaintiff received his injuries occurred during the daytime, on the state highway, within the limits of the city of San Diego. The highway at the place where the collision occurred is 20 feet wide and paved. Plaintiff, driving a Ford automobile, was traveling in a northerly direction. The autostage was proceeding in the opposite direction. A cloud of smoke, caused by the burning of grass or brush along the railroad tracks to the west, swept across the highway and obscured the view of the respective drivers as they were about to pass each other. Each driver claims that the other was on the wrong side of the road. Without doubt the presence of one or the other of the vehicles on the left or wrong side of the road was the proximate cause of the accident. By its verdict the jury impliedly found that plaintiff's car was on the right side and that the autostage was on the wrong side of the highway.

Plaintiff testified that the cloud of smoke was from 75 to 100 feet wide; that he first observed it when he was about half a mile away; that he was then traveling at a speed of about 25 miles an hour; that as he approached the smoke he decreased the speed of his car until it was proceeding at about 15 miles an hour; that as he was about to enter the pall of smoke, and when about a rod away from it, he saw the autostage 50 feet ahead, coming diagonally towards him, his car being at the time on the right side of the pavement; that as soon as he saw the autostage he made an effort to turn his car still further toward the right, but that before he could leave the paved highway the autostage struck his vehicle with terrific force, wrecking it and causing the personal injuries of which he complains.

The driver of the autostage, whose testimony was corroborated by that of some of his passengers, testified that as his vehicle entered the cloud of smoke it was on the right or west side of the paved highway, proceeding at a speed of about 20 miles an hour; that after getting into the smoke he decreased the speed of the autostage, so that when the collision occurred it was traveling at about 8 or 10 miles an hour; that the wheels on the right side of the stage were without 6 or 8 inches of the edge of the pavement, on the westerly side of the highway; that he did not change his course from the time he entered the smoke screen up to the instant of the collision; that as he entered the thick smoke he saw plaintiff's car for the first time, the distance separating the two vehicles being then about half the length of the autostage, which is 15 feet long; that instantly the impact came; and that he had no time to do anything; that the front left wheel of the autostage was broken by the collision and the drag link was bent—the latter piece of mechanism being a rod running from the steering gear to the spindle pin and controlling the front wheels; that by reason of the nature of these injuries he was unable to steer the stage after the impact; and that the vehicle dropped down on the spindle pin, dragged for a few feet, and then turned toward the left, proceeding thus for about 39 feet, when it came to a stop. There was some evidence to warrant the inference that neither driver sounded his horn before the collision.

There was observed after the accident a curved mark, graved in the pavement of the highway by the spindle pin of the autostage. The northerly end of this mark, i. e., the place where it commenced, was about 6 feet 2 inches east of the westerly edge of the pavement. One witness testified that the mark, from the point of its beginning, "starts a little bit, pointing in toward the east"; that it then straightens out and continues thus for about 6 feet, when it disappears for a space and then reappears as a diagonal mark across the pavement from the west side to the place where the stage came to a stop on the east side.

A witness for the plaintiff, who was driving an automobile in the same direction that plaintiff was traveling and who was about 250 feet to the rear of plaintiff's car when the collision occurred, testified that he saw the accident and that after hitting the Ford the autostage traveled 5 or 6 yards before its left front wheel came off.

The foregoing résumé discloses a sharp conflict in the evidence upon the vital question in the case, namely, the question as to which vehicle was on the wrong side of the highway.

[3-5] We think the evidence was sufficient to justify the conclusion of the jury. An appellate court will never disturb a verdict where there is some substantial evidence to support it. But appellants claim that respondent's testimony is conclusively demonstrated to be false and impossible by the marks which were made upon the pavement by the spindle pin of the autostage. This mute testimony, say appellants, shows "unmistakably and conclusively that the stage was upon the west side of the road at the time of the collision," and that respondent's testimony is impossible "in the face of these telltale marks." There would be much force in this contention if a witness for respondent had not testified that the autostage traveled some five or six yards before its wheel came off; for the most positive testimony may be rejected as inherently improbable when its falsity appears from a consideration of the undisputed circumstances or from the laws of nature. But until the wheel came off the axle, thus permitting the left front end of the stage to drop, the spindle pin did not touch the pavement. Until then no mark was made to tell the course of the stage whilst traversing the five or six yards. It is quite possible that while the stage was covering this space of 15 or 18 feet it swerved over to the right side of the highway immediately after hitting the Ford and while it was still traveling on all of its four wheels. This possibility affords a conceivable explanation for the fact that the commencement of the mark made by the spindle pin was found to be on the right or west side of the highway. If this is what happened, and it is not impossible, then there is no necessary inconsistency between the mark as it appeared on the pavement and respondent's testimony that when he saw the autostage an instant before the collision it was coming diagonally toward his vehicle on the east side of the highway. What was said by this court in Austin v. Newton, 46 Cal. App. 498, 189 P. 473, is pertinent:

> "Common experience and observation teach us that strange and astonishing things sometimes happen in the world of physical phenomena, and accidents sometimes appear to happen in manner unaccountable. For these reasons an appellate court must be careful not to give to dogmatic and undemonstrated conclusions respecting natural laws precedence over the testimony of apparently credible witnesses; and the mere fact that the admitted circumstances make the story of the witnesses seem improbable will not justify a reversal by an appellate tribunal upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. Stokes v. Metropolitan Street Ry. Co., 173 Mo. App. 676, 160 S. W. 46."

[6] What we have said disposes of appellants' next contention, which is that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence.

[7-9] The court gave an instruction practically in the language of section 20 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 215). The instruction reads, in part, as follows:

> "The court instructs you that the driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway must drive or operate such vehicle in a careful manner with due regard for the safety and convenience of all other vehicles upon such highway, and wherever practicable shall travel on the right hand side of such highway. Two vehicles while passing each other in opposite directions have the right of way, and no other vehicle to the rear of either of such vehicles must pass or attempt to pass such vehicles."

We have italicized that part of the instruction to which appellants object. The court also gave another instruction substantially in the language of section 22 of the same act, which told the jury that:

> "It is unlawful to operate or drive an automobile on a public highway in excess of 30 miles an hour when the operator or driver does not have a clear and uninterrupted view of the highway on which he is traveling in the direction toward which he is traveling for at least 400 feet ahead of such operator or driver."

Appellants do not question the correctness of either of these instructions as statements of abstract propositions of law, but claim that both of them were improper for the reason that they refer to facts of which there was no evidence. It is claimed that it was error to give the first of these instructions because there was no evidence that either the stage or the Ford was attempting to pass any vehicle just before the collision, and that it was error to give the other instruction because there is no evidence that the stage was traveling in excess of 30 miles an hour. If it be conceded that it was improper to give these instructions for the reasons assigned by appellants, nevertheless the giving of them is not reversible error. While it unquestionably is true that the court should not instruct the jury upon abstract questions of law not applicable to the circumstances of the case, nevertheless such action on the part of the trial court will not warrant a reversal where it is apparent that no injury could have resulted. Bosqui v. Sutro R. Co., 131 Cal. 390, 401, 63 P. 682, 685; People v. Romero, 143 Cal. 458, 77 P. 163; Hardy v. Schirmer, 163 Cal. 272, 124 P. 993; George v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 126 Cal. 357, 58 P. 819, 46 L. R. A. 829, 77 Am. St. Rep. 184; Estate of Clark, 180 Cal. 395, 181 P. 639. We are unable to see how either of the instructions now under consideration could have prejudiced appellants' cause. In Bosqui v. Sutro R. Co., supra, the court, speaking of an instruction which referred to facts not shown by the evidence, said:

> "In People v. Cochran, 61 Cal. 548, it was said: 'If an instruction in a case is asked which refers to facts which there is no evidence to prove, it is not error to refuse to give it, and if given, although in fact erroneous in the abstract, it will not be regarded as an error for which the judgment will be reversed, unless it be manifested that the jury was misled by it to the prejudice of the defendant. Presumptively, however, an erroneous proposition of law, referring in no way to the evidence in the case submitted to the jury, has not prejudiced the defendant.' If this latter statement be true, surely a correct proposition of law under like circumstances would not necessarily mislead the jury. In the present case, there was not the slightest evidence or suspicion pointing to the defendant as having placed the obstruction on the rails, and we do not think the instruction assumes that any such evidence existed. We do not believe that the reference made to defendant in that connection could, in view of the evidence in the case, have made the slightest impression on the jury to defendant's prejudice."

[10] An excerpt from another of the court's instructions is made the subject of attack by appellants upon the ground that it assumes negligence on the part of the driver of the stage. When the whole charge is read and considered in its entirety, as it should be, the objection now made to the isolated passage selected by appellants for their criticism is found to be baseless.

[11] The court instructed the jury to find for the plaintiff if the accident was proximately caused by negligence on the part of the driver of the stage and if "plaintiff was without fault." It is objected that the words "without fault" are not equivalent to an instruction upon the issue of contributory negligence. In other parts of its charge the court fully and correctly instructed the jury upon the question of contributory negligence. Moreover, in the literature of the law, the word "fault" is the equivalent of "negligence." Louisville, etc., R. Co. v. Berry, 2 Ind. App. 427, 28 N. E. 714; Central R. & Banking Co. v. Lanier, 83 Ga. 587, 10 S. E. 279; 25 C. J. 676. The objection is hypercritical and without merit.

[12, 13] Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give a requested instruction which, in part, is as follows:

> "* * * Every motor vehicle shall be equipped with a bell, gong, horn, whistle, or other device in good working order capable of emitting an abrupt sound adequate in quality and volume to give warning of the approach of such vehicle to pedestrians and other riders or drivers of other vehicles on the highway. Every person operating a motor vehicle shall sound said bell, gong, horn or whistle or other device whenever necessary as a warning of danger. Therefore, in this case, if you find from the evidence that there was a cloud of smoke covering the highway on which the plaintiff was driving at the time and place of the collision making it impossible for the plaintiff then and there to see any object on the highway ahead of his machine for a distance of 400 feet, or in any manner whatever interfering with the vision of the plaintiff so that he did not have a clear and unobstructed view of the highway ahead of him in the direction in which he was traveling, and if you further find that the plaintiff at the time and place where this cloud of smoke was overhanging the highway failed to sound any bell, gong or horn, to warn others using the highway of the approach of his car, then I charge you that under the circumstances and conditions then and there existing the plaintiff was guilty of negligence. * * *"

The first part of the above-quoted portion of this instruction is a correct statement of the law. It is substantially in the language of section 12 of the Motor Vehicle Act as it read at the time of the accident. Stats. 1915, p. 405. That section of the act provides that every person operating a motor vehicle shall sound his bell, horn, gong, or other device "whenever necessary as a warning of danger." But though it would have been proper to give this part of the instruction, it would have been error to give the instruction with its concluding sentence. Had the instruction been given, the last part of it would have erroneously charged the jury, as a matter of law, that under the circumstances referred to by the court it was necessary to sound the horn as a warning of danger, and that a failure to do so constituted negligence per se. In other words, the concluding part of the instruction purports to settle the conditions which create the necessity for the sounding of the horn, instead of leaving it to the jury to determine whether, under the circumstances referred to, the sounding of the horn was or was not necessary as a warning of danger. We think that in all such cases it is for the jury, and not for the court, to say whether, under a given set of circumstances, a necessity exists for this precautionary act. The circumstances which will make it necessary to sound the horn "as a warning of danger" cannot be defined and measured by any precise standard. As in all cases where the question of negligence is presented, the existence of a necessity for sounding the warning horn is always relative to the particular facts and circumstances of which the necessity is sought to be predicated. For this reason it is a question of fact for the jury, even where the circumstances are undisputed, if reasonable minds can rationally draw different conclusions from the conceded facts. In Rush v. Lagomarsino, 237 P. 1066, the Supreme Court, speaking of an instruction which was properly drawn—for there the instruction left it to the jury to determine whether the blowing of the horn was necessary—said:

> "* * * It was certainly a matter for the jury to determine whether or not, under all the circumstances, it was necessary for the defendant to sound his horn as a warning of danger, and the failure to submit that question to the jury as requested was error which doubtless redounded to the prejudice of the plaintiff."

In the instant case the court, had the instruction been given, would have undertaken to determine the question of necessity for the jury. The instruction was properly refused.

[14] Appellants complain of the court's refusal to give an instruction requested by them which, if given, would have told the jury that if plaintiff was negligent, and if his negligence contributed proximately and directly "to the cause of the accident," he cannot recover. Negligence, of one party or the other, was the proximate cause of the accident. Therefore the instruction, had it been given, would have charged the jury, in substance and effect, that if plaintiff was negligent, and if his negligence proximately contributed to his negligence, he could not recover. This manifestly is absurd, and the learned trial judge clearly was warranted in refusing to give an instruction so incorrectly phrased. It was calculated to make "confusion worse confounded."

[15] Complaint is made of the refusal to give other instructions requested by appellants. An inspection of the record discloses that the subject-matter of these instructions is substantially incorporated in those which were given, and that the jury was fully instructed as to all matters of law necessary for their enlightenment in determining the rights of the parties.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

MILLER v. MURPHY et al. (Civ. 5483.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 21, 1926.)

1. Records ⚷1.

That a document is in a public office or in custody of a public officer does not make it a public record.

2. Evidence ⚷338—Map of subdivisions of land, prepared, acknowledged, and filed according to statute, constitutes a public writing, and a copy thereof is admissible with effect of original (St. 1893, p. 96; County Government Act 1897, § 131, re-enacted by St. 1907, p. 395, now Pol. Code, § 4142; Code Civ. Proc. § 1888, subd. 2, and sections 1892, 1893).

Since it relates to matters in which the public at large or the community may have an interest and for whose protection the law requires it to be filed, a map of subdivisions of land, prepared, acknowledged, and filed according to St. 1893, p. 96, and County Government Act 1897, § 131, re-enacted by St. 1907, p. 395, now Pol. Code, § 4142, constitutes a public writing within Code Civ. Proc. § 1888, subd. 2, and hence a copy thereof is admissible with effect of original under sections 1892, 1893.

3. Evidence ⚷333(4).

Records and tax receipts, offered to prove payment of taxes assessed against lots 17 and 19, block 15, which described the lots as lots 17 and 19, block 15/2196, held admissible, where figures 2196 referred to assessor's block book.

4. Evidence 🔑317(4)—Testimony as to what tenant stated as reason for refusal to pay rent held properly excluded as hearsay.

In administratrix's action to foreclose lien of contract for repayment of money advanced for taxes with counterclaim for rents received by plaintiff, testimony as to what tenant stated as reason for refusal to pay rent held properly excluded as hearsay, in absence of proof that statements were made in presence of deceased or administratrix.

5. Executors and administrators 🔑434(1)—Counterclaim for rents held properly disallowed, in absence of proof of receipt thereof by administratrix, deceased, or assignee.

In administratrix's action to foreclose lien of contract for repayment of money advanced for taxes, counterclaim for rents from the property was properly disallowed, in absence of evidence of receipt of rents by administratrix, deceased, or his assignee.

6. Assumpsit, action of 🔑1.

To recover in assumpsit against a tortfeasor, it must appear that he received a benefit from the wrongful act which was taken from plaintiff.

7. Appeal and error 🔑1201(3).

Where more than two years elapsed after remand before a second trial, denying motion during trial for leave to file a supplemental answer and to plead as a set-off a judgment for costs entered before remand held not an abuse of discretion.

8. Appeal and error 🔑959(1).

Denial of motion to file supplemental answer and to plead as a set-off a judgment for costs will not be disturbed, in absence of abuse of discretion.

9. Executors and administrators 🔑96.

Assignment of cause of action by administratrix, in absence of evidence of her authority to execute it, did not transfer the estate's interest in the cause of action.

10. Attorney and client 🔑70.

Duly licensed attorney is presumed in absence of contrary evidence to have had authority to appear for person for whom he professes to act, including an administratrix, though he was subsequently disbarred.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Action by William Miller, by Mary Miller, as administratrix of the estate of William Miller, deceased against Herman Murphy and others to foreclose a lien created by a contract for repayment of money advanced for payment of taxes. Judgment foreclosing lien, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore and Hayes, Oliphant & Dukette, all of Oakland, for appellants.

John C. Quinlan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from a judgment foreclosing a lien created by a contract providing for the repayment to William Miller, respondent's intestate, of sums to be advanced by him for the payment of taxes upon two parcels of land, the title to which was in litigation, it being agreed that such repayment should be made by appellants in the event the latter should be adjudged the owners thereof. The litigation having resulted in favor of appellants, this action was brought to establish the amounts paid and to foreclose the lien upon the two parcels mentioned. The appeal is presented on the judgment roll with a bill of exceptions.

A previous trial of the action resulted in a judgment which was reversed on appeal, in the case of Miller v. Murphy et al., 186 Cal. 344, 199 P. 525. The contract, which was dated July 5, 1917, recited that the property thereinafter described had been sold on July 5, 1912, for delinquent taxes of the city of Berkeley in the county of Alameda for the fiscal year 1911–1912, and that all subsequent city taxes levied thereon were unpaid and had become delinquent, the property referred to being therein described as:

> "Those lots of land situate in the city of Berkeley, county of Alameda, state of California, described as follows, to wit, lots 17 and 19 in block No. 15 as said lots and block are delineated and so designated upon that certain map entitled 'Daley's Scenic Park, Berkeley, Cal.,' filed August 26, 1889, in the office of the county recorder of said county of Alameda, and lots 25 and 26 as said lots are delineated and so designated upon that certain map entitled 'La Loma Park, Berkeley, Alameda county, Cal.,' filed November 12, 1900, in the office of the county recorder of said county of Alameda."

It was found by the trial court that the intestate paid to the city treasurer and tax collector of the city of Berkeley the sum of $996.87 for the redemption of the identical property described in the contract, that the property was thereby redeemed, and that the contract was fully performed. From this sum were deducted the amounts of two of the three counterclaims pleaded by appellants, and judgment for the difference with interest was entered in the sum of $1,345.21.

Appellants specify as error the admission over objection of certain tax receipts as evidence that the payments made by deceased applied to the taxes assessed against the property described, and the admission of other evidence, oral and documentary, for the same purpose, the refusal of the court at the trial to permit appellants by amendment to their answer to plead and prove as a fourth counterclaim a judgment for costs entered in another action subsequent to the filing of the complaint and answer in the instant case, and the conclusion of the court that an attorney who participated in the proceedings at the trial was authorized to appear and act for respondent.

The fact that the deceased made the payments to the city treasurer and tax collector of the city of Berkeley in the amount found by the court is fully supported by his testimony given on the first trial of the action, which testimony was read at the subsequent hearing. One of the grounds upon which the original judgment was reversed on appeal was the fact that it appeared from the tax receipt, offered in evidence to prove that lots 25 and 26 of La Loma Park had been redeemed from the tax sale referred to in the contract, that the property therein mentioned was described as lots 25 and 26 of block 2242 of La Loma Park, and, no other evidence having been offered at the first trial of the identity of the latter parcels with those described in the contract, it was held that the evidence was insufficient to support the burden which rested upon plaintiff of showing that the tax receipt referred to the property in controversy. At the second trial plaintiff undertook to establish the fact by testimony of public officers in connection with certain public records. A map, certified by the county recorder of the county of Alameda to be a full, true, and correct copy of the original map of "La Loma Park, Berkeley, Alameda county, California," on file in his office, was admitted in evidence over the objection of appellants that the copy was not the best evidence. This document, a photographic copy of which is attached to the transcript, shows that the original map, as recited in the contract, was filed in that office on November 12, 1900, and conformed to the requirements of the Act of 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 96), providing for the filing in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the subdivision is situated of all maps of subdivisions of land into lots for purposes of sale. Section 131 of the County Government Act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 452), which applied to the office mentioned at the time the map was filed, provided that:

> "All books of record, maps, charts, surveys, and other papers on file in the recorder's office, must, during office hours, be open for inspection by any person, without charge; and the recorder must arrange the books of record and indices in his office in such suitable places as to facilitate their inspection."

This section was re-enacted in 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 395), as section 4142 of the Political Code.

[1, 2] While the mere fact that a document is in a public office or in the custody of a public officer does not make it a public record, where, as here, the document relates to matters in which the public at large or the community may have an interest, and for whose protection the law requires it to be filed, a map prepared, acknowledged, and filed in accordance with the act mentioned may reasonably be held to constitute a public writing within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 1888 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Colton L. & W. Co. v. Swartz, 99 Cal. 278, 285, 33 P. 878), which every citizen has a right to inspect (Pol. Code, § 4142; Code Civ. Proc. § 1892), and of which a copy certified by the county recorder is admissible with like effect as the original (Code Civ. Proc. § 1893). It appears from this map that La Loma Park is not divided into blocks, but consists of certain lots designated thereon by number from 1 to 27, inclusive, and that the number 2242 appearing in the tax receipt mentioned as a block number is not shown thereon. The meaning and purpose of this number in the tax receipt was clearly shown by the testimony of the city assessor of the city of Berkeley, who produced what is known as the block book used by that officer in making assessments upon land within the municipality, upon a page of which appeared a copy or tracing of a portion of the map of La Loma Park mentioned above, the lots here in question being shown thereon. Upon the margin of the copy or tracing mentioned appeared the figures 2242, which, as testified by the officer, was a number used to locate the map in the book mentioned, the block designated by that number in the tax receipt referring to the assessor's block book, and not to a block so numbered on the map of La Loma Park.

[3] It was further shown by the testimony of the city treasurer of the city of Berkeley and from the original records of that office, which were produced and read at the trial, that the amounts assessed against the lots last mentioned, and two lots numbered 17 and 19 of Daley's Scenic Park, from the year 1911 to 1915, inclusive, with the accrued penalties, had been paid; in addition to which testimony tax receipts of the municipality for the year 1916, acknowledging payment of taxes upon the same parcels, were introduced in evidence. The description of the lots in the latter tract contained in the public record and tax receipts mentioned was as follows: "Description of real estate. Lots 17 and 19, block 15/2196." It is urged in this connection by appellants that the record and receipts referred to a block numbered "15/2196," and should be so construed, that this evidence was irrelevant and insufficient to prove the payment of taxes assessed against lots in block 15, and that an objection to its admission should have been sustained.

While the map of the latter tract was not introduced and no direct evidence on the point was offered, the evidence adduced for the purpose of showing payment of the taxes assessed against the La Loma Park property sufficiently shows that for the more convenient conduct of the offices concerned with the assessment and collection of taxes a block number was inserted in the records of assessments and tax receipts corresponding to the map number in the block book of the assessor, which had no reference to the map of the tract assessed on file in the office of the county recorder. This evidence, taken in connection with the form in which the description quoted appears, fairly supports the conclusion that the figures 2196 refer to the block book and not to the original map, and sustains the construction placed thereon by the trial court.

[4-6] By their third counterclaim appellants sought to recover the sum of $419.30 upon the following facts: While title to the property described was in litigation a portion thereof was occupied by a tenant holding under appellant Ella M. Murphy at a monthly rental of $40. Deceased, who asserted title thereto, assigned his claim to the rent to one Kelly, who brought suit therefor against the tenant and recovered judgment in the sum of $400 with costs. It was alleged that the judgment had been paid to deceased, and appellant thereby deprived of the rents in the amount so recovered. The judgment roll in that action having been admitted in evidence, appellant Herman Murphy testified that neither he nor his wife had received the rents mentioned; and the witness was then asked whether the tenant had stated any reason for his refusal to pay. The court sustained an objection to the question, and its ruling is assigned as error. The court in passing upon the sufficiency of this counterclaim in Miller v. Murphy, supra, said:

> "The third item of counterclaim is ambiguously pleaded and it is difficult to determine whether defendant seeks to recover for a tort, or on an implied contract for money belonging to the defendants, which plaintiff had and received to his own use. Treating defendants' pleading as a waiver of the tort and a claim on the implied contract to a refund of the money so received, we are of the opinion that the set-off may be allowed if the evidence supports it."

The purpose of the question was to prove statements from the tenant from which the conclusion might be drawn that the rents or the amount of the judgment therefor had been received by the deceased or his assignee. In the absence of proof or an offer to prove that such statements were made in the presence of the deceased or his representative, the testimony sought to be elicited from the witness was hearsay, and the objection on the ground of its incompetency was properly sustained. It not being contended that appellants' rights against the tenant were concluded by the judgment obtained by Kelly, and no competent evidence having been adduced of the receipt by the intestate, his representative, or his assignee of any part of the rents mentioned, the finding against the allegations of the counterclaim was proper. To recover in assumpsit against a tort-feasor it must appear that he has received a benefit from the wrongful act (Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 187, 55 P. 783), and that such benefit was taken from the plaintiff (Woodward, Quasi Contracts, §§ 272, 274).

[7, 8] During the course of the trial appellants moved for leave to file a supplemental answer and plead as a set-off a certain judgment for costs entered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on April 18, 1919, in favor of appellants and against the deceased, which motion was denied. More than two years appear to have elapsed between the determination of the appeal mentioned and the second trial of the action, which afforded ample opportunity for such amendments as were made proper by existing facts; and where, as here, the discretion of the court is not shown to have been abused, its action in denying the motion will not be disturbed. Trower v. City and County of San Francisco, 157 Cal. 762, 109 P. 617; Maltby v. Conklin, 50 Cal. App. 201, 208, 195 P. 280; Slankard v. Wagnon, 181 Cal. 135, 183 P. 562.

[9] Some months before the second trial an instrument was executed by Anna M. O'Connell, a daughter of the intestate, and by Mary Miller, his administratrix, the latter having theretofore been substituted as plaintiff in the action, purporting to assign all their right, title, and interest in the cause of action to Daniel O'Connell, the attorney of record in the case. This instrument was filed therein by the latter, with a written notice of his election to prosecute the action in the name of the plaintiffs, and appointing William F. Cleary, Esq., as his attorney. Subsequently notices of motion to set the cause for trial and of the date fixed therefor were served upon appellants by the attorney last named, the notices being signed by him as "attorney for the plaintiffs and assignee." While the purported assignment was admitted in evidence without objection, no evidence of the authority of the administratrix to execute the instrument having been offered, the court properly held it to be insufficient to transfer to O'Connell the interest of the estate in the cause of action, that the administratrix was the real party in interest, and its judgment was entered accordingly.

[10] It is admitted that the attorney named as assignee and who represented the original plaintiff at the first trial of the action was subsequently disbarred, and it was urged by appellants that the administratrix had not authorized the further prosecution of the action, or attorney Cleary to represent her. No evidence on this question was presented by appellants, and no direct evidence of authority to represent the administratrix appears from the record. It is not contended, however, that Mr. Cleary was not a duly licensed attorney, and therefore presumed, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to have authority to appear for any person for whom he professed to act. Turner v. Caruthers, 17 Cal. 431; People v. Mariposa Co., 39 Cal. 683. This presumption is sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court shown by its decision and judgment that the administratrix was represented by this attorney in the proceedings.

Other rulings assigned as error have been considered, none of which, if erroneous, can reasonably be held to have been prejudicial; and, it appearing that the findings are fully sustained by the evidence, the judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA EDISON CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 5324.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 6, 1926. Rehearing Denied Aug. 2, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 2, 1926.)

1. Master and servant 🔑416.

Petition for rehearing, on ground that award was "incorrect on facts of case," held sufficient under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1917, § 65, subd. (a), cl. 3.

2. Pleading 🔑63.

In civil actions pleadings need not be couched in exact language of statute provided facts are shown bringing them within its plain intent.

3. Master and servant 🔑405(6) — Evidence held to support increased award of compensation as for temporary total disability instead of temporary partial disability (Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1917, § 20, subd. [d]).

Evidence on rehearing affecting the then condition of employee and unsuccessful attempts to work, and failure of employer to furnish treatment required by prior award, held sufficient under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1917, § 20, subd. (d) (St. 1917, p. 850), to support an award for increased compensation as for temporary total disability instead of temporary partial disability.

4. Master and servant 🔑416.

Industrial Accident Commission, having reopened case on petition for rehearing, has jurisdiction to take further testimony and make such disposition as is warranted by facts.

Courts are not concerned with process of reasoning of Industrial Accident Commission, but must affirm reasonable award made within commission's jurisdiction.

6. Master and servant 🔑416—Award requiring "further medical treatment necessary to cure and relieve" employee, as indicated by testimony, held not unenforceable for uncertainty.

Award of compensation requiring employer to furnish employee "further medical treatment necessary to cure and relieve him of the conditions from which he is now suffering, as indicated in the testimony of Dr. H. H. M.—— at hearing on July 29, 1924," held not so uncertain as to be unenforceable, in view of doctor's testimony.

7. Master and servant 🔑405(6).

Evidence held to support finding that in view of open labor market conditions, employee's injury had caused temporary total disability.

8. Master and servant 🔑416.

Finding of temporary total disability on rehearing, based on facts then developed, held not inconsistent with prior finding of temporary partial disability, nor objectionable as attempt to correct error.

9. Master and servant 🔑416.

Supplemental award may not be used to correct errors in original award.

Supplemental proceedings under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act 1917, by Nick Spanovich, claimant, opposed by the Southern California Edison Company, employer. To review and annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing compensation subsequent to an order terminating payments under previous findings and award, the employer brings certiorari. Writ discharged, and award affirmed.

Roy V. Reppy and E. W. Cunningham, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

G. C. Faulkner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner seeks by certiorari to review supplemental proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission and to annul the resultant order allowing compensation subsequently to an order terminating payments under previous findings and award.

The respondent Spanovich was injured on March 28, 1922, while in the employ of the petitioner herein. On August 28, 1924, after various hearings, he was awarded by the respondent commission compensation in the sum of $227.24, payable forthwith, and weekly payments of $8.65. The award also directed "that defendant (petitioner here) furnish to applicant the further medical treatment necessary to cure and relieve him of the conditions from which he is now suffering, as indicated in the testimony of Dr. H. H. Markel at the hearing on July 29, 1924." The employer thereafter sought a rehearing upon the award so granted, and, a rehearing having been denied, proceeded to make payments in accordance with the original order.

From oral testimony and written reports of physicians and surgeons it appears that the award of August 28, 1924, was based upon evidence tending to show that the employee was so seriously injured that, although he repeatedly sought light work, it was impossible for him to continue more than a few days at a time on account of severe pains caused by the injuries. A brief history of the case seems requisite to a clear understanding of the findings and orders of the Industrial Accident Commission which are here presented for consideration. We recite the facts concisely as summarized by Dr. John D. Gillis, who, it may be noted, reported adversely to the applicant's petition for award. After three months no improvement; using various medicines internally and externally; lost his job; sent to doctor at Fresno, then to San Francisco; body cast applied and retained for 16 days; sent to hospital, and under anesthetic another cast applied; no improvement after 30 days; procured light work; pain persisted; again tried light work, but unable to continue; reported to free clinic for two months, procured light work, but finally reported back for treatment; provided with back brace, but could not work with brace on, could not work without it; came to Los Angeles in December; "there is no appreciable change in his condition." Numerous examinations by X-ray and otherwise were made by doctors at various places, from all of which it appeared that there was no focal infection or cause for arthritis; "no arthritis."

Thereafter, and on May 20, 1925, the respondent commission called a supplemental hearing, pursuant to the oral request of petitioner herein, but without a petition in writing therefor, notifying the parties that it would be held on June 2, 1925. On the latter date the applicant appeared in person, without a representative, and the official report recites, "Defendant represented by its C. H. Chandler, Esq." The referee held a brief informal conversation with Spanovich concerning the experiment of removing his tonsils, but the latter stated that he had been advised by a physician that this should not be done. No testimony was taken, nor was the subject of work mentioned. A report of Dr. Gillis was filed wherein the doctor related in detail all of the facts heretofore mentioned, and in addition thereto stated:

> "There is no appreciable change in his condition during the last three years; he still has almost continuous pain in the lower left back, which is markedly aggravated when he bends forward, or when he stands erect for any length of time; he has been examined by various doctors throughout the state. He believes at this time he could do light work if procurable."

Dr. Gillis recommended that the employee's teeth be examined, "since they are probably acting as a foci infection. There may be other foci, but I have been unable to locate them. He should continue doing work within his limits since by so doing he will have less time to think about his continuous ache in the lower left back." Upon the foregoing statement Dr. H. E. Southworth reported in writing: It is evident from the doctor's report that he is of the opinion that this applicant is suffering from chronic arthritis involving the left sacro-iliac and lumbo-sacral joints. The doctor is of the opinion that recovery from injury of March 28, 1922, is complete at the present time, and that present disability is the direct result of a metastic infection depending upon a focus in a distant part of the body." Spanovich remarked: "As far as the operation goes, I wouldn't care, if I could get cured."

No evidence was offered at the supplemental hearing in behalf of the employee, nor was the record of previous hearings upon which the award was based before the commission. The matter was submitted for decision, and on July 15, 1925, an order was filed, reciting that, "Good cause appearing therefor, it is ordered that payments under findings and award be terminated as of June 15, 1925."

On August 13, 1925, the respondent employee filed a petition for rehearing, alleging that:

> "The order terminating payments under findings and award is incorrect on the facts of the case; that the medical reports, as he is informed and believes, show that while there is an arthritis of the hip joint, that that arthritis was not an infectious arthritis, but was an arthritis caused, exacerbated, and increased by reason of his injury. And in support of his condition your petitioner is filing report of Dr. H. H. Markel, who treated your petitioner long prior to the examination made by Dr. Gillis of Los Angeles, and has since made examination and report."

The accompanying report of Dr. Markel stated in part:

> "In my opinion Mr. Spanovich is still suffering from the effects of the injury which he originally sustained in 1922. At that time he tore loose the left sacro-iliac joint, which has, in my opinion, never been properly treated."

A rehearing was granted, and on December 8, 1925, and January 14, 1926, oral and documentary evidence, including the testimony of Spanovich, was received. The commission thereupon prepared and filed findings which recited that the period of temporary partial disability as found in the prior decision continued up to and including the 8th day of August, 1924; "that the injury, the subject-matter of the proceeding, also caused temporary total disability, in view of the conditions of the open labor market, continuing from August 28, 1924, indefinitely entitling the employee to $17.29 a week during said time. Amount accrued to January 14, 1926 (72 weeks) is $1,244.88. On account thereof defendant has paid weekly indemnity at the rate of $8.65 a week up to and including June 15, 1925 (41⅓ weeks), amounting to $359.59, balance due as of said date, January 14, 1926, $885.29." A supplemental award was accordingly made in the sum of $885.29, payable forthwith, and "the further sum of $17.29 a week beginning with the 15th day of January, 1926, and continuing thereafter until the termination of the disability or the further order of this commission."

[1] The petitioner contends that the commission was without jurisdiction to grant the rehearing for the reason that the petition therefor did not specify, as required by section 65 (a) of the Industrial Accident, Insurance, and Safety Act (St. 1917, p. 875), either "(3) that the evidence does not justify the findings of fact"; "(4) that the applicant has discovered new evidence, material to him, which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the hearing;" or "(5) that the findings of fact do not support the order, decision, or award."

It should be noted at the outset that the employee did not petition for rehearing upon the ground of newly discovered evidence. He demanded such rehearing upon the ground that "the order terminating payments under findings and award is incorrect on the facts of the case," and this we think was amply sufficient to state the sole ground upon which a rehearing could be asked, for the reason that no findings of fact were filed and the order was obviously contrary to the uncontradicted evidence contained in the record.

[2] It is unnecessary to cite authorities for the rule that pleadings in civil actions need not be couched in the exact language of the statute provided sufficient facts be shown to bring them within its plain intent. The petition for rehearing specifically alleged, further, "that the medical reports, as he is informed and believes, show that while there is an arthritis of the hip joint, that that arthritis was not an infectious arthritis but was an arthritis caused, exacerbated, and increased by reason of his injury." In granting the rehearing by order dated September 3, 1925, the commission accepted the petition therefor as a sufficient compliance with the third clause of subdivision (a) of section 65, above quoted, recited the fact that an operation had previously been ordered, including the treatment suggested by Dr. Markel, and directed, "the defendant having neglected to furnish said medical and surgical care, that applicant is entitled to secure said medical and surgical care from any competent physician and surgeon of his own selection, and that defendant will be liable for the reasonable value of said medical care, together with full compensation for the period of total disability caused by said medical care." The defendant, petitioner herein, sought a rehearing upon this latter order, which was denied. In view of the fact that the petitioner failed to obey the order of the commission in the first instance, and no findings were filed with the order terminating payments, we think the petition for rehearing was sufficient, and that the commission acted within its jurisdiction in granting it.

[3, 4] The second point presented by petitioner is that the commission acted in excess of its jurisdiction in awarding upon rehearing an "increased compensation" over that originally fixed, without evidence tending to show any increase of disability as required by section 20 (d) of the act in question. We think that under the circumstances presented an increase of the award was authorized. The finding supporting the first order was that the employee had sustained a permanent partial disability, and for this he was awarded $8.65 per week, and the employer was required to furnish treatments and care of a physician, including a necessary operation. The finding upon which the supplemental order was based, and which finding resulted from the taking of additional evidence concerning the then condition of the employee, the unsuccessful attempts to work since the making of the first order, and the failure of the employer to furnish the treatment as required, was that the employee was then under a temporary total disability. With this change in the condition of the employee it was entirely proper and obviously necessary that the commission should allow a greater compensation than before, and the amount was therefore increased to $17.29 per week. It is quite possible that the failure of the employer to supply the treatments at first required was in part or wholly responsible for the change in the condition of the employee for the worse. But without regard to the cause of the change, it is enough that conditions were so altered as to justify, in the opinion of the commission, the increased compensation. As was said in National Engineering Corp. v. Industrial Accident Comm., 193 Cal. 422, 427, 225 P. 2, 4, having reopened the case, the commission had jurisdiction "to take further testimony and make such disposition of the matter as should be warranted by the facts developed on such re-examination."

[5] The court is not concerned with the process of reasoning whereby the Industrial Accident Commission may arrive at its conclusions. So long as it shall act within its jurisdiction, and its award is not unreasonable, it must be affirmed.

> "The underlying principle upon which the Workmen's Compensation Act rests is, as its title indicates, the providing of compensation to an employee for injuries resulting from his employment. It emanates from the economic thought that personal injury losses incident to an industry are a part of the costs of production to be borne, just as the depreciation and replacement of a machine is borne, by the industry itself, which compensation will be included in the cost of the product of the industry. Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 P. 398." Union Iron Works v. Industrial Accident Comm., 190 Cal. 33, 39, 210 P. 410, 413.

The losses incident to the industry in the instant case consisted of the expenses of sustenance of the injured employee, and of medical and surgical treatment. We cannot say that the method of compensation or the amount as determined by the commission was in excess of its jurisdiction.

[6] The petitioner asserts that the original award was so uncertain as to the amount of allowance for the operation, the services to be performed, and to whom it should be paid, that it was unenforceable. Dr. Markel testified that he would favor an operation; "immobilization, putting a bone graft across the sacro-iliac joint, known as the Smith-Peterson operation"; "it takes a good many months after such an operation, but it ought to give him a cure. If, however, the sacralized transverse processes were found to be absolutely at fault, they could be cut off." The original award directed that petitioner furnish the applicant with further treatment "as indicated in the testimony of Dr. H. H. Markel." The expenses of such on operation could not, perhaps, be determined in advance, but the procedure in such cases was outlined in Grand Union Hotel v. Industrial Accident Comm., 67 Cal. App. 123, 125, 226 P. 948. In that case the operation had not been performed at the time of the hearing, but it was stipulated that the employer would defray the expense if finally determined to be liable therefor. The employee was compelled to enter a hospital on his own account, and though the operation bills for medical services were submitted to the employer, who declined to pay them. A hearing was thereupon called, evidence introduced, and an order allowing supplemental medical expenses was made, which was affirmed. The reasonable cost of the operation need not, in the instant case, have been fixed in advance, nor was it necessary that the name of the hospital be determined at the time of the first hearing, as a condition precedent to the making of an award. The award was not therefore functus officio because this was not done.

[7] It is further contended that the decision of the commission was void because there was no evidence tending to support the finding that in view of the conditions of the open labor market the employee's injury caused temporary total disability continuing from August 28, 1924, indefinitely. As we have seen, even granting petitioner the most favorable view of the question by accepting the report of Dr. Gillis, who intimated in substance that, although the employee was incapacitated, some sort of employment might enable him to forget his distress, it appears therefrom that Spanovich was utterly unable to compete in the open labor market for any kind of means of livelihood. The inevitable conclusion is that he was, at least temporarily, totally disabled.

[8, 9] Another contention advanced by petitioner is that the finding of temporary total disability from August 28, 1924, indefinitely, is inconsistent with the original finding of temporary partial disability from September 30, 1923, indefinitely. This argument furnishes its own answer, since admittedly the commission decided that the temporary disability was indefinite. At the time of the first award it appeared that the employee was temporarily partially disabled, but such finding was, of necessity, based upon the showing as of that date, in anticipation of an operation. Upon rehearing it appeared without conflict that no operation had been performed, that the employee had been unable to do any remunerative work, and was therefore totally disabled from August 28, 1924—a year later than the showing of partial disability. We think the question is appropriately met by the language used in Grand Union Hotel v. Industrial Accident Comm., 67 Cal. App. 123, 128, 226 P. 948, 949:

> "It is true, of course, that supplemental awards may not be used for the purpose of correcting errors in the original award (Georgia Casualty Co. v. Industrial Accident Comm. [177 Cal. 289, 170 P. 625] supra; McBride v. Industrial Accident Comm. [182 Cal. 407, 187 P. 1050] supra), and if the expenses in dispute here had been incurred prior to the submission of the case to the Industrial Accident Commission, but, nevertheless, through error, said commission had failed to make an allowance therefor, or if applicant had neglected to prove such expenses before the commission, although they had occurred prior to the date of the hearing, no supplemental award could have accomplished the purpose of correcting the error. But in the present case, the decision having reference only to the facts as they existed at the date of the submission of the case to the Industrial Accident Commission, the expenses incurred later and the conditions which occurred later making such expenses necessary constituted such a change in the situation of the injured man as to empower the commission to do justice by him under the provisions of section 20 (d) of the act. Any other construction of the act would be contrary to its spirit and would result in hardship and injustice to an applicant without fault on his part."

Petitioner incidentally asserts that past errors were attempted to be corrected in the instant case, but there is no evidence of the commission having committed, or attempted to correct, error. Admitting for the sake of argument that the order terminating payments was erroneous because the whole record was not considered, yet the award under consideration was not made to rectify error, but was granted pursuant to rehearing. It was not supplemental to the order terminating payments. The order itself was subject to a petition for rehearing during the period of 20 days.

The writ is discharged and the award affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Action to foreclose mechanics' liens by the Fraters Glass & Paint Company and others against the Southwestern Construction Company and others. Judgment in favor of defendants Patten against the named plaintiff, and it appeals. Affirmed.

G. C. De Garmo and H. B. Cornell, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Appellant, Fraters Glass & Paint Company, a corporation, and others brought this action to foreclose certain mechanics' liens filed by them to secure payment of claims for labor and materials furnished in the construction of a building in the city of Los Angeles, the complaint containing several counts. Although the contractor and the owner were joined as parties defendant with respondents Henry S. and F. W. Patten, who were the sureties on the materialmen's bond given pursuant to section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, liability for the payment of appellant's claim, which alone constitutes the subject of this appeal, was urged solely against respondents, and judgment was awarded in their favor.

The bond provided in part that:

> "* * * All such persons (for whose benefit the same was given) shall have and are given a right of action to recover upon this bond against the said principal and sureties, or either of them, in any suit brought to foreclose mechanics' liens, which may be filed by such persons, or any of them, upon the property mentioned in said contract, or in a separate suit brought upon this bond, and may recover in such action or actions the value of such labor done or materials furnished, or both. * * *"

The total amount for which appellant sued, including a small item of cost incurred in filing the lien, was $5,142. Respondents denied liability to the extent of $4,000, upon the ground that they were induced to become sureties on said bond under an agreement with appellant to the effect that the latter would waive recourse against them for the payment of the sum last mentioned. Upon the issues of fact raised by this defense the trial court found in respondents' favor as follows:

> "That as a part of the consideration for their entering into the undertaking mentioned in paragraph V of said plaintiff's complaint, and as an inducement to said defendants Henry S. Patten and F. W. Patten to execute said undertaking, said plaintiff Fraters Glass & Paint Company did on the 26th day of April, 1921, and prior to the signing of said undertaking by said defendants, execute and deliver to said defendants an agreement in the words and figures following, to wit: 'April 26, 1921. Mr. Henry Patten, Patten & Davies Lumber Co., Los Angeles, California—Dear Sir: In connection with the contract between the Southwestern Construction Company and E. B. Rivers, for a building at Seventh and Central, we agree to furnish glass as arranged with Harry E. Martin, to cost approximately $4,000, and to wait 35 days after the completion of said building for payment of same, waiving our lien rights. We are doing this, of course, to help Mr. Martin in this deal and are confident that it will be carried to a successful completion. Very truly yours, Fraters Glass & Paint Co., by J. A. Fraters, Pres.,' and that defendants relied thereon in executing said undertaking. That it was the intent and purpose of the said plaintiff, by the execution of said writing, to relieve said defendants of the burden of the said undertaking to the extent of the said sum of $4,000 therein mentioned, and that it did thereby waive recourse on said defendants to the extent of said sum of $4,000, the balance due said plaintiff from the Southwestern Construction Company."

[1] Superseded by opinion of Supreme Court, see 254 P. 1097.

From the facts thus found the court held that appellant was not entitled to any lien or to recover from these respondents any sum of money whatever, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The sole question presented by the appeal is, as appellant states it, whether, by the execution of the agreement set forth in the findings, "appellant intended to and did waive, not only its right to file and foreclose a mechanics' lien, but also its right to recover from the sureties on the contractor's bond," appellant claiming in this respect that notwithstanding that it may have waived its right to file and foreclose a lien, it retained a right of recovery against the sureties under the provisions of the bond (General Electric Co. v. American Bonding Co., 180 Cal. 675, 182 P. 444); and that such was the intent and effect of its agreement.

[1, 2] The case of Balfour v. Fresno C. & I. Co., 109 Cal. 221, 41 P. 876, quotes approvingly the following language from a case decided in another jurisdiction:

> "The true interpretation of every instrument being manifestly that which will make the instrument speak the intention of the party at the time it was made, it has always been considered an exception, or perhaps a corollary, to the general rule above stated, that when any doubt arises upon the true sense and meaning of the words themselves, or any difficulty as to their application under the surrounding circumstances, the sense and meaning of the language may be investigated and ascertained by evidence dehors the instrument itself,"

—following which our Supreme Court said:

> "For the purpose of determining what the parties intended by the language used, it is competent to show not only the circumstances under which the contract was made, but also to prove that the parties intended and understood the language in the sense contended for; and for that purpose the conversation between and declarations of the parties during the negotiations at and before the time of the execution of the contract may be shown. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1860, 1861; (City of) Atlanta v. Schmeltzer, 83 Ga. 609 (10 S. E. 543); Keller v. Webb, 125 Mass. 88, 28 Am. Rep. 209; Long v. Long, 44 Mo. App. 141; Swett v. Shumway, 102 Mass. 365, 3 Am. Rep. 471."

[3] In view of the ambiguity arising from the agreement involved in the instant case by reason of the use therein of the words "waiving our lien rights," it was necessary and proper for the trial court, under the rules above mentioned, to receive extrinsic evidence for the purpose of showing the circumstances under which the language of said agreement was used, and applying it according to the intentions of the parties. It appears that such evidence was adduced, from which, as well as from the terms of the agreement itself, the court determined as a fact that:

> "It was the intent and purpose of the said plaintiff, by the execution of said writing, to relieve said defendants of the burden of said undertaking to the extent of the sum of $4,000. * * *"

This finding, which is evidently the controlling one in the case, is binding on appeal, unless appellant has shown by the record that the same is not supported by the evidence. This the appellant has failed to do.

[4, 5] The record upon which the appeal is taken does not purport to contain any of the evidence. It consists merely of a "stipulation of facts" setting forth the execution and the copies of the bonds upon which appellant is seeking to recover, together with a statement of the manner in which the money received by the contractor for the performance of the work was deposited and disbursed, and concludes:

> "It is further stipulated that the foregoing matter be settled as a bill of exceptions."

The trial court attached thereto the following certificate:

> "The foregoing stipulation of facts is hereby settled and allowed as a bill of exceptions and the clerk is hereby instructed to file the same, provided, however, that it is to be noted that the foregoing are not all of the materials, facts, (doubtless meaning material facts) or evidence in the case. [Signed] Elliot Craig, Judge. Dated May 3, 1923." (Italics ours.)

As above indicated said stipulation contained none of the extrinsic evidence above alluded to nor any specification of insufficiency thereof. In that state of the record it is beyond the power of this court to interfere with the trial court's findings. To charge in the brief merely, as appellant has done, that respondents have "failed to sustain the burden resting upon them, of showing that it was the intention of the parties that plaintiff should waive all rights of recovery except as against the contractor," and also that surrounding circumstances as shown by the record do not tend to support the theory that appellant intended to waive all rights and claims against the sureties, is not enough. Appellant is required to point out in the record evidence or lack of evidence showing that the finding assailed is not supported by evidence (Robben v. Benson, 43 Cal. App. 204, 185 P. 200); and in the absence of any transcript of the evidence or bill of exceptions containing the same, or specifying the insufficiency thereof, it will be presumed that the evidence adduced was competent and material to the issues, was received without objection, and was sufficient to sustain the facts found (2 Cal. Jur. 877; Cooney v. Gray, 49 Cal. App. 664, 194 P. 61, citing cases; Shuken v. Cohen, 179 Cal. 279, 176 P. 447).

The judgment is affirmed.

CASHIN, J. A petition for a peremptory writ of mandate, directing the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to dismiss an action therein pending, in which petitioners and another not a party to this proceeding are defendants. According to the averments of the petition—which are not denied—the action was commenced on December 31, 1910, against all persons claiming an interest in or lien upon several pieces of real property therein described, including a lot or parcel known as Emmet place. The answers of defendants were filed on March 11, 1911, admitting plaintiff's claim of ownership and his right to the possession of the land described other than Emmet place, which was alleged to be an open public highway or street, over which defendants claimed rights of way to and from adjoining lots owned by them.

The cause was tried on July 17, 1913, and a decree entered on November 29, 1913, adjudging the plaintiff to be the owner of all the lands described in the complaint, with the exception of Emmet place, and as to the latter that he was the owner of the westerly 39 feet thereof, but that the whole thereof was subject to rights of way thereover in all the defendants mentioned, and further adjudging this parcel to be a public street or alley. Thereafter, upon motion by plaintiff, a new trial of the action was granted, and the order therefor entered on October 18, 1916. No further action was taken therein by any of the parties until September 24, 1925, when a notice of motion to dismiss, upon the ground that plaintiff had failed for more than five years to prosecute the action or bring the same to trial, was served and filed by defendants. On September 28, 1925, plaintiff filed his motion to set the cause for trial, following which the motion to dismiss was denied, and that by plaintiff granted.

In addition to the usual prayer for relief, the petition contains the further prayer that "petitioners have such further or different relief as, the premises being considered, shall to the court seem meet and proper." It appears that between the date of the entry of the order granting a new trial and the filing of the motion to dismiss approximately nine years elapsed, during which no trial of the action was had or stipulation made extending the time therefor.

In opposition to the motion to dismiss an affidavit by plaintiff was filed, alleging that since the construction of what is known as the Stockton street tunnel Emmet place is several feet above the level of Stockton street, to which it formerly gave access, and can now serve no public purpose or convenience; that Mary J. Kelly, one of the original defendants, and who owned one of the lots abutting on Emmet place, for the benefit of which a right of way thereover is claimed, died on March 18, 1916, and that her estate is in course of administration; that plaintiff had from time to time negotiated with her administrator for the purchase of the lot last mentioned, such negotiations having as yet been unsuccessful, with the intention upon its purchase to apply to the city and county of San Francisco for the relinquishment of its claimed right over Emmet place and the abandonment of the latter as a public street or alley.

It is not claimed that the negotiations mentioned led plaintiff to believe that defendants, or any of them, consented to an extension of the time for trial, or thereby or otherwise waived any right given by statute to move for a dismissal. It is contended by respondent that, the action having been once tried within five years after the filing of the answers, the mandatory provisions of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure had no application; that the granting or denial of the motion was therefore within the sound discretion of the court; that, the action being one to quiet the title to lands in which the defendants claimed no interest other than as to the one parcel mentioned, the motion was properly denied; and that, the alternative writ having required a dismissal of "the action," a peremptory writ directing a dismissal as to such parcel or of the action as to petitioners—the administrator mentioned not having joined in this proceeding—cannot be granted.

[1-3] In City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, 185 Cal. 405, 197 P. 79, a proceeding in mandamus to compel the dismissal of an action, five years having elapsed since the filing of the answer, it was contended by the respondent that, it appearing that the period had been extended by stipulation, which extension had also expired, the effect of the stipulation was to render the mandatory provisions of the section no longer applicable. In granting the writ the court held that the mandatory force of the statute was not destroyed by such extension, nor the right of a defendant to a dismissal after the extended period thereby affected. While the provisions of the section do not literally apply to the facts of the instant case, the statute is remedial in character, and should receive a construction, due regard being had to the language in which it is expressed, which will bring within its scope every case within its spirit and policy. As was said in Johnston v. Baker, 167 Cal. 260, 139 P. 86, the statute must be construed with reference to the object to be accomplished by it, and in City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, supra, where, as here, the respondent urged that a literal and restrictive interpretation be given to the section, whatever is necessarily implied in a statute is as much a part of it as that which is expressed, and the statute must be construed with reference to the purpose to be served by it, and, when the intention of a statute is plainly discernible from its provisions that intention is as obligatory as the letter of the statute, and will even prevail over its strict letter.

It was the intention of the Legislature to cover by this section the entire subject of dismissals for failure to bring an action to trial after answer filed (Romero v. Snyder, 167 Cal. 216, 138 P. 1002), the purpose of the statute being to prevent unreasonable delay in the determination of causes at issue both as a matter of public policy and of private concern to the litigants (City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, supra; Bell v. Solomons, 162 Cal. 105, 109, 121 P. 377).

[4] The failure to bring an action to trial within the maximum period fixed by the provisions of the section, whether such period follows the filing of an answer or the entry of an order granting a new trial, results in either event in a delay in the determination of the cause which it was the purpose of the statute to prevent. In view of this purpose, and the aim of the Legislature to make full provision therein for the dismissal of causes at issue wherein such delays occur, the intention that its mandatory provisions should, in the absence of an extension by stipulation, apply to cases where the delay follows the granting of a new trial is clearly implied therefrom.

That defendants claim no interest in the land described in the complaint, other than to the one parcel mentioned, though a fact to be considered in a case involving the discretionary power of the court (Herman v. Pacific Jute Mfg. Co., 131 Cal. 210, 63 P. 344; Ferris v. Wood, 144 Cal. 426, 77 P. 1037; Merced Bank et al. v. Price, 145 Cal. 436, 78 P. 949), where the case is one within the mandatory provisions of the statute a dismissal for lack of prosecution is without regard to the merits of the cause (Bell v. Solomons, 162 Cal. 105, 109, 121 P. 377; City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, supra); and where, as here, according to the construction given the section, its mandatory provisions apply the court was without discretion to refuse an order of dismissal (Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670; Andersen v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 95, 200 P. 963; City of Los Angeles v. Superior Court, supra; Ravn v. Planz, 37 Cal. App. 735, 174 P. 690).

[5, 6] That the administrator of the estate of the deceased defendant did not join in this proceeding does not affect the right of petitioners to relief. It is shown by the petition and the exhibits attached thereto that a dismissal was moved by all the defendants; and while the alternative writ required a dismissal of "the action," which here the administrator has not sought, as was said in Larkin v. Superior Court, supra, the rule requiring a peremptory writ to conform to the alternative writ (Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 P. 540) "is not an iron-bound one, to be enforced by a court regardless of circumstances, but is one to be applied in consonance with principles of fairness and justice."

It appearing that the motion as to all the defendants should have been granted, and that the trial court would be compelled to dismiss the action as to petitioners, either of its own motion or on their motion hereafter made, and that the proceeding may be regarded as one wherein relief to the extent that petitioners are beneficially interested is sought, the fact that the alternative writ required a dismissal of "the action" does not preclude the court from granting the relief to which petitioners are entitled. Larkin v. Superior Court, supra; State ex rel. Babcock v. Chisago County, 115 Minn. 6, 131 N. W. 792, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 669; People ex rel. Keene v. Queens County, 142 N. Y. 271, 36 N. E. 1062.

A peremptory writ of mandate, requiring the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to enter an order dismissing said action as to petitioners, is granted.

PEOPLE v. WAGNER. (Cr. 893.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 22, 1926.)

1. Burglary ⚷41(1).

Evidence held to sustain conviction for burglary in the second degree.

2. Criminal law ⚷1202(1)—Indictment and Information ⚷114.

To sustain a judgment as habitual criminal under Pen. Code, § 644, indictment or information must charge it and defendant be given opportunity to plead or make defense thereto.

3. Criminal law ⚷1202(7).

Where on conviction of burglary in second degree defendant was erroneously adjudged habitual criminal, judgment will be modified by striking therefrom erroneous portion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

George Wagner was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and he appeals. Modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

Donald McKisick and J. S. Daly, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the second degree upon an information charging as follows:

> "The said George Wagner on or about the 1st day of April, A. D. 1925, in the said county of Sacramento, in the said state of California, and before the filing of this information, did then and there willfully, unlawfully, feloniously and burglariously enter the building used as a restaurant by one P. Koris at 1418 J. street, in the city of Sacramento, in said county of Sacramento, with the felonious intent then and there to commit the crime of larceny, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

From the testimony of the defendant during the course of the trial it developed that the defendant had suffered two previous convictions, and the court in pronouncing sentence adjudged the defendant an habitual criminal under the terms and provisions of section 644 of the Penal Code. From the judgment of the court, the defendant appeals and assigns two grounds of error: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to warrant the conviction of the defendant; and (2) that the judgment adjudging the defendant an habitual criminal is erroneous, in that there was no pleading charging the defendant with prior convictions.

[1] Upon the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence, the only matter called to the attention of the court is the alleged absence of a scar on the defendant's head. The circumstances attending the offense for which the defendant was convicted are set forth as follows: About 10 o'clock at night on April 1, 1925, the defendant and one other person were discovered attempting to break into a restaurant on J. street in the city of Sacramento. An alarm being given, officers arrived and observed a short man standing inside the restaurant near the cash register, but before he could be arrested this man emerged from the front door of the restaurant, crossed the street, and was followed by an officer named Kaminsky. The officer overtook the short man just as he started to climb a fence in an alley between I. and J. streets in said city, and in the scuffle that ensued the officer struck the defendant over the left ear with his revolver. This short man then grappled with Officer Kaminsky, succeeded in taking away the officer's revolver and making his escape. A blood-stained cap was found thereafter near the Western Pacific track. On the back porch of the restaurant was also found a coat with the name of G. Wagner on a label in one of the pockets. The defendant was identified by Kaminsky as the man with whom he had had the struggle in the alley. Upon the trial, the defendant exhibited his head to the jury to show that he had no scar. To rebut this evidence, the prosecution introduced the testimony of Dr. Binkley to the effect that there had been a scar on defendant's head about the middle of May succeeding the date of the offense. As opposed to the testimony of Dr. Binkley, appellant cites Ogstrom Lectures, Med. Jur. 425, Taylor on Medical Jurisprudence, p. 333, and Herold on Manual of Legal Medicine, p. 305, to the effect, "that if, on examining a part, where at some previous time a stab, cut or burn involving the cutis is alleged to have been inflicted, we find no mark or cicatrix, it is fair to assume that the allegation is false, and that no wound, has been inflicted." Admitting that the authors referred to were eminent physicians and surgeons, it is only necessary to state that their opinions set forth in medical treatises constituted no evidence in this case, and if the jury believed the testimony of the witnesses to which we have referred, the verdict is amply supported.

[2, 3] Section 644, Penal Code, provides:

> "Every person convicted in this state of any felony, who shall previously have been twice convicted, whether in this state or elsewhere, of the crime of robbery, burglary, rape with force and violence, arson or any of them, shall be adjudged to be an habitual criminal and shall be punished by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for not less than ten years."

The information in this case charges no prior convictions. Section 969 of the Penal Code sets forth the procedure which must be followed in charging prior convictions. Section 1025 of the Penal Code sets forth the procedure that shall be had when the defendant is arraigned upon an information charging a prior conviction, and section 1093 of the same Code the procedure to be followed upon such an indictment or information when the trial of the defendant is begun.

In People v. Coleman, 145 Cal. 609, 79 P. 283, it is held that previous conviction is a question of fact, which must be both pleaded and proven, or, which is the same thing, pleaded in the information and admitted by the defendant. To the same effect is the case of People v. King, 64 Cal. 338, 30 P. 1028, People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 63, 87 P. 384, 389, and 16 C. J. 1342. A number of additional authorities might be cited, but the necessity of such pleading is unquestioned in this state, and the foregoing authorities set forth the rule prevailing in California. Section 644 of the Penal Code was added in 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 237), and does not appear to have received interpretation by any court of appeal in this state. We think the same rule applies where it is sought to adjudge a defendant an habitual criminal as where additional punishment is sought to be inflicted by charging a prior conviction. In the case of People v. Rosen, 208 N. Y. 169, 101 N. E. 855, the Court of Appeals of the state of New York, in a case which was brought to it from the Supreme Court holding that prior convictions need not be charged in the information in order to support a judgment adjudging a defendant guilty as an habitual criminal, under a statute similar to ours, reversed the Supreme Court as to this holding and modified the judgment of the trial court by eliminating or striking therefrom that portion of the judgment adjudging the defendant guilty as an habitual criminal, and in so holding decided as follows:

> "Under the law providing that a person who, after conviction within this state of a felony, or an attempt to commit a felony, commits any crime within this state [stating the times of conviction necessary] shall be punishable therefor by an added penalty, the prior conviction is such an element of the second offense that, in order to support a sentence for the severer punishment, it must be charged in the indictment; and information thereof developed on the examination of the accused before sentence, * * * is not sufficient."

We think that the reasoning of the Court of Appeals upon a similar statute is applicable here, and that in order to sustain a judgment as an habitual criminal it is necessary that the indictment or information charge the same and the defendant be given an opportunity to plead thereto, or make defense to such charge. We think also that the procedure followed by the Court of Appeals of the state of New York should be followed here, and it is therefore ordered that the judgment be modified by striking therefrom all that portion adjudging the defendant to be an habitual criminal, and, as so modified, the judgment stands affirmed.

HIROSHIMA v. BANK OF ITALY.
(Civ. 3026.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 14, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 12, 1926.)

1. Banks and banking 🔑154(5).

In action against bank for paying check on which payment was stopped, allegations showing money on deposit, issuance of check, notice to stop payment thereof, payment of check, demand for the money, and its nonpayment, with prayer for its recovery, stated a cause of action without alleging damage.

2. Pleading 🔑72.

Code Civ. Proc. § 426, stating that, if recovery of money or damages be demanded, the amount thereof must be stated in the complaint, requires a statement of either the sum demanded or the amount of damages, not both.

3. Banks and banking 🔑154(7).

In action against bank for paying check on which payment was stopped, whether there was consideration between drawer of check and payee held immaterial.

4. Banks and banking 🔑139.

While relation between bank and depositor is that of creditor and debtor, bank is subject to orders of depositor in relation to payment of his check, whether or not payee is a holder in due course.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

5. Banks and banking 🔑139.

As a general rule, the drawer of an uncertified check can stop payment at any time before the bank's acceptance of the check, and the bank has no right to pay the check after notice thereof.

6. Bills and notes 🔑22.

Stopping payment of a check does not discharge the liability of the drawer to the holder.

7. Banks and banking 🔑154(7).

In action to recover from bank amount of check paid after payment was stopped, evidence that check was given in payment for restaurant, that payee took and retained possession thereof, and that there had been no payment therefor, except by check, was properly excluded.

8. Assignments 🔑49.

Negotiable Instruments Law does not conflict or modify the rule that a check is not an assignment, nor Civ. Code, § 3265e, so declaring.

9. Banks and banking 🔑139.

Lack of consideration for agreement, in notice to stop payment of check, to release bank from all liability for noncompliance with notice, renders such agreement not binding on the maker.

10. Banks and banking 🔑139.

Bank, which paid check after being given notice to stop payment, without exercising ordinary or reasonable care, is liable, though maker agreed to release bank from liability in case of payment.

11. Banks and banking 🔑154(8)—Evidence held to show mistake of fact, rendering agreement of drawer of check to release bank from liability for payment of check on which payment had been stopped not binding (Civ. Code, § 1577).

Testimony that drawer of check was unable to read English, that notice to stop payment thereon was not read to him, and that he was told he must sign to stop payment, held to show a mistake of fact, within Civ. Code, § 1577, so that agreement in such notice to release defendant from liability in case of payment was not binding.

12. Banks and banking 🔑139.

Notice to stop payment of check may be verbal, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1667, 1668, 1670, and hence written notice thereafter is merely additional identification of the check.

13. Banks and banking 🔑139—Provision of notice to stop payment of check that drawer released bank from all liability by reason of compliance or noncompliance therewith held contrary to public policy and void; "public policy."

Provision of notice to stop payment of a check, releasing bank from all liability by reason of compliance or noncompliance therewith, was contrary to public policy and void; "public policy" being the principle that no person can lawfully do what tends to injure the public, or is against the public good, etc.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by H. Hiroshima against the Bank of Italy to recover money paid on a check, payment of which had been ordered stopped. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Ferrari and J. J. Posner, both of San Francisco, and McLaughlin & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Henry & Bedeau, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Plaintiff had judgment in an action against the defendant for negligently paying the amount of a check upon which payment had been ordered stopped, from which judgment the defendant appeals.

Omitting the formal parts, the complaint contains the following allegations:

"That the plaintiff on the 18th day of November, 1924, had on deposit in said bank operated and conducted in said city of Sacramento by the defendant the sum of $823.31, or thereabouts. On said 18th day of November, 1924, plaintiff drew a check against said account on deposit in said defendant's bank in favor of one M. Yamakita in the sum of $436.50; said check being postdated November 27, 1924. After the drawing and delivery of said check to said M. Yamakita, and before the same was presented to and paid by the defendant, to wit, on November 20, 1924, the plaintiff notified and instructed defendant not to pay said check when presented, and to stop payment on the same, which the defendant then and there agreed to do.

"That the defendant, contrary to said agreement hereinabove set forth, negligently and carelessly, on the 29th day of November, 1924, paid said check in full upon the same being presented by one S. Fujita, sometimes known as S. Yamakita, to whom said check had been indorsed by said M. Yamakita, as plaintiff is informed and believes. That after the payment of said check said defendant deducted and withdrew from the account of this plaintiff said sum of $436.50, and debited his account with that sum. That plaintiff has demanded of the defendant, on numerous occasions prior to the filing of this complaint, the payment and return to him of said sum of $436.50, but the said defendant refused and still refuses to do so. That by reason of the foregoing there is now due, owing, and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff the sum of $436.50.

"Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment against defendant for the sum of $436.50, for interest on said sum as is allowed by law, for his costs of suit herein expended, and for such other, further, and different relief as to the court may seem just."

To this complaint the defendant demurred, setting forth several grounds, of which the following only are urged on appeal: That said complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that the complaint is uncertain, in that it does not appear, nor can it be ascertained therefrom, whether Yamakita was or was not a holder in due course, whether or not plaintiff had been damaged by the payment of the check, whether or not plaintiff received full value as a consideration for his delivery of said check to the payee, Yamakita.

The defendant's demurrer being overruled, the answer was filed, pleading the stop notice in hæc verba, to wit:

Statem't Clerk.

And also as a special defense pleaded in its answer as follows:

> "That said plaintiff, on or about the 18th day of November, 1924, purchased from M. Yamakita a restaurant located on K street in the city of Sacramento, state of California, and entered into, and has since remained, in the possession of said restaurant. That the check mentioned and described in paragraph III of the complaint herein was by plaintiff issued and delivered to said M. Yamakita in payment of the purchase price of said restaurant, and was accepted by said M. Yamakita as a full payment of said purchase price. That said M. Yamakita in the regular and due course of business indorsed, signed, and trasferred said check to S. Fujita, who paid to said M. Yamakita the amount of said check, and the payment thereof by defendant to said S. Fujita did not injure or damage the said plaintiff, who, at the time said check was received, and has ever since, and now has and retains the full value and consideration for said check."

In support of its demurrer, the appellant makes the following argument:

> "The most striking omission of the complaint is found in the absence of any allegation that plaintiff was damaged by the defendant's payment of plaintiff's check. The complaint purports to count upon a breach of the agreement not to pay a check, or upon a tort for the negligent or careless payment of said check. In either event the plaintiff should have alleged that he was damaged by the act complained of, or should have set forth how or in what manner he was damaged in the premises."

[1-4] A reference to section 426, Code of Civil Procedure, discloses a complete answer to the appellant's contention as to the sufficiency of the complaint. Here we have a statement of the facts constituting a cause of action in ordinary and concise language, to wit: The money on deposit, the issuance of the check, the giving of the stop notice and the failure of the defendant to observe the same, a demand for the money, a statement that it has not been paid, and the prayer of the complaint for the recovery of the money. The third subdivision of section 426, Code of Civil Procedure, requires a statement of either the sum of money sought to be recovered or the amount of damages, not both. The citation (8 Cal. Jur. 882) upon which the appellant relies to sustain his demurrer does not require anything further than is stated in the plaintiff's complaint. It is there said:

> "A demand of the relief which the plaintiff claims. If the recovery of money or damages be demanded, the amount thereof must be stated. * * * The rule is sustained in many decisions that a complaint which states the facts showing the plaintiff's damage, in a manner sufficient to sustain a judgment, and concludes with a prayer for damages in a named sum, is sufficient, though it fails to contain a formal allegation that plaintiff has been damaged in a stated amount."

Here the complaint alleged that the plaintiff had so much money on deposit in defendant's bank, that the defendant wrongfully paid out a certain sum thereof, and recovery of that sum is demanded. This constitutes all the facts necessary to show that plaintiff's money has been wrongfully paid out by the defendant. Any further allegations would be surplusage. Where the payment of a certain sum of money is alleged to have been wrongfuly made, the amount of damages suffered necessarily appears from the statement of the facts thus set forth. Whether there was or was not any consideration moving between the plaintiff and Yamakita for the issuance of the check is a matter entirely collateral to the issues presented to the trial court in this action, as to whether the defendant did or did not wrongfully pay out the plaintiff's money. While the relation between the bank and a depositor is that of creditor and debtor, yet for the purpose of paying the check it was subject to the orders of the plaintiff in relation to the payment of said check, irrespective of whether Yamakita was or was not a holder in due course.

The appellant further in its argument along this line cites the cases of Unaka National Bank v. Butler, 113 Tenn. 574, 83 S. W. 655, Usher v. Tucker, 217 Mass. 444, 105 N. E. 360, L. R. A. 1917F, 826, and Raesser v. National Exc. Bank, 112 Wis. 591, 88 N. W. 618, 56 L. R. A. 174, 88 Am. St. Rep. 979. The Unaka and Raesser Cases support the rule that, as against a holder in due course, the drawer of a check has no right to stop payment. The case of Usher v. Tucker, supra, does not support the rule, and has either been erroneously cited or incorrectly applied. In this state, where a check has been held to operate as an assignment of the funds in the bank, the two cases cited by the appellant would be authority; but such is not the case in California. Section 3265e, Civil Code, reads:

> "A check of itself does not operate as an assignment of any part of the funds to the credit of the drawer with the bank, and the bank is not liable to the holder, unless and until it accepts or certifies the check."

In line with this section we find the Supreme Court, in the case of Sneider v. Bank of Italy, 184 Cal. 595, 598, 194 P. 1021, 1022 (12 A. L. R. 993), thus states the law:

> "In this state a bank check is a direction by a creditor to a debtor for the disposition of funds, and it does not operate as an assignment of the funds themselves unless and until the bank accepts or certifies the check. Civ. Code, § 3265e. Consequently, the vitality of a check, at least where it has not been accepted or certified prior to the knowledge of the death of the depositor, ceases upon receipt of such knowledge by the bank, and a bank which pays such a check after knowledge of the death of the depositor is liable to the estate of the depositor. Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 169 [94 Am. St. Rep. 19, 66 P. 740, 71 P. 83]; 35 Ann. Cas. 443, note; 7 C. J. 702."

[5, 6] The rule followed in this state and the one followed by the great weight of authority is stated in 7 C. J. 701, as follows:

> "As a general rule, the drawer of an uncertified check can revoke his order for the payment of his funds, or in banking phraseology 'stop payment' at any time before the bank's acceptance of the check, and the bank is bound by such revocation, and has no right to pay the check after notice thereof."

The rule, as stated in Corpus Juris, is supported by authorities too numerous to be set forth herein. That the drawer is liable to the holder of the check for the consequences of his conduct in stopping payment is a different matter. This is the point which was considered in the case of Usher v. Tucker, 217 Mass. 443, 105 N. E. 360, L. R. A. 1916F, 826, erroneously cited by appellant as supporting a different rule. The court there said:

> "It is true that the drawer may stop the payment of the check, and as between him and the bank the latter in such case pays at its peril, but such an order cannot discharge the liability of the drawer to the payee or one holding under him. Where the payment has been stopped, as above stated, the relations between the drawer and the payee become the same as if the check had been dishonored and notice thereof given to the drawer. And hence the effect so far as respects the drawer is to change his conditional liability to one free from this condition, and his situation is like that of the maker of a promissory note."

In other words, in the case at bar, the drawee of the check, Yamakita, would have had the right to sue the plaintiff for any damages suffered by him by reason of the stopping of payment of the check. Stopping payment of a check does not discharge the liability of the maker to the holder, but the holder must look to the maker for his remedy. Edwards v. Guaranty, etc., Bank, 48 Cal. App. 787, 192 P. 324; Sneider v. Bank of Italy, 184 Cal. 599, 194 P. 1021, 12 A. L. R. 993; Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 169, 66 P. 740, 71 P. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19.

[7, 8] In relation to the special defense set up by the defendant, the record shows the following:

> "Q. Why did you give him the check? What for you give him the check? (Objected to on the ground that it was no concern of the bank. Objection sustained.)
> "Mr. McLaughlin: Now, in order to make my point clear, I don't know just what kind of procedure or legal deportment will do—I want to make my record—we offer to prove by this witness now on the stand, and by other witnesses here present, that this check was given by the plaintiff here in payment for a restaurant, and was the purchase price of the restaurant owned by M. Yamakita, and to whom the check was drawn; that Hiroshima entered in possession of the restaurant, and still remains in possession, and there has been no payment other than the check.
> "Mr. Henry: We make the same objection to the offer of proof.
> "Court: That would involve an independent controversy between these two men.
> "Mr. McLaughlin: We simply want to make a record of your honor's ruling on it.
> "Court: Very well, I will refuse your permission to make that proof."

In support of this offer the appellant again cites the case of Usher v. Tucker, supra, but, as we have seen, the Usher Case does not support any such rule of evidence as contended for by the appellant. It does support the rule that Yamakita would be entitled to prosecute an action against the plaintiff for the recovery of damages suffered by him. Any other rule would lead to trial of all outside and collateral matters between the plaintiff and Yamakita, as to whether the plaintiff had or had not received full value for his check, whether he had or had not been defrauded in the sale, whether he was induced to purchase the restaurant in question by fraudulent and deceitful practices, and, in fact, all other matters which might be inquired into in an action concerning the sale and purchase of the restaurant referred to, and the legality of such sale, and the liability of the plaintiff to pay therefor, and also the sum of money which he would be liable to pay. A mere statement of these facts is sufficient to show the correctness of the court's ruling. The bank is not interested in the check. It has no interest in the contract between the plaintiff and Yamakita. Its duty is simply to follow the order given by the drawer of the check. It has been held that a bank cannot decline payment of a check by setting up that it was given for an unlawful purpose. McCord v. Cal. Nat. Bank S. D. 96 Cal. 197, 31 P. 51; Morse on Banks and Banking (5th Ed.) §§ 317, 397, and cases there collated. The doctrine that payment cannot be stopped against a holder in due course is only true in those jurisdictions which hold that a check works an assignment of the funds. The cases cited by the appellant so holding are inapplicable here. It may be stated, also, that in the Unaka Case there was no attempt by the drawer to stop payment. In the Raesser Case the rule is followed that a check operates as an assignment of the funds of the depositor. We do not find anything in the Negotiable Instruments Law conflicting with or modifying the decisions of this state that a check is not an assignment, or that in any wise modifies or amends the provisions of section 3265e of the Civil Code heretofore cited.

[9-12] It is further urged by appellant that the words "the undersigned makes the foregoing request as an act of courtesy only, and hereby indemnifies you against, and releases you from all liability by reason of compliance or noncompliance therewith," contained in the stop notice absolutely releases the defendant from all liability. The transcript shows that the plaintiff went to the defendant bank and stated to the defendant that he wanted to stop payment on the check herein referred to. Whereupon the following conversation took place:

> "Q. What did you say? A. I say I want payment stopped.
> "Q. What did he say? A. He says, 'All right;' and he say, 'How much amount?'
> "Q. How much amount? A. And 'What is name?' I say, 'M. Yamakita; my check.' I give check M. Yamakita, and amount, $436.50, I think, and I want payment stopped. 'All right.' 'I can't write'—
> "Q. You can't write? A. No; and he says, 'Sign.'
> "Q. He gave you some paper? A. Yes; and he says, 'This paper there to sign name.'
> "Q. All right, he write down on some paper? A. Yes.
> "Q. And say, 'You must sign;' is that right? A. Yes; I no understand if I sign; I ask; he says, 'If you want payment stopped, you must sign,' and I understand, and I sign, that is all.
> 'Q. Can you read the English language? A. No; I can't read.
> "Q. You couldn't read, then, the paper that this man in the bank asked you to sign? A. No, sir. * * *
> "Mr. McLaughlin: I object, on the ground you can't impeach writing in that way. * * *
> "The Court: I will hear the evidence. * * *
> "Court: Go ahead; I will hear it.
> "Mr. Henry: What was the question?
> "Court: You asked if he read the English language, and he said he couldn't.
> "Mr. Henry: And that he therefore couldn't read the document that he signed.
> "Q. Could you read the paper that you signed? A. No; I can't read. He says, 'Sign;' that is all; I sign.
> "Q. Did anybody read it to you? A. No.
> "Q. This man in the bank, he no read it to you? A. No; he says, 'Sign.'"

The court found that the assent and signature to the stop notice were given by the plaintiff under the influence of mistake and misapprehension and unconscious ignorance of the fact that said instrument contained a provision relieving defendant of liability in the event that it failed to stop payment of the check. The court also found as a fact, and also drew as a conclusion of law, that the portion of the stop notice which we have quoted was against public policy and void; also that there was no consideration moving from defendant to plaintiff for the execution of said agreement; and also that the defendant, contrary to the notification and instruction of the plaintiff, heedlessly, negligently and carelessly and without exercising ordinary or reasonable care, paid the check upon which the stop notice was given, etc. Any one of these reasons would be sufficient to support the judgment. Wolfsen v. Smyer, 178 Cal. 775, 785, 175 P. 10; Moore v. Copp, 119 Cal. 429–436, 51 P. 630; Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 P. 186.

The testimony showing the conditions under which the stop notice was signed, the fact that the plaintiff was unable to read the English language, the fact that the stop notice was not read to the plaintiff, and that he was told that, if he wanted payment on the check stopped, "he must sign" the paper presented to him by the defendant, brings the case clearly within the provisions of section 1577, Civil Code. See Moore v. Copp, supra; Los Angeles Co. v. New Liverpool Co., 150 Cal. 21, 87 P. 1029. It may also be stated that there is nothing in the law which requires a stop notice to be in writing, and a verbal or oral notice, given by the plaintiff to the defendant prior to the signing of the stop notice, was sufficient to require the defendant to observe such directions, and the writing only aided in identifying the check upon which the stop notice was given.

[13] As to whether an agreenent is or is not contrary to public policy, we quote from 13 C. J. 424, § 360:

> "If an agreement binds the parties, or either of them, to do, or if the consideration is to do, something opposed to the public policy of the state or nation, it is illegal and absolutely void, however solemnly made. It is not easy to give a precise definition of public policy. It is perhaps correct to say that public policy is that principle of law which holds that no person can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public, or against the public good, which may be designated, as it sometimes has been, the policy of the law or public policy in relation to the administration of the law. Where a contract belongs to this class it will be declared void, although in the particular instance no injury to the public may have resulted. In other words, its validity is determined by its general tendency at the time it is made, and if this is opposed to the interest of the public it will be invalid, even though the intent of the parties was good and no injury to the public would result in the particular case."

Section 1668 of the Civil Code reads:

> "All contracts which have for their object, directly or indirectly, to exempt any one from responsibility for his own fraud, or willful injury to the person or property of another, or violation of law, whether willful or negligent, are against the policy of the law."

Section 1670, Civil Code, reads:

> "Every contract by which the amount of damage to be paid, or other compensation to be made, for a breach of an obligation, is determined in anticipation thereof, is to that extent void, except as expressly provided in the next section."

The next section refers to cases where liquidated damages may be agreed upon where actual damages would be incapable or difficult of ascertainment.

It is not necessary to state that compliance by the defendant with a direction to stop payment of the check is not in law merely an act of courtesy. It is a bounden duty of a bank, when notified to stop payment, to use all reasonable efforts to comply with the directions so given. Compliance with one's obligations, while possibly courteously performed, is nothing more nor less than doing what one is under obligation to do. In the case at bar, immediately upon receipt of a verbal notice to stop payment of the check by the plaintiff, it became the legal duty of the defendant to comply therewith. The matter of the subsequent writing can at best be held nothing more nor less than additional identification of the check upon which notice to stop payment was given or being given. The wording of the stop notice which the plaintiff was induced to sign in the manner shown by the evidence, releases the defendant from all liability however negligent or otherwise. In other words, it simply purports to eliminate all the provisions of section 1668 of the Civil Code, and leaves the defendant free to follow the directions of the stop notice or not at its pleasure.

That such a writing, purporting to relieve the defendant of all liability or responsibility, is against public policy, scarcely requires argument. Under the provisions of section 1670, Civil Code, if an attempt had been made to limit the liability of the bank by fixing a definite sum of money, it would have been void, because the injury to the plaintiff, by reason of the negligence of the defendant, is readily capable of ascertainment, to wit, the amount of money wrongfully paid out, theretofore deposited by the plaintiff. Thus if the defendant and plaintiff could not under the law execute a valid contract limiting damages on account of negligence of the defendant in a definite sum, we do not very well see how the defendant could secure a valid release from all liability on account of subsequent negligent acts. As stated herein, the court expressly found the defendant careless and negligent in the matter and also that the defendant did not exercise ordinary or reasonable care. The sufficiency of the evidence to support this finding does not appear to be challenged by the appellant. That a verbal notice to stop payment is sufficient, see the case of People's Sav., etc., Trust Co. v. Lacy, 146 Ala. 688, 40 So. 346.[1]

The appellant cites the case of Tremont Trust Co. v. Burack, 235 Mass. 398, 126 N. E. 782, 9 A. L. R. 1067, where a provision in the stop notice read:

> "The undersigned agrees to hold the Tremont Trust Company harmless for said amount and for all expenses and costs incurred by it on account of refusing payment of said check and further agrees not to hold the Tremont Trust Company liable on account of payment contrary to this request if same occur through inadvertence or accident."

The court in the decision of that case stated:

> "It is manifest the quoted words were intended to exonerate the bank from the kind of negligence shown by the record, and we are unable to see anything illegal, or anything opposed to public policy, in a stipulation or agreement which relieves a bank so circumstanced from the results of the mere inattention, carelessness, oversightedness, or mistakes of its employees."

Whether the state of Massachusetts has a Code similar to ours has not been called to our attention; but, aside from that question, it is manifest that, if it be considered to be an agreement exonerating the defendant from all negligence in the observance of the stop notice, as was the attempt made in this case, the Massachusetts decision is not in harmony with our Code provisions, nor with the California cases, where attempts have been made to absolutely relieve the parties for any kind of negligent acts. Nor is the Massachusetts case in harmony with the decisions of other courts, which follow along the line of recent decisions by the courts of this state, when considering attempts to relieve oneself from negligence. In 3 R. C. L. 708, § 340, the rule is thus stated:

> "Notwithstanding a by-law of a savings bank which exempts the institution from liability for payments made to a person other than a depositor when the depositor's book is presented, and the depositor has given the bank no notice of the loss of the book, the bank is nevertheless liable for a payment to the wrong person, if by ordinary diligence it could have discovered the fraud and negligently failed to do so; this is so because public policy will not allow the bank to strip itself of responsibility by contract as to enable it safely to pay, intentionally or heedlessly, to one who has come into the possession of the pass book fraudulently or criminally."

See, also, Hough Ave. Sav. Bank v. Andersson, 78 Ohio St. 341, 85 N. E. 498, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 431, 125 Am. St. Rep. 707, 14 Ann. Cas. 479.

In the case of Elder v. Franklin Nat. Bank, 25 Misc. Rep. 716, 55 N. Y. S. 576, a provision in the stop notice in the following words was held void:

> "It is further agreed that the bank shall not be responsible for the execution of an order to stop payment of a check previously drawn; that the bank will endeavor to execute such orders, but that no liability shall be created by failure so to do; and that no rule, usage, or custom shall be construed to create such liability."

This case goes on to hold that it is against public policy to permit a bank to relieve itself from the consequences of its negligent acts, and is in harmony with the Code provisions of this state and the decisions of other courts to the effect that it is against public policy to permit agreements exempting one from his own negligence. Section 1667, Civil Code, provides that that is unlawful which is contrary to an express provision of law, contrary to the policy of express law, though not expressly prohibited, or otherwise contrary to good morals. In 13 C. J. 491, § 437, the rule in relation to exempting one self by contract from liability for negligence between the master and his servant is thus stated:

> "While it cannot be said that, without exception all contracts against liability for negligence are against public policy, the general rule is that it is against the policy of the law to permit a master to contract against liability for the negligence of his servants while acting within the scope of their employment. * * * Further, by the weight of authority, a master cannot, by agreement with his servant, exempt himself from liability for injuries to the servant caused by his negligence or by the negligence of those who, though engaged in the same service, are superior in authority and control."

In 6 R. C. L. 427, § 132, the reason why such provisions are against public policy is set forth:

> "Undoubtedly contracts exempting persons from liability for negligence induce a want of care, for the highest incentive to the exercise of due care rests in a consciousness that a failure in this respect will fix liability to make full compensation for any injury resulting from this cause. It has therefore been declared to be good doctrine that no person may contract against his own negligence."

In the case at bar, the banking public, as well as the particular individual who may be concerned in the giving of any stop notice, is interested in seeing that the bank is held accountable for the ordinary and regular performance of its duties, and also in seeing that directions in relation to the disposition of funds deposited in bank are not heedlessly, negligently, and carelessly disobeyed, and money paid out contrary to directions given. The case at bar is not one like that presented in Stephens v. S. P. Co., 109 Cal. 86, 41 P. 783, 29 L. R. A. 751, 50 Am. St. Rep. 17, where one of the contracting parties was at liberty to make a contract or not make it, but, if made, entered into upon such terms and conditions and limitations as it might elect. Here the bank had a definite and legal duty to perform. It does not present a case of election to enter into a contract, but an instance where the duty cannot be declined. It may also be added that the testimony shows the parties in this case were not contracting upon an equal basis. One was desirous of having money in the hands of the other held subject to his order and payment of a certain check stopped, and at the same time not able to read the writing to which his signature was demanded; the other had the funds in its possession, which the law made subject to the order of the depositor, and yet demanding the signature of the depositor to said writing waiving liability before it would undertake to perform its legal duty. In the case of Union Const. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 163 Cal. 298, 125 P. 242, the question of escaping liability for one's own negligence by contract is considered at length, and the cases upholding such contracts criticized, and the difficulty of reconciling such cases with the provisions of section 1668, Civil Code, pointed out and also the cases holding that such contracts are against public policy collected.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RAMBAUD. (Cr. 895.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 14, 1926. Rehearing Denied Aug. 13, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 7, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1166½(8)—Prejudice in disallowing challenge for cause of juror subsequently peremptorily challenged held not shown unless objectionable juror sat.

Error, if any, in disallowance of defendant's challenge for cause held not prejudicial, notwithstanding he exercised his peremptory challenges and exhausted all of them, where record failed to disclose that defendant had made appropriate objection to any sworn juror.

2. Criminal law 🔑1166½(6)—That prosecution was permitted to exercise peremptory challenges after defendant's had been exhausted held not prejudicial unless objectionable juror sat (Pen. Code, §§ 1088, 1404).

That prosecution was permitted to exercise peremptory challenges upon veniremen who had theretofore been passed for cause, and after the prosecution had declined to exercise, in turn, its peremptory challenges, violative of Pen. Code, § 1088, held not prejudicial, in view of section 1404, notwithstanding defendant had exhausted his peremptory challenges, where it did not appear any objectionable juror had been forced upon him.

3. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Departure from statutory procedure for selecting juror will not work reversal unless record shows a miscarriage of justice resulted (Pen. Code, § 1088; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Though procedure set forth in Pen. Code, § 1088, for selecting a juror should be followed, a departure therefrom cannot work a reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, unless it appears from the record that it has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

4. Rape 🔑51(1)—Defendant's statement that he was single and purpose of trip with ravished female was to get married held to show that parties were not married.

Evidence that defendant stated that he was going away with ravished female to get married and that purpose of their trip was to go somewhere to get married held sufficient to show she was not his wife.

5. Statutes 🔑118(6).

Act entitled, "An act to amend section 264 of the Penal Code, relating to the punishment of the crime of rape," held sufficient, as to title, under Const. art. 4, § 24.

6. Statutes 🔑107(3)—Statute entitled "punishment for rape," providing imprisonment in state prison except under one condition jury shall recommend imprisonment, held not violative of provision that act shall embrace but one subject, expressed in its title (Const. art. 4, § 24; Pen. Code, § 264, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271).

Pen. Code, § 264, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271, providing that rape is punishable in state prison, except when rape is on female under 18 years with her consent, under section 261, subd. 1, jury shall recommend imprisonment in county jail or state prison, provided that when defendant pleads guilty trial court shall fix punishment, held to embrace but one subject, pursuant to Const. art. 4, § 24, expressed in title, "punishment of rape."

7. Rape 🔑60—Statute providing for rape on female under 18 years without force jury may fix place of punishment is valid (Pen. Code, § 264, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271).

Legislature had right, when enacting 1923 amendment to Pen. Code, § 264 (St. 1923, p. 271), to eliminate words "over the age of 16 years" from said section, as amended in 1913 (St. 1913, p. 213), providing that when rape was on female "over the age of 16 years and under the age of 18 years" without force jury could fix punishment in county jail or state prison.

8. Statutes 🔑87—Statute fixing punishment for rape in state prison, except when rape is on female under 18 years without force jury shall fix place of imprisonment, held not bad as special legislation (Pen. Code, § 264, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271; Const. art. 4, § 25).

Pen. Code, § 264, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271, providing that rape is punishable in state prison, except when on female under 18 years without force jury shall recommend place of imprisonment, provided that when defendant pleads guilty trial court shall fix punishment, held not violative of Const. art. 4, § 25, prohibiting special legislation.

9. Criminal law 🔑1177—Court's refusal to follow jury's recommendation on place of imprisonment where rape was on female under 18 years with her consent held reversible error (Pen. Code, § 264, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271).

Under Pen. Code, § 264, as amended by St. 1923, p. 271, providing that when rape is on female under 18 years with her consent jury shall recommend whether imprisonment shall be in county jail or state prison, provided that when defendant pleads guilty trial court shall fix punishment, Legislature intended trial court to fix punishment only upon plea of guilty, and hence trial court's refusal to follow jury's recommendation, where rape was on female under 18 years with her consent, was reversible error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Louie Rambaud was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Sentence set aside, and cause remanded, with directions to resentence.

Langdon & Dexter, of Stockton, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was tried and convicted of the crime of rape on an information charging said offense under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, and appeals from the judgment.

Upon this appeal the defendant assigns the following grounds for reversal: (1) That the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant's challenge for cause in two instances; (2) that the court permitted the people to exercise peremptory challenges and excuse two prospective jurors after the defendant had exhausted his peremptory challenges; (3) that there is no evidence showing that Jennie Jackson, the rapee mentioned in the information, was not the wife of the defendant; and (4) that the court erred in refusing to follow the recommendations of the jury that the defendant be punished by confinement in the county jail and in sending the defendant to a state prison, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury.

[1] The record shows that upon voir dire examination two of the veniremen were challenged for cause by the defendant, that these challenges were denied by the court, and that thereafter the defendant excused both of the challenged veniremen by exercising his peremptory challenges. The record further shows that the defendant exhausted all of his peremptory challenges, but the record nowhere shows that any venireman was allowed to remain upon the panel and was sworn as a juror who had been challenged for cause or against whom the defendant had intimated the slightest objection. So far as the record shows, every one of the twelve jurors finally sworn to try the cause against the defendant was wholly and entirely acceptable, free from bias, and properly qualified to try the cause. Our attention has not been called to any objection urged by the defendant, or anything in the record whatever, intimating that the twelve jurors sworn to try the cause were not entirely satisfactory to the defendant. The only statement of counsel for the defendant in this particular is: "Our challenges are exhausted."

This situation does not present any reversible error. Whether the trial court should or should not have allowed the challenges for cause is wholly immaterial. The objectionable jurors were not sworn to try the case, and the defendant had just what he was entitled to, to wit, the judgment of twelve fully qualified jurors. While some of the earlier cases announce the rule that a disallowed challenge for cause will be considered upon appeal, under the circumstances here presented, all the later decisions and the ones which announce the correct rule hold against the appellant's contention. In 8 Cal. Jur. p. 610, we find the following:

> "The rule, as laid down in the later cases, is that an erroneous disallowance of a challenge for cause is not prejudicial, even though the defendant finally exhausted his peremptory challenges, if it does not appear that he had occasion to or desired to use an additional peremptory challenge, or that the jurors finally accepted were not entirely satisfactory to him. In the earlier cases there is authority to the contrary. To warrant a reversal it must appear that an objectionable juror was forced upon the defendant and that he in some appropriate manner expressed his dissatisfaction with the jury as completed."

See other cases there cited.

In People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 P. 920, the Supreme Court, in considering this question, says:

> "It is a rule of paramount importance that errors committed in overruling challenges for cause are not grounds of reversal, unless it be shown an objectionable juror was forced upon the challenging party after he had exhausted, his peremptory challenges; if his peremptory challenges remain unexhausted, so that he might have excluded the objectionable juror by that means he has no ground of complaint," —and then adds further:

> "But the fact that he does exhaust them does not preclude the application of the rule above quoted."

As was said in many of the cases, the important thing to be considered is whether the objectionable juror was forced upon the defendant and whether he had that to which he was entitled—a fair and impartial jury and not a jury composed of any particular individuals. People v. Johnson, 57 Cal. App. 391, 207 P. 281; People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 157 P. 599; People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 P. 920; People v. Troutman, 187 Cal. 313, 201 P. 928. Other cases might be cited to the same effect, but the list would only incumber the record.

[2] After the defendant had exhausted all of his peremptory challenges, the court permitted the prosecution to exercise peremptory challenges upon two veniremen who had theretofore been passed for cause, and after the prosecution had declined to exercise, in turn, its peremptory challenges, as set forth in section 1088 of the Penal Code, which specifies "first the people and then the defendant, may take a peremptory challenge, unless the parties' peremptory challenges are exhausted; and each party shall be entitled to have the panel full before exercising any peremptory challenges." Here again we are confronted with the situation previously considered. It does not appear that any objectionable juror was forced upon the defendant. Not the slightest intimation appears in the record of any dissatisfaction whatever relative to the jurors who were sworn to try the cause in the places of the persons just referred to. Under such circumstances, we think that section 1404 of the Penal Code applies, which reads:

> "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right."

In People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, on pages 148 and 149, 3 P. 597, 605 (52 Am. Rep. 295), we find the following:

> "In the case of People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 557, it was held 'that if the prosecution in a criminal case pass the jury to the defendant, who declines to make any challenge, the prosecution may then interpose a peremptory challenge to a juror before he is sworn.' It is true the foregoing case differs slightly from this, inasmuch as in that case the defendant did not interpose any challenge, whereas, in this case, he did; but we do not think that the difference between the facts of the two cases in any manner affects the principle applicable to both. It is there said that the prosecution had not accepted the jury by only passing them to the other side. At most, the action of the court was an irregularity, not affecting, so far as we can see, any substantial right of the defendant, and one which does not call for a reversal of the judgment."

In that case a challenge was allowed to be exercised by the prosecution after it had previously passed the jury.

In 15 Cal. Jur. p. 438, § 108, the procedure in exercising challenges is thus set forth:

> "In criminal cases 'if all challenges [for cause] on both sides are disallowed, either party, first the people and then the defendant, may take a peremptory challenge unless the parties' peremptory challenges are exhausted.' Failure to comply with this provision does not invalidate a judgment but at most amounts to a mere irregularity. Thus if after all challenges for cause are disallowed, the prosecution passes the jury or a juror to the defendant, it may then interpose a peremptory challenge to a juror before he is sworn. Even if such procedure is an irregularity cognizable upon appeal, the defendant may not complain unless he exhausts all of his peremptory challenges."

[3] The last sentence of the quotation from California Jurisprudence is not, however, a complete statement of the law. It is true that a defendant is not in a position to complain until he has exhausted all of his peremptory challenges, but it is not true that this alone is a good ground of complaint. Under such circumstances, the defendant is simply in a position where he has a right to complain if any objectionable juror has in this manner been placed upon the panel, and it is incumbent upon the defendant to show that such is the case. The mere fact that some other juror is placed upon the panel by reason of the exercise of a challenge out of order by the prosecution is not, in and of itself, a showing of prejudicial error. For all that appears in this case, the juror placed upon the panel was just as acceptable to the defendant and as free from bias or prejudice as was any juryman so displaced. The order of selecting a juror is a matter of procedure, and section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution specifies that no error as to any matter of procedure shall be held sufficient to set aside a verdict or order a new trial, unless it appears from the record that the error complained of has caused a miscarriage of justice. While it may be said that the procedure set forth in section 1088 of the Penal Code should be followed by the trial court, a departure therefrom cannot be held sufficient cause for the reversal of a judgment, unless it appears further that the defendant has suffered the loss of a substantial right, justifying an appellate court under the constitutional provision quoted in holding that such departure has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. The following cases are in line with the holding here had: People v. Troutman, 187 Cal. 313, 201 P. 928; People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 P. 920; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 P. 75; People v. Kromphold, 172 Cal. 512, 157 P. 599.

[4] In arguing that the record does not show that the girl was not the wife of the defendant, the portion of the transcript wherein the statements made by the defendant admitted in evidence that he was going away with the girl to get married and that the purpose of their trip was to go to some place and get married must not have been fully considered. The statement of the defendant, read into the record, was that he was single and that he intended to marry the girl when he reached Bakersfield, all of which testimony was proper to be considered by the jury in determining the fact of whether the defendant and the girl in question were not husband and wife as fully and completely to all intents and purposes as though the defendant had said the girl was not his wife or the girl had said the defendant was not her husband.

The refusal of the trial court to follow the verdict of the jury presents a question not hitherto directly passed upon. Prior to the amendment, approved May 19, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 213), section 264 of the Penal Code read, simply, that rape was punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than 5 years. By the amendment approved, as above stated, the section was changed to read that rape is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not more than 50 years, except where the offense is under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code and the female is over the age of 16 years and under the age of 18 years, in which case the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than 50 years, and in such case the jury shall determine by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison. In 1923, by an act approved on May 8th of that year (St. 1923, p. 271), section 264 of the Penal Code was amended to read as follows:

> "Rape is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not more than fifty years, except where the offense is under subdivision one of section two hundred sixty-one of the Penal Code, in which case the punishment shall be either by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years, and in such case the jury shall recommend by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison; provided, that when the defendant pleads guilty of an offense under subdivision one of section 261 of the Penal Code the punishment shall be in the discretion of the trial court, either by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years."

In drafting the amendment, approved in 1923, the words, "the jury shall determine by their verdict," as they appeared in the section as amended by the act of 1913, were changed to read, "the jury shall recommend by their verdict." The act of 1913 was silent as to what should be done by the court in prosecutions founded upon subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code in the event that the defendant pleaded guilty. This apparent omission was supplied by the amendment of the section in 1923, and reads as follows:

> "Provided, that when the defendant pleads guilty of an offense under subdivision one of section 261 of the Penal Code the punishment shall be in the discretion of the trial court, either by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than one year or in the state prison for not more than fifty years."

[5] It is argued by counsel for the people that the act approved by the Legislature in 1923 purporting to amend section 264 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional in that it conflicts with section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution setting forth what shall be embraced in the title of every act and that every act shall embrace but one subject. The title of the act, approved May 8, 1923, is in the following words: "An act to amend section 264 of the Penal Code, relating to the punishment of the crime of rape." A reference to the act approved May 19, 1913, wherein the jury is first given the right to designate the place of punishment where the prosecution is based upon subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, discloses a title in identical words. It thus follows that if the amendment of section 264 passed by the Legislature in 1923 is invalid for the reasons argued, then, and in that case, the same section, as amended in 1913, is also invalid. It may first be observed that section 261 of the Penal Code divides the crime of rape into degrees in so far as it may be said that the Codes anywhere designate the different degrees of the crime of rape. In section 261, supra, six different situations or conditions are set forth in defining the offense, only one of which, to wit, the first subdivision, where the female is under 18 years of age and no force is used, presents a possible situation where circumstances may be presented lessening the apparent heinousness of the offense. The Penal Code does not, in terms, anywhere purport to divide the offense of rape into degrees. It simply sets forth, as said, six sets of conditions or circumstances under which the offense may be committed, and then follows with section 264, naming penalties and providing for cases where the act of the defendant may not be so reprehensible as to necessitate or warrant his being confined in the state prison or that the safeguarding of society does not necessitate that form of punishment. The Legislature, by the act of 1913, limited the period when such possible conditions might exist and be considered to instances where the female was over the age of 16 and under the age of 18 years. The amendment to the section of 1923 cuts out the words "sixteen years" and leaves section 264 of the Penal Code operative in all cases where the prosecution is based upon subdivision 1, § 261, supra. For the reasons hereinafter about to be given, we do not think it necessary to review the cases cited by respondent upon the theory that section 264 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1923, is unconstitutional. The cases cited are applicable to particular facts and circumstances there presented. The cases which are controlling here are the ones which relate to the amendments of particular Code sections. The text found in 23 Cal. Jur. 660, sets forth the rule controlling in this state. It is there said:

> "An act to amend a provision of the Codes is sufficient, so far as title is concerned, if it is entitled merely as an act to amend a certain numbered section of a named Code. If such title omits to name the Code, though specifying a section number, it is sufficient, but if it adds further descriptive words, the title is not vitiated thereby unless such further words indicate a subject not related to the matters covered by the body of the bill. The almost universal custom of the Legislature in making amendments to the Codes has been to put into the title of the amendatory act, after the number of the section amended and the name of the Code, additional words expressing the subject of the act; and it is settled that such an amendatory act complies with the constitutional requirements. The title of an act to amend one of the Codes by adding a new section may or may not state the number of the new section, but it must contain words expressing the subject to which the proposed legislation relates. An act entitled an act to add a new section to a named Code, relating to a named subject, is sufficient to embrace all matters relating to such subject. Where a statute is entitled as an act to amend a certain section of a named Code and to provide for a given object, the title expresses a single subject."

As illustrating the rule set forth, we cite the case of Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 P. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73, where the title of an act adding new sections to the Code reading as follows, "Relating to Actions for Divorce," was held sufficient. In People v. Parvin, 74 Cal. 549, 16 P. 490, the title of the act under consideration read, "An act to amend section 3481 of the Political Code." Such title was held sufficient. To the same effect are the cases of Beach v. Von Detten, 139 Cal. 462,[1] and People v. Oates, 142 Cal. 12, 75 P. 337. In the case of Edler v. Edwards, 34 Utah, 13, 95 P. 367, the Supreme Court of Utah, discussing a similar provision in the Constitution of that State, quotes with approval the following language:

> "It is held by the great majority of cases that it is sufficient for the title of an act to amend a Code or Revision to specify the section to be amended, without giving the title of the chapter or division to which it belongs or in any way indicating the subject-matter of the section. Under such a title any legislation is proper which is germane to the section specified."

We do not need to go so far in upholding the title in the case under consideration for the simple reason that the title does indicate the subject-matter being considered as well as the section of the Code to be amended. Other cases might be cited, but what we have said is sufficient to show that the title employed by the Legislature in amending section 264 of the Penal Code in 1923 is amply sufficient.

[6] That section 264 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1913, under a title identical with that employed by the Legislature in the amendment adopted in 1923, is constitutional has been expressly adjudicated by this court in the case of In re Todd, 44 Cal. App. 496, 186 P. 790. This court, after upholding the constitutionality of the section, as it then stood, speaking through Justice Hart, used the following language:

> "It will not, of course, be denied that it is within the power of the Legislature to fix the penalty for a crime according to its inherent nature, or the nature of the circumstances under which it may be committed. 'There can be no doubt,' says Mr. Justice Lennon, in Selowsky v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 404 [181 P. 652], 'that the Legislature has power to classify with respect to the penalty to be imposed not only upon the basis of the inherent nature of the offense but also upon the basis of the nature of the circumstances attending the commission of the offense considered in their relation to the public welfare' "—citing a number of cases.

Nor do we think that the section is vulnerable on the theory that more than one subject-matter is contained in the section and not expressed in the title. The only subject-matter dealt with is punishment for the crime of rape. It is not even dealing expressly with degrees of crime. When the word "punishment" is used in the title every member of the Legislature has his attention directed to the subject-matter of the punishment to be imposed for the crime of rape, which includes all the elements that may enter into the question of making the punishment fit the offense committed. By way of illustration in showing that the title with respect to section 264, Penal Code, follows the rule heretofore adopted and may be more or less considered as a legislative interpretation of the constitutional provision which we are considering, we may refer to the titles used by the same Legislature in amending other sections of the Penal Code, to wit, page 270, Statutes of 1923, the title of the amending section relating to burglary reads as follows: "An act to amend section four hundred sixty-one of the Penal Code, relating to the penalty for burglary." Three degrees of punishment are set forth in the section under the title which we have quoted. On page 271, Statutes of 1923, in amending section 213, relating to the punishment of robbery, we find the following title: "An act to amend section two hundred and thirteen of the Penal Code, relating to the punishment of robbery." Under this caption or title, a section is added permitting the punishment for robbery for not less than five years to life, and, also, under other circumstances, for not less than one year. Again, section 487 of the Penal Code, Statutes of 1923, section 271 is amended under the following title: "An act to amend section four hundred eighty-seven of the Penal Code, relating to grand larceny." The section then sets forth three sets of conditions or circumstances under which grand larceny may be committed. We think the rule is too well settled, both by the adjudications of our own court and the practice of the Legislature that a title such as was used by the Legislature in 1923 amending section 264 of the Penal Code is sufficient, to permit of any other ruling than we have indicated, whether correct or incorrect in the first instance. Any other ruling would invalidate almost every section of the Penal Code.

[7] In the case of People v. Davis, 67 Cal. App. 210, 227 P. 494, this court in considering incidentally the interpretation of section 264 of the Penal Code, as amended by the Legislature in 1923, said:

> "The evident intention of the Legislature was to correct the omission in the section as it originally stood, to empower the court upon plea of guilty to exercise the discretion which had theretofore been vested in the jury upon trial, when the female outraged was between the ages of sixteen and eighteen years, but, the unhappy wording of the section makes the amendment apply to all cases coming under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, when the female is under the age of eighteen years."

While the use of this language was not absolutely necessary to the decision of the Davis Case, it does indicate our views of what the Legislature intended by the added words incorporated in section 264 by the amendment of 1923. A consideration of these words is absolutely necessary in order to determine what the Legislature intended. Prior to the amendment of 1923 the section simply permitted the fixing of the punishment either in the county jail or a state prison by the jury upon trial. No such discretion was by the wording of the section permitted to be exercised by the court. We know as a matter of fact this authority or discretion was exercised by courts upon the entry of a plea of guilty upon a charge founded on subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, but it was not by virtue of any direct provision of the Penal Code, but was only upon the assumed inherent power of the court. To supply this omission or defect in the language of the section, there was added the proviso which we have set forth that when the defendant pleads guilty of an offense under subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code, the punishment shall be in the discretion of the trial court. It will thus be seen that the Legislature intended the punishment to be in the trial court only in one instance, that is, upon a plea of guilty. In cases where the cause went to trial the place of punishment was designated by the jury, and now when he does not go to trial, but pleads guilty, the discretion as to the place of punishment is centered in the court. When the defendant is sent to the state penitentiary in either case, neither the jury nor the court fix the extent of punishment. If the words, "and in such case the jury shall recommend by their verdict whether the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the county jail or the state prison," have no mandatory effect, then the proviso that in a certain specified case, and only in a certain specified case, the discretion as to the place of punishment shall be exercised by the court is wholly meaningless. If it was intended by the Legislature that the court should fix the place of punishment in all cases, it would not have so worded the section that the discretion as to the place of punishment should be exercised by the court only when the defendant pleaded guilty. If the section as amended does not vest in the jury power to designate the place of punishment, then the language of the section does not vest such authority anywhere in the event that the defendant goes to trial, and we are forced to the rather anomalous conclusion that the Legislature in giving discretion to the court to fix the place of punishment, when a plea of guilty is entered, has provided that more favorable consideration may be given a defendant even when the lack of a tenable defense induces the entry of such plea. This certainly was not the intention of the Legislature, as common experience teaches that pleas of guilty are not ordinarily entered in cases where defense is humanly possible. When read as a whole, we think the section means just as we have interpreted it. That the Legislature has the power to authorize the jury to fix the place of punishment as well as the court cannot be doubted. Nor is the argument tenable that, because the jury may not fix an adequate punishment, the court is therefore authorized, under the section, to disregard the action of the jury. To hold that the recommendation provided for in the section is of no validity because the jury may make a mistake as to the place where the defendant should be sent would be to hold that the court ought not to be allowed to exercise like authority, because the trial court might also fall into error, might be either too severe or too lenient. That is a matter exclusively for the Legislature. The Legislature has seen fit to eliminate these words, "over the age of sixteen years," allowing the discretion to be exercised where the female has consented, irrespective of age, so long as she is under 18 years.

We said in the case of People v. Davis, supra, that this wording was "unhappy." However, the Legislature has the exclusive power over these matters and had a right to eliminate the words which we now find omitted, irrespective of whether courts deem such acts wise or unwise. It is simply a question of power and not of wisdom. Our attention has been called to the cases of Guthrie v. State, 125 Ga. 291, 54 S. E. 180, Mack v. State, 118 Ga. 755, 45 S. E. 603, and Coney v. State, 101 Ga. 582, 28 S. E. 918, where recommendations in the verdict of the jury have been held of no binding force or effect upon the court. A reference to section 1062 (marginal number section 1036, parenthetical number of the Penal Code of Georgia), having to do with the subject of recommendations by a verdict upon which the foregoing cases were founded, contains the following:

> "When such recommendation is approved by the judge presiding on the trial, said crime shall be punished as misdemeanors. If the judge trying the case sees proper, he may in his discretion, reduce such felonies to misdemeanors."

These are the concluding words of the section, and, of course, take away the idea of vesting in the jury authority to designate the place of punishment, or enforce any views which they may express concerning the mitigation thereof. Likewise, the case of State v. Evans, 159 La. 712, 106 So. 123, and Leach v. State, 99 Tenn. 584, 42 S. W. 195, are founded upon statutes which expressly state that the court may or may not adopt the recommendations of the jury. Again, in Lewis v. State, 51 Ala. 1, where the Code of the state provided that any person who is guilty of murder in the second degree must, on conviction, be imprisoned in the penitentiary or sentenced to hard labor for the county for not less than ten years, at the discretion of the jury," a verdict which read, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, and recommend his sentence to the penitentiary for 20 years," sufficiently complied with the statute, as the word "recommend," under such circumstances, was held as sufficiently indicating the exercise of discretion by the jury in fixing the period of imprisonment. That the word "recommend" in its ordinary meaning is not synonymous with the word "determine" may be admitted, but the whole wording of section 264 of the Penal Code, we think, leads unmistakably to the conclusion that the Legislature did not intend to take away from the jury any powers it had heretofore exercised, but only intended to confer upon the court powers which were not expressly included within the language of the section as worded by the amendment of 1913, and that is was intended that the court was to designate the place of punishment only in the instance mentioned and expressly provided for. It is not for us to say that a jury would be less wise in its action than the court. That, again, is exclusively within the province of the Legislature.

[8] The case of In re Todd, 44 Cal. App. 496, 186 P. 790, and the case of Selowsky v. Superior Court, 180 Cal. 404, 181 P. 652, and the cases there cited, sufficiently answer the contention that section 264 of the Penal Code, as amended, is violative of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution, relating to special legislation. It is there shown that such contention is not tenable.

[9] It necessarily follows from what has been said that the court erred in pronouncing sentence. The verdict was in the following language: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Louie Rambaud, guilty of the crime of rape, as charged, and recommend that he be punished by imprisonment in the county jail"—which authorized the court to sentence the defendant to the designated place. This necessitates, however, only a modification of the judgment. It is therefore ordered that the sentence be set aside and the cause remanded to the trial court, with directions to resentence the defendant to the county jail of San Joaquin county for a period not exceeding that provided in the Code.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem.

PEOPLE v. SACHAU. (Cr. 922.)

1. Rape 🔑60, 1218—Provision that when rape is on female under 18 years without force jury shall recommend place of imprisonment is mandatory and valid (Pen. Code, § 264).

Under Pen. Code, § 264, providing that when rape is on female under 18 years without force jury shall recommend place of imprisonment, jury must fix place, since provision is mandatory and valid.

2. Criminal law 🔑1189—Upon reversal of judgment for defective verdict defendant is not entitled to discharge, and retrial will be ordered.

Where defective verdict is rendered defendant is not entitled to discharge on reversal of judgment, but new trial will be granted, since provision against double jeopardy, under Const. art. 1, § 13, is inapplicable.

3. Criminal law 🔑1031(4).

Plea of former jeopardy must be presented to trial court, and is not available in Court of Appeals upon motion for discharge.

4. Rape 🔑60—Verdict of "guilty of rape, a felony, as charged," held not defective, in that it does not find defendant guilty of crime charged (Pen. Code, §§ 261, 1157).

Verdict finding defendant "guilty of rape, a felony, as charged" held not defective, in that it does not find him guilty of crime charged, notwithstanding Pen. Code, § 1157, since, under section 261, rape is not divided into degrees.

5. Criminal law 🔑884—Failure to instruct jury as to power to fix place of punishment in rape case held error (Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, and section 264).

Trial court's failure in prosecution for rape on female 15 years old, under Pen. Code, § 261, subd. 1, to instruct jury as to authority vested in it, under section 264, to recommend place of punishment when rape is on female under 18 years, held reversible error, since such provision is mandatory.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Joe Sachau was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Judgment reversed, motion to be discharged denied, and retrial ordered.

Foltz, Rendon & Wallace, of Stockton (A. V. Scanlan, of Stockton, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was tried and convicted upon an information charging the defendant with the commission of a felony, to wit, that on or about the 8th day of October, 1925, etc., the defendant did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously have and accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with and upon a certain named female of the age of 15 years and not the wife of the defendant, the information being based upon and charging the offense specified in subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code. The jury returned a verdict in the following words (omitting the title): "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Joe A. Sachau, guilty of the crime of rape, a felony, as charged." At the time fixed for pronouncing sentence the defendant moved that he be discharged from custody on the ground that the verdict of the jury was a nullity. This motion was denied and sentence pronounced. From the judgment of the court the defendant appeals and assigns two reasons as to why the judgment should be reversed, to wit, (1) that the court did not fully instruct the jury as to the law applicable to the case; (2) that the jury did not return a verdict fixing the degree of the crime; and, also, insists that he should be discharged on the ground that he had been once in jeopardy.

The court, after having given certain instructions which we need not set forth, instructed the jury as follows:

> "If the jury find to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Joe A. Sachau, did, at and in the county of San Joaquin, state of California, and on or about the 8th day of October, 1925, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously have and accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with and upon one Suzzanne La Porte, then and there a female under the age of 18 years, to wit, of the age of 15 years, and not then and there the wife of the said Joe A. Sachau, then I charge you it will be your duty to bring in a verdict of guilty of rape, a felony, as charged."

And, further:

> "In this case you may render one of two verdicts, namely: '(1) We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant, Joe A. Sachau, guilty of rape, a felony, as charged;' or '(2) We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find the defendant not guilty.'"

[1] The foregoing constitutes the only instructions given to the jury relative to their powers under section 264 of the Penal Code. It will be observed that the jury was not advised as to the authority vested in it to recommend as to the place of punishment, as specifically provided for in this section. It appears to have been the view of the court that such provisions are merely directory and might be disregarded, notwithstanding the fact that the Code uses the mandatory form of language, to wit, the jury "shall" perform certain functions. Although the same argument is made here as in the case of People v. Rambaud, 248 P. 954, this day filed herein, we need not go into a discussion of the meaning or interpretation of the section, but will simply refer to that case as authority for holding that it is within the province of the jury to fix the place of punishment. We also content ourselves in referring to the Rambaud Case as to all questions concerning the constitutionality of section 264 of the Penal Code.

[2] Passing these questions, the appellant insists that the foregoing verdict is a nullity, and, basing his argument upon the cases of People v. Terrill, 132 Cal. 497, 501, 64 P. 894, People v. Tilley, 135 Cal. 61, 67 P. 42, and People v. Small, 1 Cal. App. 320, 82 P. 87, contends that the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to discharge the defendant. While the view contended for by the appellant has been approved by certain decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, it is obvious that consideration has not been given to the case of People v. Tong, 155 Cal. 579, 102 P. 263, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 481, 132 Am. St. Rep. 110. In that case the court had before it a question similar to that which is here presented, and in referring to the cases upon which the appellant relies uses the following language:

> "The only question presented for our determination is whether or not the Court of Appeals properly ordered the discharge of the defendant from custody upon the authority of People v. Arnett, 129 Cal. 306 (61 P. 930). In that case the defendant had been charged with the crime of assault with intent to commit murder and had been convicted of assault with a deadly weapon. The verdict was held to be a nullity (People v. Arnett, 126 Cal. 680, 59 P. 204), and on a second appeal (People v. Arnett, 129 Cal. 306, 61 P. 930), it was determined that the defendant had been once in jeopardy, and that he was entitled to his discharge, as it appeared from the minutes of the trial court, which were before the Supreme Court, that he had not consented to the discharge of the jury without verdict. If it be the doctrine of the case of People v. Arnett, 129 Cal. 306 (61 P. 930); People v. Smith, 136 Cal. 207 (68 P. 702); People v. Tilley, 135 Cal. 61 (67 P. 42); and People v. Curtis, 76 Cal. 57 [17 P. 941], that the defendant has been once in jeopardy in every case wherein a verdict of guilty of a crime not strictly embraced within the pleadings has been returned and the jury has been discharged without consent, then those cases should be overruled."

This court had before it the subject of defective verdicts in the case of In re Colford, 68 Cal. App. 308, 229 P. 63, where a defendant had been convicted of robbery without designation of the degree, and it is there said:

> "The verdict and judgment being void, the imprisonment of petitioner in the state prison is illegal. He is not, however, entitled to be set at liberty but he must be tried anew. 'Where a verdict is so defective that no judgment can be entered on it, and the defendant fails to have it corrected when rendered, he is considered as consenting to the verdict, and as waiving any objection, including the plea of former jeopardy, to being put again on trial before another jury.' 8 R. C. L. 141. 'Because a defendant waives his right by not objecting when an imperfect verdict is rendered, if it is set aside he shall not be discharged but tried anew.' Bishop's New Criminal Procedure, § 1016. See, also, People v. Tong, 155 Cal. 579 [102 P. 263, 24 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 481, 132 Am. St. Rep. 110]; State v. Rover, 10 Nev. 388 [21 Am. Rep. 745]; Mahany v. People, 31 Colo. 365 [73 P. 26]; Marshall v. State, 73 Tex. Cr. R. 531 [166 S. W. 722, L. R. A. 1915A, 526]; State v. Bates, 22 Utah, 65 [61 P. 905, 83 Am. St. Rep. 768])."

The judgment in that case was that the defendant should be released from the state prison at Folsom and returned to the county of Yuba for trial. Upon a like state of facts, a like conclusion was reached by Division 2 of the First Appellate District in the case of In re Davis, 68 Cal. App. 801, 229 P. 1114.

In 7 Cal. Jur. p. 946, the text citing a number of California cases for authority thus states the rule relating to double jeopardy, where a judgment is reversed:

> "The constitutional provision against double jeopardy was never intended to apply to cases in which a judgment of conviction was reversed in an appellate court and a new trial ordered. Moreover, it is the generally accepted doctrine that a defendant's successful effort to set aside a verdict and judgment by means of a motion for new trial or appeal is a waiver of his constitutional right to object to being placed again in jeopardy. In effect he assents to all the consequences legitimately following such reversal, and consents to be tried anew."

And on page 953 of the same volume, the law is further stated in this language:

> "When a verdict of conviction is illegal or void, the jury should be sent out for further deliberation. But it does not follow that the discharge of the jury upon rendition of such a verdict operates as an acquittal; as it is a mistrial rather than a legal putting in jeopardy. Moreover, the defendant's successful effort to set aside the verdict and judgment is a waiver of his right to object to being placed again in jeopardy. It has been so held where a jury was discharged upon the rendition of a verdict convicting the defendant of an offense not embraced by the accusation."

The text-writer here refers to the case of People v. Tong, in which the cases relied upon by the appellant are, in effect, overruled as to the particular points upon which they are cited as authority. It is true the language of the Supreme Court in the Tong Case, when referring to the cases upon which the appellant relies, used the words, "then these cases should be overruled," instead of explicitly stating that they are overruled. The language used, however, is sufficient to indicate that such cases are not to be considered as authority upon questions such as are presented for our consideration, and we are at liberty to follow the great weight of authority setting forth a contrary, and, what we believe to be, the correct rule. In the case of People v. Travers, 73 Cal. 580, 15 P. 293, where the defendant was prosecuted upon an information charging burglary without setting forth whether the offense was committed in the daytime or the nighttime, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty as charged, upon appeal, the same contention was made as is here presented. The court there held the verdict insufficient on the ground that the jury had not designated the degree of the crime, and in so doing, expressed its views as follows:

> "In People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129, the court reversed the judgment because the verdict did not designate the degree of the crime. Under a similar statute the Supreme Court of Alabama held it to be error to pass sentence upon a verdict which did not specify the degree of murder of which the jury found the defendant guilty. The court said that the statute which required the jury to specify the degree was imperative, and that it was the right of the accused to have it complied with [citing a number of cases]. We are unable to find any case in which the contrary has been held. * * * It therefore follows that the judgment must be reversed, and here the question arises, what further order should be made? Appellant's counsel insists that we should order the discharge of the defendant under that clause of the Constitution which declares that 'no person shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense.' Const. § 13, art. 1. In none of the cases which we have followed thus far was there an order that the defendant be discharged from custody, but in each of them there was an order that the cause be remanded for a new trial. Since we reverse the judgment on the authority of those cases, we deem it proper to make the same orders which were made in them."

This case came before the court again in Id., 77 Cal. 176, 19 P. 268. The defendant pleaded the former trial and defective verdict as once in jeopardy. The court held the plea untenable, stating its reasons as follows (quoting from the syllabus):

> "When the defendant procures a reversal of a former judgment of conviction upon appeal, though asking for a discharge for insufficiency of the verdict, and not for a new trial, if the prayer for a discharge be denied, and a new trial ordered, the defendant will be regarded as impliedly assenting to all the consequences legitimately following such reversal, and a plea of once in jeopardy by reason of the former trial cannot be sustained upon the new trial."

The Supreme Court again reviewed the cases we are now considering in the case of Lee Yune Chong, 94 Cal. 379, 29 P. 776, and considers the questions urged upon this appeal so fully that we quote therefrom at length:

> "The judgment must be reversed, however, because the verdict failed to find the degree of the crime. It has always been the statutory law that in a murder case the verdict of guilty must designate the degree of the crime of which the defendant is found guilty; and for many years the Penal Code has provided generally that 'whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime.' Pen. Code, § 1157. And it has been held here, in a number of cases, that when the degree is not found by the verdict (when the crime has degrees), the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial granted. People v. Marquis, 15 Cal. 38; People v. Campbell, 40 Cal. 129; People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452; People v. Travers, 73 Cal. 580 [15 P. 293]; People v. O'Neil, 78 Cal. 388 [20 P. 705].

"Appellant's motion to be discharged was properly denied. While the failure of the jury to find the degree of the crime is an error for which the judgment must be reversed, it no more entitles appellant to a discharge than would any other reversible error committed during the progress of the trial.

"Appellant asks that the judgment be reversed and that he be discharged; and contends that as he did not move for a new trial, no new trial can be ordered. It will be observed that in the cases last above cited—where there was a failure to find the degree of the crime—new trials were ordered, though in most of them a new trial had not been asked by the appellant. Under section 1260 of the Penal Code, the appellate court may reverse, affirm, or modify a judgment appealed from, 'and may, if proper, order a new trial.' It was expressly held in People v. Olwell, 28 Cal. 456, approved in People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342, and People v. Travers, 77 Cal. 176 [19 P. 268], that—we quote from People v. Travers—'if a defendant in a criminal case is convicted and appeals, and the judgment is reversed, the appellate court may order a new trial, even though the defendant does not move for such new trial, and denies the power of the court to grant it.' And the case at bar is clearly one in which it is proper that a new trial should be ordered.

"Counsel for appellant argue the question of 'once in jeopardy,' but that question can arise only after an issue has been made by a plea of 'once in jeopardy.' It is not necessary, therefore, to discuss that question here, although it may not be out of place to say that the cases last above cited of People v. Olwell, 28 Cal. 456, People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342, and People v. Travers, 77 Cal. 176 [19 P. 268], are strong authorities against the position taken by appellant on that question."

[3] The plea of former jeopardy, however, if available, must be presented to the trial court (Rebstock v. Superior Court, 146 Cal. 315, 80 P. 65), and is not available here upon motion for discharge.

[4] In the case at bar the verdict of the jury is not, however, defective, in that it does not find the defendant guilty of the crime charged in the information. The crime of rape is not specifically divided into degrees. People v. Rambaud, supra. The crime of rape may be committed under varying conditions, but it is simply one crime, to wit, rape, not having different degrees set forth in the statute as is done in dividing the crime of robbery. It partakes more of the nature of the crime of grand larceny, which may be committed in various ways, but it is still the crime of grand larceny without degrees, and it has been held that where an information charges the defendant with the crime of grand larceny a verdict of guilty is sufficient. People v. Price, 67 Cal. 350, 7 P. 745; People v. Whitely, 64 Cal. 211, 27 P. 1104; People v. Perez, 87 Cal. 122, 25 P. 262. In the last case, the information was for grand larceny, and a verdict of guilty as charged was held to be a verdict of guilty of grand larceny.

Section 1157 of the Penal Code requires that "whenever a crime is distinguished into degrees, the jury, if they convict the defendant, must find the degree of the crime of which he is guilty." A number of authorities are collated in the annotation to this case in Kerr's Cyc. Codes, holding that verdicts not complying with the section where crimes are divided into degrees are involved insufficient. Even though it might be held that the cases upon which the appellant relies correctly state the law, the defendant would not be entitled to a discharge. In those cases it appears that the defendant was not convicted of any crime expressly charged in the information or indictment, while in the case at bar the defendant is found guilty of the crime of rape, denominated in the information a felony and set forth as a felony in the verdict, and, also, by the use of express words finding the defendant guilty as charged. In the case of People v. Cornell, 29 Cal. App. 430, 155 P. 1026, this court had occasion to review a large number of previous decisions having to do with alleged defective verdicts. This court there quoted with approval from Bishop's Criminal Procedure (2d Ed.) § 1005a, as follows:

> "The language of the verdict, being that of lay people, need not follow the strict rules of pleading or be otherwise technical. Whatever conveys the idea to the common understanding will suffice, and all fair intendments will be made to support it. As in an indictment or a pleading bad grammar or spelling does not vitiate, so, a fortiori, it does not in the verdict unless the meaning becomes inadequate. Surplusage is harmless. The finding must be construed as a whole, not in its separate parts."

This court also in that case called attention to the reasons why the verdict in the Tilley Case was held insufficient, and the distinction between the verdict in the Cornell Case and the Tilley Case is no greater than is the distinction between the verdict in the case at bar and the verdict in the Tilley Case. In the Tilley Case the defendant was not expressly found guilty of the crime charged, while here the defendant is explicitly found guilty of the crime charged. We do not need to review the Cornell Case further than to state that the review of the verdict in that case fully establishes the validity of the verdict in this case, save and except for the reasons hereinafter stated. See, also, In re Flaherty, 64 Cal. App. 210, 221 P. 390. This case refers to and relies upon the authorities which we have cited. Again, if the principle upon which the cases of People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 174, and People v. French, 69 Cal. 169, 10 P. 378, are decided is applicable, then the verdict in this case, if the jury had been properly instructed, might be held to be sufficient to sustain the judgment in that finding the defendant guilty as charged in the information, and its being charged in the information that the defendant had committed a felony, and the verdict finding the defendant guilty of a felony as charged, intended to fix the place of punishment of the defendant in the state prison. Section 17 of the Penal Code defines a felony as an offense punishable by death or by imprisonment in the state prison. Section 264, Penal Code, provides for punishment of the offense of rape in the state prison, and, nothing further appearing, we see no reason why it cannot be held that the jury has with common certainty, in view of the Code, fixed the place of punishment. If this conclusion be correct, then, irrespective of the decisions which we have cited relating to the question of jeopardy and the right of the defendant to be discharged or not discharged, would be of no avail to the defendant, for the simple reason that we are only confronted with the ordinary case of where a defendant is entitled to a reversal on account of erroneous instructions given by the court.

[5] As we have said, the trial court in the case at bar did not instruct the jury as to what it should or should not do under the provisions of section 264 of the Penal Code. That section does not read that the jury may do so and so, but it is mandatory in form and directs that the jury shall make certain recommendations. The defendant was entitled to have the jury correctly instructed as to its powers with relation to the verdict. That it was incumbent upon the jury to make recommendations, that it might recommend either incarceration in the state prison or the county jail, and that this is a substantive right which may not be disregarded, appears to us to be beyond question. These are matters which the Legislature has seen fit to intrust to the determination of the jury, whenever and wherever the female has given actual consent, though denied the power of giving legal consent. As said in many of the cases, the circumstances under which the crime mentioned in subdivision 1 of section 261 of the Penal Code are found such that the ends of justice are subserved by a modified degree of the extent of the punishment.

The defendant requested no instructions relative to the authority and duty of the jury under section 264 of the Penal Code, but the cases denying relief under such circumstances are inapplicable here, for the simple reason that when the trial court undertook either of its own motion or upon the request of the prosecution (the transcript does not disclose which) to instruct the jury in relation thereto, it was incumbent upon the court to observe the terms and provisions of said section and to advise the jury of the duty devolving upon it as well as its authority.

For the reasons which we have stated, the motion of the appellant to be discharged is hereby denied, the judgment reversed, and a retrial ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; NEEDHAM, Justice pro tem.

78 Cal. App. 554

PEOPLE v. JONES. (Cr. 929.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 28, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 26, 1926.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⚷173.

Though liquor furnished by defendant was all sold and delivered at same time to 3 persons, transaction constituted separate sales as to each of them.

2. Criminal law ⚷369(6)—Sale of liquor, on which prior conviction was had, held properly admitted in support of charge of maintaining nuisance (Pen. Code, §§ 1025, 1093).

In prosecution for selling liquor and maintaining nuisance, where liquor was kept and sold, that clerk read part of information charging previous conviction for sale, contrary to Pen. Code, §§ 1025, 1093, held not prejudicial error, evidence of prior sale being properly admitted in support of charge of maintaining a nuisance, which is a continuing offense, notwithstanding sale occurred more than a year prior to filing of information.

3. Witnesses ⚷344(1)—Indian witness for prosecution might not be impeached by showing that he was a ward of the government, as showing discreditable conduct by officers in violating federal statutes governing giving of liquor to Indians (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051).

In liquor prosecution, witness for prosecution, who was an Indian, might not be impeached by showing that he was a ward of the government, as showing discreditable conduct by officers in violating federal statutes governing giving of liquor to Indians, who are wards of the government, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2051.

4. Criminal Law ⚷1170½(5)—Denying cross-examination of detectives, employed by district attorney in liquor prosecution, as to amount paid them for their services, held not prejudicial error.

In liquor prosecution, denying cross-examination of witnesses for prosecution, who testified that they were detectives employed by the district attorney and paid for their services, as to how much they expected to be paid, how much had been paid them in other cases, and total amount they had been paid, held not prejudicial error.

5. Witnesses 🔑291—Sustaining objection to recross-examination of detective employed by district attorney in liquor prosecution, as to transaction with bootleggers, held proper, as matter was immaterial.

In liquor prosecution, in which detective employed by prosecution testified that he was enabled to secure liquor from defendant by giving him names of bootleggers, sustaining objections to recross-examination of witness relative to his transactions with such bootleggers held proper, as matter was immaterial.

6. Intoxicating liquors 🔑139—Possession of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes is lawful only where obtained before prohibition act went into effect and kept in owner's dwelling for private use.

Instruction that defendant could possess liquor in his private dwelling house for personal consumption of himself and family and any bona fide guests therein held properly refused, since such possession is lawful only where liquor was obtained before prohibition act went into effect.

7. Criminal law 🔑809—Instruction permitting finding defendant guilty of either, both, or neither of charges of information, held not misleading as requiring jury to either acquit or convict of both charges.

Instruction that jury might find defendant guilty of either, both, or neither of charges set forth in information, held not misleading in that jury must have understood they must either acquit or convict of both charges, since it must be presumed that trial judge so read instruction as to convey to jury correct meaning thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Alonzo Jones was convicted of the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, and of maintaining, as a common nuisance, a place where intoxicating liquor was unlawfully kept and sold, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Dowd & Reagh, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information herein charges two offenses. The first count charges an unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor on the 21st day of September, 1925, and a previous conviction, on the 8th day of May, 1924, of an unlawful sale. The second count charges that the defendant, on or about the 17th day of October, 1925, maintained, as a common nuisance, a place where intoxicating liquor was unlawfully kept and sold. He admitted the prior conviction, but pleaded not guilty to the charges of unlawful sale and maintenance of a nuisance. He was convicted of both offenses, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

[1] The evidence against defendant is strong and convincing. Three witnesses, one a township constable, testified that they went together to defendant's home on the 21st day of September, 1925, and that he there furnished them intoxicating liquor, which they drank on the premises, and also sold them three bottles of liquor. Three other constables testified that they searched the defendant's premises on the 17th day of October, 1925; that they "heard a racket in the house" as they entered the gate; that in the house they "could smell liquor there strong"; that they found where liquor had been recently poured out in the back yard on some papers and leaves and secured a small quantity of the liquor from papers which were "cupped," by squeezing it out of the papers. This small quantity of liquor was produced at the trial. Several other witnesses testified that they had purchased liquor from defendant at his home at different times. While the liquor furnished by the defendant on the 21st day of September was all sold and delivered at the same time, the transaction constituted separate sales to the three witnesses mentioned in connection therewith. At the defendant's request the court required the district attorney to elect the sale upon which he would rely for a conviction, and he selected that made to the constable.

[2] In reading the information to the jury the clerk, doubtless through inadvertence, read that part thereof which charges a previous conviction, contrary to the express provisions of sections 1025 and 1093 of the Penal Code. Appellant contends that this constitutes prejudicial error. It is probable that the clerk's error escaped the attention of the court and the attorneys for both parties, because no reference thereto appears in the record. The sale of the liquor, upon which the prior conviction was had, was properly admitted in evidence in support of the charge of maintaining a nuisance, which is a continuing offense. People v. Frankovich, 64 Cal. App. 184, 190, 221 P. 671; McDonough v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 299 F. 30. It is the previous conviction, not the offense of which a defendant has been previously convicted, which section 1025 provides must not be "alluded to on the trial," in case it is admitted by the defendant. With such proof properly in evidence, the additional fact that he had been convicted of that offense would have little weight with the jury. Relative to such prior sale, a witness for the prosecution, who had testified that he had purchased liquor from defendant prior to September, 1925, was examined as follows:

> "Q. When was it and how much did you buy? A. I can't recollect the date, about two years ago. That case was disposed of and Mr. Jones was fined at that time.
> "Mr. Reagh: We will move to strike out the answer on the ground that this is outside of the statutes of limitations, and it is prior to the time of the plea alleged in the information.
> "The Court: The motion is denied."

The ruling was correct, because directed to the whole of the answer, and the first part thereof was properly admitted as bearing upon the charge of maintaining a nuisance. While the defendant could not be convicted of making a sale or maintaining a nuisance at a time more than one year prior to the filing of the information, evidence thereof was admissible as a circumstance tending to prove that his possession of liquor at the time charged was for the purpose of unlawful sale. The information herein was filed November 3, 1925. If it had charged that defendant maintained a nuisance on the 5th of November, 1924, it would hardly be contended that a sale, made by him a few days prior to November 3, 1924, could not be shown for the mere reason that the prosecution of defendant for making such sale was barred by the statute of limitations. It is the prosecution of the crime of making such a sale that is barred in one year, not the proof of the sale as tending to establish another crime. The real question is whether the sale given in evidence was so disconnected or remote as to have no logical tendency to prove the crime charged, but the objection did not raise that question. In answer to a question by his own counsel, the defendant stated that "one time I was selling it there." In view of all the foregoing facts and circumstances, it does not appear that the defendant's case was prejudiced by the inadvertent reading of the charge of a previous conviction.

[3] One of the witnesses for the prosecution is an Indian. Counsel for appellant say:

> "On cross-examination the defendant essayed to show that the witness, admittedly an Indian, was a ward of the government. The defendant's avowed purpose was to show discreditable conduct on the part of the officers in willfully and unnecessarily violating the federal statutes governing the giving liquor to Indians who are wards of the government." It is sufficient to say that a witness may not be impeached "by evidence of particular wrongful acts." Code Civ. Proc., § 2051.

[4] Two witnesses for the prosecution testified that they were detectives employed by the district attorney, and were paid for their services, and expected to be paid for their attendance at the trial. They were asked on cross-examination how much they expected to be paid, how much had been paid them in other cases, the total amount they had been paid, and other similar questions, to all of which the court sustained objections made by the district attorney. The rulings were not prejudicially erroneous. People v. Breen, 130 Cal. 72, 62 P. 408; People v. Tomalty, 14 Cal. App. 224, 235, 111 P. 513.

After one of the detectives had left the witness stand, he was immediately recalled by counsel for defendant and asked: "What was the threat you made against me when you passed me going outside of the courtroom?" The witness answered: "You called me a stool pigeon."

The district attorney objected to the question and there followed a colloquy between the court and respective counsel, but no ruling upon the objection appears to have been made. Counsel for defendant stated that he desired to make an offer of proof relating to the alleged threat and was willing to make it outside of the hearing of the jury. The court replied that the matter would be taken up later and directed the witness to remain within call. Nothing further was done in the matter. Appellant's contention that he was not permitted to examine the witness in relation to such threats does not appear to be supported by the record.

[5] One of the detectives testified on cross-examination that he was enabled to secure liquor from defendant by giving him the names of bootleggers in Oroville. On redirect examination the witness, without objection by defendant, gave the names of several persons who, he said, were bootleggers. On recross-examination counsel for defendant examined the witness at some length relative to his transactions with such bootleggers, and finally the district attorney objected to any further examination along that line. The objection was properly sustained, as the whole matter was immaterial. Appellant says that it was "competent for Jones to show that the men named were not bootleggers." The statement contains a sufficient reason for sustaining the objection. It would have been highly improper in the middle of defendant's trial to have tried the question of whether several other persons were guilty of similar offenses.

[6] The court refused to give the following instruction requested by defendant:

> "In connection with the second count in the information, I charge you that the defendant under the law had a right to possess liquor in his private dwelling house for the personal consumption of himself and family, and of any bona fide guest he might entertain therein."

The instruction is too broad and comprehensive. "The only instance in which the possession of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes is recognized as lawful is where the liquor was obtained before the act went into effect, and is kept in the owner's dwelling for use therein by him, his family, and his bona fide guests." Cunard Steamship Co. v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 100, 43 S. Ct. 504, 67 L. Ed. 894, 27 A. L. R. 1306.

[7] The court instructed the jury as follows:

> "Under the said information you may find the defendant guilty of either, both, or neither of the charges set forth in said information, accordingly as you are convinced as to the truth of said charges."

Appellant contends that the jury probably understood from this instruction "that they must either acquit of both charges or convict of both charges." There is no merit in the contention. It must be presumed that the trial judge so read the instruction as to convey to the minds of the jurors the correct meaning thereof as indicated by the punctuation.

Appellant complains of statements made by the district attorney in his argument to the jury. No complaint or objections were made at the time, and the defendant did not assign such statements as misconduct, or ask the court to instruct the jury to disregard them. The statements were not of such character as to merit discussion thereof in the absence of any objection thereto at the trial.

The remaining contentions of the appellant are unimportant and wholly without merit.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

CALIFORNIA BEAN GROWERS' ASS'N v. C. H. & O. B. FULLER CO., Inc.

(Civ. 5530.)

1. Corporations 🔑503(3)—To defeat motion to change venue, when corporation defendant's residence is in another county, plaintiff must show contract was made, or was to be performed, or breach occurred, in county where sued on (Const. art. 12, § 16).

Where, on motion to change venue, corporation defendant has shown that its principal place of business is in another county, to defeat motion, plaintiff must, under Const. art. 12, § 16, show that contract sued on was made, or was to be performed, or that the obligation or liability arose, or breach occurred, in county where action was brought.

2. Contracts 🔑145.

Place at which contract bears date is only prima facie place where it was made.

3. Evidence 🔑471(2)—Testimony that contract was made in certain county was mere conclusion, not probative fact, where fact in dispute was place of making.

Where, on motion to change venue, fact in dispute was where contract was made, witness should state probative facts, and witness' statement that it was made in certain county was but his conclusion, without probative value.

4. Corporations 🔑503(2)—Where defendant corporation signed contract in one county, and plaintiff subsequently signed in another county, plaintiff could maintain action in latter, since contract was made there (Const. art. 12, § 16).

Where, notwithstanding contract recited it was signed in certain county, it appeared that defendant corporation signed it as indicated, but plaintiff signed it later in another county, contract was made in latter county, and hence action could be maintained therein on contract, in view of Const. art. 12, § 16, though defendant's principal place of business was in former county.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by the California Bean Growers' Association against the C. H. & O. B. Fuller Company, Inc. From an order granting a motion for change of venue, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sapiro & Hayes and Sapiro, Levy & Hayes, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. A. Freeman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an appeal from an order granting the motion of the defendant corporation changing the place of trial from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the city where the principal place of business of the defendant corporation is situated.

[1] The plaintiff is a nonprofit, co-operative association, without capital stock, organized and doing business under the laws of the state of California, and having its principal place of business in San Francisco; it was organized by a large number of growers of beans to enable the growers to market their produce; the defendant and the plaintiff executed a contract, and the principal action was brought to recover damages for an alleged breach of that contract. On the hearing of the motion it transpired and at this time the parties concede that the defendant is a corporation having its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles. Both parties concede that it is the settled law of this state that, in applying the provisions of section 16 of article 12 of the state Constitution:

> "The rule is that when the corporation has shown that its principal place of business, which is its residence, is in another county, to defeat the motion for a change of venue the burden of proof is upon plaintiff, in an action like this, to show that the contract was made, or was to be performed, or that the obligation or liability arose, or the breach occurred in the county where the action is brought (citing cases)." Hammond v. Ocean Shore Dev. Co., 22 Cal. App. 167, 169, 133 P. 978, 979.

Accordingly, on the hearing of the motion in the trial court and again in presenting the matter in this court, the plaintiff endeavored to show: (1) The contract upon which the action is brought was made in San Francisco; (2) the contract was to be performed in San Francisco; and (3) the breach occurred in San Francisco. If the plaintiff made a showing that was sufficient on any one of the grounds stated, the order should be reversed. The respondent contends that the contract was made in Santa Barbara county. In support of this contention it calls to our attention that the ending of the contract is as follows:

> "Read, considered, and signed at Lompoc, Cal., this 17th day of August, 1921. [Seal] California Bean Growers' Association, by C. L. Danly, Secretary-Treasurer. C. H. and O. B. Fuller Co., by O. B. Fuller, Pres."

In framing its complaint the plaintiff pleaded the contract in haec verba. The complaint was verified by C. L. Danly. The affidavit of C. H. Fuller presented by the defendant on the hearing of the motion, among other things, contained the statement:

> "That said contract was made * * * in the county of Santa Barbara, state of California."

[2] Thereupon the respondent contends that the showing made before the trial court was to the effect that the contract was made in Santa Barbara county. The respondent also argues:

> "The place at which a contract bears date is held to be prima facie the place where the contract was made (citing cases)." Hammond v. Ocean Shore Dev. Co., 22 Cal. App. 167, 170, 133 P. 978, 980.

[3] The appellant replies that it concedes the rule, as last quoted, to be sound in the absence of other evidence, but it claims that there was other evidence before the trial court on the hearing of the motion. Turning to the facts relied on by the respondent, the appellant claims that the statement in Mr. Fuller's affidavit is but the conclusion of the affiant. We think that that contention is correct. On the hearing of the motion to change the place of trial the very fact in dispute was the question as to where the contract was made. When such is the case, the witness should state the probative facts and leave the court or jury to draw its conclusion therefrom. Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 275, 279, 12 P. 161; Winslow v. Glendale Light & Power Co., 164 Cal. 688, 689, 690, 130 P. 427.

[4] We turn therefore to the additional facts that were before the trial court, and which appear in the bill of exceptions. In resisting the motion to change the place of trial the plaintiff presented the affidavit of C. L. Danly, its secretary-treasurer. Among other things contained in the affidavit are the following:

> "That the above-entitled action is based upon an agreement in writing executed as in said complaint set forth, and a copy of which is attached to said complaint and marked Exhibit A thereto; that said Exhibit A was signed by defendant as indicated thereon, on the 17th day of August, 1921, at Lompoc, county of Santa Barbara, state of California; that on said 17th day of August, 1921, said Exhibit A was not signed and did not bear the signature nor seal of plaintiff; that said Exhibit A on the said 17th day of August, 1921, or shortly thereafter, together with an application for membership in plaintiff association signed by the defendant, was forwarded by mail to the plaintiff at its office and place of business in said city and county of San Francisco; that on or about the 25th day of August, 1921, said Exhibit A and said application of defendant for membership in plaintiff association, and the offer to contract therein contained was delivered to, received by and accepted by plaintiff in the said city and county of San Francisco, and the said application for membership was acted upon, and certificate of membership in plaintiff association issued to defendant in the said city and county of San Francisco, and the contract contained in said Exhibit A was then and there entered into by plaintiff, and plaintiff's signature and seal were thereto affixed at plaintiff's office and principal place of business in the said city and county of San Francisco, by C. L. Danly, the affiant, on plaintiff's behalf, and thereunto was duly authorized, and not elsewhere; and no application for membership in plaintiff association was received nor acted upon, nor membership certificate therein applied for issued, and no signature of plaintiff or affiant, or of any one in plaintiff's behalf was affixed to said bean crop agreement of which Exhibit A is a copy, nor was any seal of plaintiff affixed thereto at any other time or place or in any other manner than as aforesaid. That said contract upon which plaintiff's action is based was made as above set forth in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and not elsewhere."

The appellant offered no evidence contradicting the probative facts contained in the affidavit of Mr. Danly. There being no showing to the contrary, we must assume the probative facts to be as stated in that affidavit. The question as to what conclusion should be drawn from such probative facts is not an open one in this state. A similar question arose in the case of Harrigan v. Home Life Ins. Co., 128 Cal. 531, 58 P. 180, 61 P. 99. Following the doctrine of that case we must hold that the contract involved in the principal action was made in San Francisco. It is unnecessary therefore to discuss the other contentions made by the appellant.

The order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. HALBERT. (Cr. 1324.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 7, 1926. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 2, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑409—Defendant's admission held sufficient to establish fact that he was driving automobile at time of collision causing death.

Corpus delicti having been established by evidence apart from any admission or confession by defendant, testimony as to his admission that he was driving car at time of collision causing death was sufficient to establish such facts.

2. Automobiles 🔑355(13).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of manslaughter by automobile, under Pen. Code, § 192.

3. Automobiles 🔑352 — Information charging automobile struck named person and proof that it struck automobile in which he was riding held to present no variance (Vehicle Act 1923, § 141).

That information for violating Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 562) § 141, by failure to stop after accident, charged that automobile driven by plaintiff collided with and struck named person, while evidence showed that it struck automobile in which such person was riding, held to present no variance.

4. Criminal law 🔑406(6) — Defendant's admission that he was driving automobile at time of collision held admissible in trial for failing to stop and render assistance (Vehicle Act 1923, § 141).

Corpus delicti having been established by competent evidence, exclusive of any confession or admission by defendant, that latter's automobile collided with another car and proceeded without occupant rendering necessary assistance, defendant's admission that he was driving it at time was admissible in trial for violating Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 562) § 141.

5. Criminal law 🔑388.

For experimental evidence to be of any value, conditions affecting result must be substantially identical with those existing at time of, and operating to produce, particular effect.

6. Criminal law 🔑388—Jury may allow for minor differences, where principal conditions in experiment are same as those of evidence against which directed.

Where principal conditions in experiment are same as those of evidence against which it is directed, jury may weigh and make allowances for minor differences, which affect weight not competency of evidence.

7. Criminal law 🔑388—Testimony that witness, standing where eyewitnesses of collision stood, could not tell whether car passed to left of center of street, as they testified, held erroneously excluded.

Testimony of witness, standing, about six months after automobile collision, at points where eyewitnesses were at such time, that he could not tell whether car crossing intersection passed to left of center line, as they testified, held erroneously excluded.

8. Witnesses 🔑270(2)—Police officer's testimony on cross-examination held properly excluded as immaterial, though his direct testimony was inconsistent with his testimony at preliminary examination.

Police officer's testimony, on cross-examination by defendant, that latter would say nothing when arrested, held properly excluded as immaterial, though his testimony at preliminary examination was inconsistent with his testimony in chief.

9. Criminal law 🔑800(1)—Instruction that one recklessly operating automobile is guilty of manslaughter should he thereby "occasion" another's death held not error, as not defining proximate "cause" or limiting remoteness of occasion.

Instruction that one recklessly operating automobile without due respect for others' safety, and not using means reasonably at his command to prevent collision, is guilty of manslaughter, "should he thereby occasion" another's death, held not error, as not defining proximate cause or limiting remoteness of occasion; word "occasion" being used as exact equivalent of "cause."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Cause; Occasion.]

10. Automobiles 🔑357—Instruction that prosecution must prove that failure to use due caution in operating automobile was proximate cause of injury held properly refused under evidence.

In trial for manslaughter by automobile, instruction that prosecution must prove, not only failure to use due caution, but that such failure was proximate cause of injury, held properly refused as based on pretense that deceased was killed by his own automobile, whereas he was injured through instantaneous, concurrent, and united action of his and defendant's automobiles.

11. Criminal law 🔑800(2)—Instruction not defining "willful," "wanton," and "wantonness," used in explaining "gross negligence," held not error.

Instruction not defining words "willful," "wanton," and "wantonness," used in explaining phrase "gross negligence," in trial for manslaughter by automobile, held not error; such words being used in ordinary sense.

12. Homicide 🔑293 — "Contributory negligence" held sufficiently defined in instruction as negligence of person injured contributing to injury.

"Contributory negligence" held sufficiently defined, in instruction that such negligence is no defense to charge of manslaughter, by phrase, "that is, negligence on the part of the person injured which contributed to the injury."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contributory Negligence.]

13. Criminal law 🔑829(9, 18)—Refused instruction on reasonable doubt and presumption of innocence held sufficiently covered by instruction given.

Refused instruction that prosecution must prove every material element of offense beyond reasonable doubt, and that presumption of innocence has weight of evidence for defendant throughout trial until satisfied of his guilt beyond such doubt, held sufficiently covered by instruction clearly announcing usual rule as to presumption of innocence and requirement that guilt be established to moral certainty before conviction.

14. Criminal law 🔑665(1), 1144(12).

Generally, exclusion of witnesses and exceptions thereto are matters of discretion, in exercise of which error will not be implied.

15. Criminal law 🔑665(2).

Excepting police officers from order excluding witnesses held not abuse of discretion, in absence of more particular showing of prejudice than objection that they would be important witnesses.

16. Criminal law 🔑1170(2) — Exclusion of testimony that witness, standing where eyewitnesses were at time of collision, could not see whether automobile was driven to left of center of street, as they testified, held not reversible error.

In trial for manslaughter by automobile, exclusion of testimony that witness, standing where eyewitnesses were at time of collision, could not see whether automobile passed to left of center line of street, held not reversible error, in view of undisputed testimony of six unimpeached eyewitnesses that defendant's automobile was driven on wrong side of road.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Coy Halbert was convicted of manslaughter and a violation of Vehicle Act, § 141, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Perky, McConnell & Hill, of Long Beach, and B. F. Griffith, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was found guilty under counts 1 and 3 of the information. Count 2 charged the offense of violation of section 112 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 553), but at the trial count 2 was dismissed.

American avenue is a street running north and south in the city of Long Beach. State street is an east and west highway which crosses American avenue and is 36 feet wide between curbs. Extending along the center of American avenue is a right of way, 72 feet in width, of the Pacific Electric Railway. Between the west line of the right of way and the west curb line of the avenue the width of the driveway is 31 feet. On the east side of the right of way the width of the driveway is 26 feet. State street is open for traffic across American avenue.

[1, 2] At about 1 o'clock on the night of March 29, 1925, one Frank Jones was driving a Ford roadster, going south on the west side of American avenue. At about the same time a Ford coupé, which was the property of defendant, was being driven toward the west on State street across American avenue. One of the disputed questions in this case is the question whether or not the defendant was driving his car or was there at all. He claims that he was not there. But it is admitted that there was a collision between these two Ford automobiles. The roadster was turned over in such manner that its driver, Jones, was crushed and injured so that on the same night he died. According to the testimony of witnesses to the accident, the left front wheel of the coupé struck the left rear wheel of the roadster and whirled it around and turned it over. There is testimony to the effect that when the roadster was hit it was south of the center line of State street. It follows as a necessary inference from this fact that at the moment of collision the defendant's automobile was on the wrong side of the road along which it was traveling. After the collision the Ford coupé "stopped just an instant and then went right west" and disappeared; no one got out of this machine; no one went from it to the injured person.

The manslaughter charge is contained in count 1 of the information. As shown by the evidence, the crime committed was involuntary manslaughter. This crime is the unlawful killing of a human being, without malice, when done "in commission of an unlawful act, not amounting to felony; or in the commission of a lawful act which might produce death, in an unlawful manner, or without due caution and circumspection." Pen. Code, § 192.

The foregoing statement of facts shows that the evidence was sufficient to prove that the driver of the Ford coupé was guilty of involuntary manslaughter. The only additional fact necessary to sustain the conviction would be the fact that the defendant was the driver of the Ford coupé. The corpus delicti having been established by evidence apart from any admission or confession made by defendant, there remains no doubt that the fact that the defendant was the driver of the offending machine may be established by admission made by him of that fact. People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 48, 53, 77 P. 777. The record contains testimony showing admissions made by the defendant to the effect that he was the driver of his car at the time of the collision. We will consider later appellant's further contention that the evidence of statements made by him was improperly received. Assuming for the present that such evidence was properly received, it is sufficient to establish the fact that he was present in and was actually driving his car at the time of the collision. The conclusion follows that the evidence as a whole is sufficient to sustain the verdict of guilty of manslaughter under the first count of the information.

[3] Count 3 of the information, under which also the defendant was convicted, is the crime of violation of section 141 of the California Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 517; Deering's Gen. Laws [1923 Ed.] Act 5128.) That section reads as follows:

> "Duty to Stop in Case of Accident; Penalty. —The driver of any vehicle which strikes any person or collides with any other vehicle shall immediately stop and give his name and address and the names and addresses of all passengers not exceeding five in his vehicle, also the registration number of his vehicle, to the person struck or the occupants of the vehicle collided with, and shall also render to such persons all necessary assistance, including the carrying of such persons to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment, if such treatment is required or if such carrying is requested by the persons struck or any occupant of such vehicle collided with. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years or in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The evidence in the present record shows that defendant's vehicle collided with the vehicle then being driven by Jones, that the defendant's car stopped momentarily only and then proceeded on its way, and that no occupant of defendant's car rendered necessary assistance or any assistance to the injured person, although that person was manifestly in a condition requiring immediate aid.

Appellant claims that there was a variance between count 3 of the information and the proof, in that the information charged that the automobile driven by the plaintiff "did then and there collide with and strike a human being, to wit, Frank Jones," etc., whereas the evidence is limited to the fact that appellant's automobile struck, not Frank Jones, but only the automobile in which Jones was riding; that, in fact, "the direct cause of the death of deceased was his own auto." This claim of appellant strikingly suggests Hood's narrative of the case of Miss Kilmansegg, who, according to the coroner's jury, was guilty of suicide, "because her own leg had killed her." We are of the opinion that the terms of the charge (which conform to the terms of the statute which we have quoted) are sufficient to include a personal injury caused by collision between the two automobiles. It would be an unreasonably narrow construction of the statute to hold that the crime there defined cannot be committed unless the automobile of the offending party actually touches the person of the injured human being. Unquestionably, a personal assault may be made by a blow delivered against the clothing which covers a man's body. Under the circumstances of an automobile collision a blow given by A's automobile to B's automobile, whereby B's automobile turns over upon and injures B, is in effect a blow delivered against B's body. This being so, the variance in the proof, for which appellant argues, is not established.

[4] It follows also that the corpus delicti, consisting of a crime committed by the driver of appellant's automobile, was established by competent evidence exclusive of any confession or admission made by the defendant. We thus arrive at the conclusion, applicable to the third count as well as to the first count of the information, that there is no merit in appellant's contention (based upon the claimed absence of competent proof of the corpus delicti) that the court erred in receiving evidence of his admission that he was in fact the driver of his automobile at the time of the collision.

[5-7] Appellant contends that the court erred in sustaining objections to questions propounded by him to a witness by whom appellant was seeking to show certain physical conditions on the ground and consequent physical impossibilities (as appellant's counsel claimed), in disparagement and contradiction of testimony introduced by the state. Alfred D. Mitchell was the witness. He stated that he was familiar with the location of the driveways at the intersection of American avenue and State street, and that he was present at that place at 9 o'clock on Monday evening, September 21, 1925. This date was about six months later than the date of the transaction which was under investigation in this case. The court refused to allow this witness to state what were the conditions of the light, or where the witness stood with reference to the street intersection, at the time of his visit there on the evening of September 21st. The court then sustained objection to three successive questions which were similar in character, except that the point of view was shifted in the several questions; but they were all directed to the purpose of showing how much or how little could be seen at the stated time from the several points of view. The third question will aptly illustrate the subject-matter of this particular inquiry:

> "Q. I will ask you if, standing at a point on the east driveway of American avenue 50 feet from the intersection of the east driveway of American avenue and State street, and looking northwest toward the intersection of the western driveway of American avenue and State street, if you were able to tell whether a car driven west on State street and crossing said intersection passed to the left or right of the center line of said intersection?"

Appellant's attorney was proceeding to ask further questions apparently of similar import when the court said:

> "I will be consistent in my rulings, so there is no use of pursuing it any further. You have got your record."

We presume that the purpose of these questions was that indicated by counsel for appellant as hereinbefore stated. Eyewitnesses of the collision which occurred on the night of March 29, 1925, had testified that at the moment of the collision they were present at certain points, which were substantially identical with the positions assumed for Mr. Mitchell in the question propounded to him. This may be illustrated by the testimony of Mrs. Elkins. She testified that immediately preceding the collision between the two automobiles she and her husband were driving northward on the east driveway of American avenue just south of State street; that she saw a Ford roadster hit on the rear by a Ford coupé. Definitely and in detail she described the collision and the results of the collision as plainly seen by her. She located the position of the Ford roadster when it was hit, and indicated that position as being south of the center line of State street.

Appellant contends that it was the duty of the court to allow him to introduce the aforesaid offered evidence of Mitchell in order to assist the jury in determining whether or not it was a physical possibility for any person, under any atmospheric conditions, from the said several points of view, to fix with any degree of certainty the center line of State street across its intersection with American avenue, so as to be able to testify to the position of appellant's automobile with respect to the center line of State street while his automobile was traveling west at said street intersection.

In People v. Hadley, 175 Cal. 118, 165 P. 442, the defendant was convicted of murder committed at night while burglarizing the house of the deceased. Mrs. Young, a neighbor who heard the shots, went to her window and saw a colored man, whom she identified as the defendant, "sneaking along in front of the house of the deceased," and then climbing over a fence. The defendant offered the testimony of a witness for the purpose of showing that under the conditions existing at the time of the homicide Mrs. Young could not have identified the defendant. The court sustained a number of objections to the questions asked of this witness, which questions apparently were for the purpose of showing the conditions existing when the witness made his observation, so that the same might be considered in comparison with the conditions existing at the time to which Mrs. Young referred in her testimony. The district attorney was insisting that before the impeaching evidence could be received precisely similar conditions (including equality of eyesight) must be established for the purposes of the experiment. Referring to this, the Supreme Court said:

> "The court did not rule upon this statement, but it is quite apparent that the prosecuting attorney believed that unless the 'experiment' touching the ability of one person to recognize another was carried out under identical conditions, even to the last leaf on the tree, with those which obtained when the witness Mrs. Young testified that she identified the defendant, the evidence was inadmissible. Of course such is not the law. Nor did the court rule that such was the law."

In order that experimental evidence in corroboration or disproof shall be of any value, it must be shown that the conditions affecting the result are, as near as may be, "identical with those existing at the time of and operating to produce the particular effect. An absolute identity is, of course, impossible, but a substantial identity must exist to give the evidence value." County of Sonoma v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 32, 39, 57 P. 681, 683. Where the principal conditions in the experiment are the same as those of the evidence against which the experiment is directed, the jury may weigh and make allowance for minor differences. These affect the weight, not the competency, of the evidence. People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 568, 56 P. 424. The foregoing decisions all assume that evidence obtained by means of experiment is, under appropriate circumstances, receivable as a means of testing the reliability of testimony concerning facts observed by a witness. This case, as developed by the evidence for the prosecution, was left in a situation where the evidence offered by defendant should have been received. Therefore the court erred in ruling out the proposed questions. This error, however, applies only to the charge of manslaughter, and not to the third count of the information.

[8] Under point 5 of his brief appellant claims that the court erred in sustaining objections to the questions propounded by him to the witness Holland for the purpose of showing that Holland had made at other times statements inconsistent with his present testimony. Appellant claims that he had a right to introduce this evidence because he was surprised and prejudiced by the unexpected answers of the witness, which were different from testimony given by him at the preliminary examination of the charge against appellant. The testimony of Holland at this time was offered in relation to a subordinate issue, which was the right of the prosecution to introduce in evidence the testimony of the witness Iseminger concerning statements made by appellant at the place where he was arrested at or near the place where his Ford coupé was found shortly after the accident. Iseminger testified that when he and Officer Holland arrived at the scene of the accident at American avenue and State street a few minutes after that accident had occurred he and Holland had been given the number of the Ford coupé which had disappeared from the scene. Following a clue, they found this Ford coupé, bearing that number and also found the defendant near the coupé and walking away from the direction of the place where it was standing. Iseminger said that at that time and place the defendant made certain statements which the witness in general terms asserted were made freely and voluntarily and without any threat or violence or promise of immunity or reward having been made to obtain such statement. It was for the purpose of contradicting this testimony and thus sustaining appellant's objection to the introduction of the purported statement that he was permitted to examine the witness Holland concerning the circumstances under which the statement to which the witness Iseminger was about to testify had been made.

After the conclusion of the evidence received concerning the foundation for introduction of said statement, Iseminger was permitted to testify to the statement which he said was made by appellant. In substance his answer was that when he and Holland found appellant near the said Ford coupé appellant said that one of the two caps found in the car was his own. "I asked him where the other fellow was, and he said there was no one with him, and I said, 'Yes; there was some other people in the car with you, wasn't there?' And he said, 'No; there was no one with me.' I said, 'Who does this other cap belong to?' He said his brother was with him then, and I asked him where his brother went to, where his brother was, and he said he didn't know, and I believe that was about all the conversation at that time."

Turning now to the matter of the court's ruling, which is the subject of appellant's complaint at this time, we find that counsel for appellant asked Holland, "Q. And isn't it a fact that he wouldn't say anything, so you handcuffed him to the front wheel of the car?" The witness having answered in the negative, appellant then sought to introduce testimony given by Holland at the preliminary examination, which reads as follows:

> "A. Well, I went—my partner was there, Mr. Iseminger; he came there when I was bringing him back down Twentieth street, and I turned him over to him, and right there we both questioned him. He would not say anything, so we handcuffed him to the front wheel of the car, and I went over and tried to call in to the station, but the telephone give me no connections; at that time other officers had been sent out there, and we turned him over to them."

From the foregoing it appears that, even according to the testimony so given by Holland at the preliminary examination, no part of the alleged statement was obtained from the defendant at or after the time when he was handcuffed. Thus far we have assumed that the statements made by appellant to these officers while they were on the street where the coupé was found were statements in the nature of a confession. The fact is, however, that those statements did not constitute a confession, but merely were admissions of facts which were in themselves insufficient to authorize a conviction upon either one of the two counts on which the defendant was convicted. This being so, the rule governing proof of confessions, and which requires that their voluntary character be first established, had no application to the real matter then at issue before the court, and all of the testimony offered by appellant in connection with his examination at that time of the witness Holland was immaterial, at least so far as counts 1 and 3 are concerned. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 664, 174 P. 892.

[9] Concerning the court's instruction to the jury, appellant assigns error in thirteen of the instructions given and error in refusal of eight instructions requested by him and refused by the court. A few points only appear to require comment thereon in this place. Instruction 2, after defining the duty of an automobile driver to exercise reasonable care and to prevent injury to others states that if a person knowing the danger, etc., recklessly, etc., operates his automobile without due respect for the rights and safety of others, and does not use such means as are reasonably within his command to prevent a collision, the law holds him criminally responsible for such negligence or willful omission of duty, and "should he thereby occasion the death of another, he is, under the law, guilty of manslaughter." The principal criticism directed against this instruction is that it fails to define proximate cause or to limit the remoteness of the "occasion." As to the latter point, it is manifest that the verb "occasion" as used was exactly equivalent to the word "cause."

[10] The suggested point concerning "proximate cause" is further emphasized by appellant in connection with his requested instruction No. 15, which was refused by the court. This requested instruction reads as follows:

> "It is not sufficient to warrant a conviction under count 1 of the information that the prosecution prove, and you find from the evidence that the defendant failed to use due caution and circumspection under the circumstances, but the prosecution must further prove and you must further find from the evidence that the failure to use due caution and circumspection was the proximate cause, that is, that cause which in natural and continuous sequence unbroken by any sufficient intervening cause or without which the injury would not have occurred."

The principle involved has been frequently affirmed. A recent instance is People v. Wilson, 193 Cal. 512, 517, 226 P. 5, where the Supreme Court, in defining the conditions under which the defendant might be found guilty of involuntary manslaughter arising out of his careless or unlawful manner of driving an automobile, included in its statement the apparently undoubted assumption that the death of the injured person must have been "proximately due to" defendant's violation of the requirements of law which applied him under the facts stated. But we are further of the opinion that the evidence herein did not justify defendant in demanding that this rule of "proximate cause" be included in the instructions to the jury. The request for this instruction was based upon the pretense, to which we have adverted, to the effect that Mr. Jones was killed by his own automobile. But the actual facts concerning the immediate results of the accident were not in doubt or dispute. From the circumstances as proved, it is plain that Jones received his injuries through the instantaneous, concurrent, and united action of the two automobiles. Practically, there were only two really disputed facts in the case. These related to the evidence that the defendant was the driver of his car at the time of the accident and the evidence that the collision occurred at a point south of the center of State street.

[11] One of appellant's objections to instruction 12 arises from the fact that in explaining the phrase "gross negligence" the court used such words as "willful," "wanton," and "wantonness," as in the phrase "with a wanton and reckless disregard for the safety of others," without defining the words "willful," "wanton," and "wantonness." These words were used in their ordinary sense as commonly understood in the English language. A jury which did not understand them would not understand an explanation of them.

[12] Concerning instruction 13, which informed the jury that contributory negligence is not a defense to a charge of manslaughter, complaint is made that the instruction does not define contributory negligence. But the court did define it, sufficiently for the instant purpose, by using the phrase, "that is, negligence on the part of the person injured which contributed to the injury."

> "The information filed against the defendant is merely a formal accusation, and must not be considered by you as evidence or allowed to prejudice you or influence your minds against the defendant. In a criminal case the prosecution must prove every material element of the offense charged beyond a reasonable doubt. Probabilities, or that the greater weight or preponderance of the evidence supports the allegations of the information, will not warrant a conviction. The law presumes the defendant to be innocent of the offense charged until he is proven guilty by competent evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. This presumption of innocence has the weight and effect of evidence in the defendant's behalf, and continues with him throughout the trial until from all the evidence you are satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

The court modified this instruction by striking out all of it except the first sentence. It was indicated in the judge's notation on the instruction that the stricken portions were omitted because they were covered in other instructions given to the jury. Counsel for appellant assert that the parts stricken are not sufficiently covered in the instructions given to obtain for appellant a fair and impartial trial. They have not pointed out the particulars in which the instructions given, in relation to the presumption of innocence and the doctrine of reasonable doubt, are defective. The court did clearly announce to the jury the rule as usually given, covering the presumption of innocence and the requirement that before conviction the guilt of a defendant must be established to a moral certainty, and that if there is reasonable doubt remaining the defendant should be acquitted.

[14, 15] Appellant contends that the court erred in excepting the witnesses who were police officers from its order granting appellant's request that all witnesses, while not testifying, be excluded from the courtroom. These officers were the witnesses who subsequently gave testimony covering defendant's admission to them of the fact that he was driving his car at the time of the accident. On examination of the transcript we find that the attorney for defendant objected to the presence of the police officers, for the reason that they would be important witnesses. No attempt was made to more definitely inform the judge concerning their relation to the case or the relative importance of the testimony to be given by them. The general rule is that the matter of exclusion of witnesses, and of exceptions to be made in such orders of exclusion, is discretionary, and that in the exercise of this discretion error will not be implied. In this instance, in the absence of any more particular showing to the trial court of prejudice that would probably arise from the presence in court of these persons, it does not appear that there was any abuse of discretion in the order as made.

[16] As has been stated, we think that the court erred when it sustained the objections to the questions asked of the witness Mitchell concerning the tests made by him at said street intersection on the evening of September 21st. It only remains to determine whether it is reasonably probable that the exclusion of that evidence prevented the defendant from having a fair trial. For the purposes of this question we must assume that if he had been permitted to answer the questions Mitchell would have testified that at the time stated, while standing at the points indicated in the questions, he would not have been able to tell whether a car driven west on State street and crossing said intersection passed to the left, or whether it passed to the right, of the center line of said intersection. We further assume (although it is not in the record) that it would have been proved that Mitchell had normal eyesight. The facts concerning the collision were established by six eyewitnesses. These were Mr. and Mrs. Elkins, Mr. and Mrs. Voss, and Mr. and Mrs. Rickert. These witnesses are in substantial agreement that the night was clear, and that the light was such that they had no difficulty in seeing. Mr. Elkins saw the collision, but could not state just where the cars came together. He stated, however, that the roadster when it was struck "pivoted on about 15 feet further, whirled around and turned over," and that he found it lying about 15 feet south of the south curb line of State street. Mrs. Elkins stated that she saw the Ford roadster hit on the rear by a Ford coupé, and that the roadster when it was hit was south of the center line of State street. Mr. Voss stated that the accident took place at the southwest corner of the intersection and south of the center line of State street. Mrs. Voss stated that the impact occurred south of the center line of State street. Mrs. Riskert stated that at the time of the impact the Ford roadster had cleared the center line of State street. Mr. Rickert stated that at the moment of impact the Ford roadster was about half way between the center of the intersection and the south curb line of State street.

There is nothing in the record tending to impeach the integrity of any of these six witnesses. They all agree that the light was sufficient for them to see clearly. Their testimony leaves no reasonable doubt that at the time of the collision defendant's automobile was driven on the wrong side of the road, and there is no evidence to the contrary. In view of the overwhelming effect of this evidence, it is almost impossible to believe that the jury could have found the fact to be contrary to the testimony of these witnesses, even if Mitchell had testified that at the time of the experiments made by him—and even if made under like conditions—he would not have been able to see whether an automobile was or was not south of the center line of State street. It is our conclusion that the error which we have found in the court's ruling in respect to this matter did not lead to any miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HOUSER, J.; YORK, J.

78 Cal. App. 380

PEOPLE v. MORHAR. (Cr. 1345.)

1. Arson ⚷37(1)—Insurance ⚷31.

Evidence held to sustain conviction of arson in the first degree and of destroying insured property, under Pen. Code, § 548.

2. Indictment and information ⚷110(7).

Information charging arson in the language of Pen. Code, § 447, need not state in what degree the crime was committed.

3. Arson ⚷21.

Information in prosecution for arson in first degree, alleging that building burned was occupied by a human being, held sufficient compliance with Pen. Code, § 452.

4. Arson ⚷18.

Information charging that defendant, at time and place stated, willfully set on fire and burned described building occupied by human being, with intent to destroy same, held to sustain conviction of arson in first degree.

5. Arson ⚷8.

Where defendant's wife and children actually occupied building burned, that they were not technically in possession was immaterial, in sustaining conviction for first degree arson, in view of Pen. Code, § 452.

6. Criminal law ⚷1170(1).

In arson prosecution, sustaining objections to testimony that defendant had certain sacred relics in the burned house, after the testimony was given, held not prejudicial error, where there was no order striking testimony from the record, and no instruction to disregard it.

7. Criminal law ⚷598(1).

If attorneys direct witnesses that they need not appear until a certain time, and the court is ready to receive their evidence before that time, it is within the court's discretion to refuse a continuance to secure them.

8. Witnesses ⚷389.

Asking, as impeaching questions, questions as to conversations, which had been propounded to defendant, and which he had denied, was proper.

9. Criminal law ⚷1170½(5).

Asking defendant impeaching questions as to conversations, which he admitted in part, and as to part of which he was evading, held harmless error, where answers of impeaching witness were not contradictory to defendant's.

10. Witnesses ⚷193.

Conversation between accused and wife was not privileged, where certain police officers were present when it took place.

11. Witnesses ⚷193.

A third person, overhearing a confidential communication between husband and wife, may testify to it.

12. Criminal law ⚷655(5).

Where accused's attorney summoned witnesses for specified time, and then excused them from obeying summons, so that court could not punish for disobeying the subpœnas, pertinent remarks by court in presence of jury were not misconduct.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Benjamin Morhar was convicted of arson in the first degree and of destroying insured property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Page, Nolan, Rohe & Hurt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Los Angeles county, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The appellant was convicted under two counts—the first of first degree arson; the second of destroying insured property, the crime specified in Pen. Code, § 548.

[1] The evidence is clearly sufficient to establish the fact that arson of the first degree was committed by some one in the burning of the house. At the time of the fire the house was occupied solely by the defendant and his wife and two young children. The fire occurred in the early morning, between 2 and 3 o'clock. It may be assumed, as was indicated, that the family had been several hours in bed. The house doors were locked. In escaping from the house, the occupants closed the doors, which locked them; the locks being spring locks. This was proved by the firemen, who were obliged to break open the doors. The defendant was found among the persons assembled outside the house. He was barefooted at that time. Later defendant obtained and put on a pair of shoes, and went with officers to the police station. The shoes carried an odor of kerosene. The officers called his attention to this fact, but he replied that the smell was like turpentine. At that time, according to the testimony of the witness Larimer, defendant said that he had only one pair of shoes. But at the trial defendant testified that the shoes to which the officers referred were used by him in working around the yard, and that he had not worn them the day before, but had worn another pair. This inconsistency in his statements derived its importance from the fact that at the time of the fire it was found that rags and other articles within the house and on the floor had been soaked with kerosene. If the jury believed that the defendant testified falsely concerning the shoes which he had worn in the house, such false testimony, under the circumstances, had a direct tendency to show guilty knowledge concerning the fire.

The defendant and his wife were owners of the house and furniture, both of which were heavily insured. Without further review of the evidence (all of which, however, we have examined), we conclude that, while the evidence against appellant is circumstantial, and not direct, it is sufficient. In this respect it is analogous to that produced in People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 328, 184 P. 389, 394, where the Supreme Court said:

> "It is the law that neither mere opportunity to commit a crime, nor perjured testimony, is sufficient to support a verdict of guilty. Nor are false statements or suspicious circumstances sufficient. It may be conceded that no one of the facts summarized would, if standing alone, be sufficient to uphold the verdict; but, when all the circumstances which the jury may have resolved from the evidence are considered together, it cannot be held on appeal that they are not sufficient to warrant an inference of guilt."

[2-5] The information in the first count charged that the defendant, at the time and place stated, did willfully, etc., set on fire and burn the described building, "then and there occupied by one Elizabeth Morhar, a human being, with intent to destroy the same." The information failed to specify that the burning was done in the nighttime. The verdict of the jury, as applied to this count, found the defendant "guilty of arson, a felony, and we find it to be arson of the first degree, as charged in count 1 of the information."

Appellant contends that the verdict is contrary to law, in that said first count of the information does not charge the public offense of which the defendant was convicted, to wit, arson of the first degree. The two reasons assigned for this contention are that the information did not charge that the burning occurred in the nighttime and that the information did not charge the burning of an inhabited building. In an information or indictment charging arson, in the language of section 447 of the Penal Code, it is not necessary that such information shall state in what degree the crime was committed. "That is for the jury to determine, from all the facts and circumstances developed in evidence." People v. Russell, 81 Cal. 616, 23 P. 418. Section 452 of the Penal Code reads as follows:

> "To constitute arson it is not necessary that a person other than the accused should have had ownership in the building set on fire. It is sufficient that at the time of the burning another person was rightfully in possession of, or was actually occupying such building, or any part thereof."

The statement in the information that the building was "then and there occupied by one Elizabeth Morhar, a human being," was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of section 452. There was no demurrer to the information, nor was any claim asserted by defendant in the court below that the information was subject to any legal objection. We think that the information sufficiently set forth in said count 1 a charge of arson, under which a conviction of arson in the first degree may be sustained. And the evidence shows that in fact the fire occurred in the nighttime, and that the house was then and there inhabited and actually occupied by Mrs. Morhar, as well as by the defendant and by their two children. That the wife and children were not technically "in possession" of the property is, under such circumstance of occupancy, an immaterial fact.

[6] In the third point raised by appellant he claims that certain evidence offered by him was erroneously excluded, to his prejudice. It is argued that this evidence was offered for the purpose of showing, not only that there was lack of motive for the defendant to commit the crime, but that it would be very improbable that he would have burned the house without taking the precaution of first removing certain sacred relics, which were kept in the house. The defendant testified that:

> "I had The Ten Commandments and a few things, you know. * * * I kept it with me all the time.
> "Q. What does it mean to you? A. It means a whole lot."
> On objection that this called for a conclusion of the witness the objection was sustained.
> "Is it part of your religion or—" "Same objection." "Objection sustained."
> The witness then testified that he had also wanted to get from the house, besides The Ten Commandments, a "taless," which was a present made to him when he was married.
> "Q. Has it any sginificance in your religion? A. Yes."

Following the answer, this was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and objection sustained. The attorney for defendant then said he wanted to produce this article, and intended to prove further by competent witnesses what such a thing means to a man of that type. Although the judge then stated that he did not believe such evidence competent, it was not offered at that time, nor does it appear that such evidence was offered later. The following is the only additional evidence to which we are referred on this point:

> "Q. How old were those commandments? A. About 100 years."
> Following the answer, the district attorney objected to this as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.
> "The Court: Objection sustained.
> "Q. How old was this taless you speak of? A. About 1,000 years."
> "District Attorney: Same objection.
> "The Court: Objection sustained."

Assuming that under the circumstances of this case the defendant had the right to offer evidence tending to prove that, by reason of certain religious beliefs and feelings, he would have been moved to preserve rather than to destroy property of religious significance to him, which was in the house at the time of the fire, nevertheless, we think that this record does not show prejudicial error. The essential answers were given before the objections to the questions were made, and there was no order striking from the record the answers thus given. Practically, if not technically, they remained before the jury, without any instruction that such evidence be disregarded. We think it is not reasonable to conclude that the rulings, made in the manner stated, and of which appellant complains, had any important influence against the defendant.

[7] A stipulation was entered into which apparently covers the entire objection on the exclusion of certain witnesses, the stipulation referred to being the stipulation whereby the court allowed a continuance of several hours, in order that defendant might obtain the evidence of two witnesses. This was done upon agreement of counsel for the defendant that he would not introduce the testimony of the very witnesses to the exclusion of whose testimony he is now objecting. If attorneys direct witnesses that they need not appear until a certain time, and the court is ready to receive their evidence before that time, we think it is within the discretion of the trial court to refuse a continuance requested for the purpose of producing those witnesses. The witnesses referred to as being excluded were not on hand to testify when their evidence was offered, and it appears from the record that they were not offered again as witnesses, and the record does not show if they were ever present when the jury was in the box.

[8, 9] The fourth objection of appellant is that certain attempted impeachment of defendant's testimony was improper and irregular. In laying the foundation for impeachment, the district attorney asked the defendant whether, at a certain time and place, and in the presence of certain parties, he had stated certain things. In reply the defendant had admitted some portions of the conversations, had been evasive as to others, and denied other parts or portions of the conversations in toto; and yet, when the people put on their evidence impeaching the statements of the defendant, they did not limit such so-called impeachment to the portion of the conversation denied, but asked as to each and all of the so-called conversations. The defendant objected, on the ground that there was therefore no proper foundation for the so-called impeaching questions. However, we hold that it was proper to ask as impeaching questions the questions as to conversations which had been propounded to the defendant and which he had denied. As to the other questions propounded, the answers of the so-called impeaching witness were not contradictory to those of the defendant, and were not such that the error in admitting them resulted injuriously to the defense.

[10, 11] The objection that certain conversation was a privileged conversation between defendant and his wife is answered by the very statement in the brief of the appellant wherein it shows that certain police officers were present when the conversation took place. This would deprive the conversation of standing as a privileged communication. "A third person, overhearing a confidential communication, may testify to it, for the same reason recognized in the privilege of a client's communication with his attorney." Wigmore on Evidence, § 2339. Also see cases cited in such section and section 2326. Also 40 Cyc. 2359; Ann. Cas. 1918A, 441; People v. Swaile, 12 Cal. App. 192, 107 P. 134.

[12] As a fifth objection it is claimed that there was misconduct on the part of the court in making certain remarks in the presence of the jury. Such remarks were called forth by the nature of the examination conducted by the attorney in summoning witnesses for a certain time, and excusing such witnesses from obeying such summons, thus placing the court in such a position that it could not punish witnesses for contempt for not appearing at the time specified in the subpœnas served upon them. The remarks made by the judge were pertinent to the situation presented, and were not such as to constitute misconduct.

An examination of the entire record in this case fails to disclose any error that has in any way resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

HOUSER, J. I dissent. Particularly am I unable to concur in the conclusion stated in the majority opinion that the jury was uninfluenced by reason of the rulings made by the trial court in the matter of the attempt on the part of defendant to prove the significance to him of the several articles intimately connected with his religious belief.

At the outset it may be well to consider the fact that the evidence directly connecting defendant with the commission of the offense of which he was charged was very weak. As indicating the opinion of the judge of the trial court with reference thereto, it appears that at the conclusion of the case for the prosecution, after defendant had made a motion that the court advise the jury to acquit the defendant, the judge made several statements to the attorneys representing the respective parties to the controversy, which remarks clearly show that he was extremely loath to submit the case to the jury. Among the expressions by the judge of the trial court are the following:

> "The Court: I think I will hear from the other side. It seems to me that all you have here is a suspicion. * * * I am free to say that I have a suspicion, but I am bound to instruct the jury that they cannot bring in a verdict against the defendant on suspicion. * * * The testimony put in is very suspicious; but, if it is true and correct, I don't see why it could not just as well have been his wife as the defendant. * * * I don't want to criticize you [the district attorney] at all, or the district attorney's office, for going on with the prosecution; * * * but, no matter what my suspicions may be, I cannot allow the case to go to the jury simply on suspicions. * * * If the jury convicted him [defendant] on that evidence, I would set it aside. * * * I don't believe, Mr. Works [deputy district attorney], I would be justified in going on. Of course, all I can do is to advise the jury. I suppose you [attorney for defendant] don't want to put in any evidence?"

With so much of a concurrence in the thought that the evidence of defendant's guilt as presented by the prosecution was of the weakest character, the question of the effect which any erroneous rulings, either in the admission of evidence against the defendant, or in the rejection of evidence presumably in his favor, assumes an aspect of the greatest importance. Dealing, then, with one of the propositions discussed in the majority opinion—that is to say, the third point raised by appellant to the effect that certain evidence offered by him was erroneously excluded by the trial court—the reporter's transcript of the proceedings had on the trial shows that he is of the Jewish religious faith, and that he followed "most all" of the religious rites and customs prescribed by his religion; that inside the house which was burned (although not entirely destroyed) defendant kept "the ten commandments," a "flag," and a silver "taless," the last of which being a present made to him by his father-in-law on the day of defendant's marriage; that "the ten commandments" was a religious relic about 100 years old, and that the "taless" (also a religious relic) was about 1,000 years old. As appears by the statement made in the majority opinion of this court, although defendant technically testified to the foregoing facts, objections by the prosecution to questions relating thereto were continually sustained by the judge of the trial court. His attitude with reference thereto was distinctly hostile, undoubtedly insinuating into the minds of the members of the jury the impression that such evidence was of no consequence and unworthy of consideration. Evidence as to the significance of such objects to defendant, or to any one of the Jewish faith, was entirely excluded by the trial court. For example:

"Q. to Defendant (by Attorney Murphy): Do you have any particular collects that are essential elements of your faith or religion?

"Mr. Works (Attorney for the People): Objected to as immaterial.

"The Court: Objection sustained. You went all over that the other day" (which last remark was in fact incorrect).

A reference to the reporter's transcript of the proceedings had on the trial of the action will illustrate the attitude of the trial court with relation to all such evidence:

"Mr. Murphy (Attorney for Defendant): I have it [the taless] here. I want to produce it. I intend to prove further on by competent witnesses what such a thing means to a man of that type.

"The Court: I don't believe that is competent.

"Mr. Murphy: I think it is.

"The Court: I don't think so.

"Mr. Works (Attorney for the People): I certainly object to it.

"The Court: Objection sustained."

The judge of the trial court also refused to permit defendant to introduce a witness (a Jewish rabbi) who, it is asserted by counsel for defendant, was the rabbi of the Jewish synagogue to which defendant belonged, and who was thoroughly qualified and competent to testify concerning the religious significance and value of the various relics which theretofore had been mentioned as having been left by defendant in the house at the time the fire started; that the rabbi would have testified to the effect that the relics in question were of such importance to the average Jewish layman that they were necessary accessories to all forms of prayer, and that the Jewish layman, without these relics, does not believe his prayers will reach the ears of the Deity to whom they are directed; and that the rabbi would have testified further that the orthodox Jew would rather lose his life than lose those relics.

The materiality of evidence with reference to the religious faith of defendant in each of the particular religious "collects" or "relics" which it was shown were in the house at the time it was burned, and the significance particularly attachable to such religious "relics" by an orthodox Jew, becomes apparent on consideration of the question of motive. Prior to the attempt or attempts on the part of defendant to introduce such evidence, the prosecution had endeavored to show motive in that the house which was burned was overinsured. Defendant was permitted to make some rebuttal of the facts advanced by the prosecution in support of that particular proposition; but in reason it is clear that defendant should not have been limited to a mere contradiction, in terms or otherwise, of the essential facts introduced by the prosecution which in the judgment of the district attorney tended to show motive in the defendant for the commission of the crime. The showing of motive was not a necessary element in the guilt of defendant. That was an incidental issue, injected into the case by the prosecution. But, having tendered it, such issue was subject to all the rules surrounding any other issue.

The prosecution vouchsafed a reason which it was thought actuated defendant in the commission of the offense. The defendant thereupon had the right not only to show the falsity of the facts suggesting the reason advanced by the prosecution, but as well to show that good reason existed for defendant's abstaining from the commission of the crime. If defendant could have shown that at the time the fire occurred he had $10,000 in currency in his home, and which currency would have been destroyed, had defendant not removed it from the house, it could scarcely be doubted that he would have had the right to show such fact, as opposing any evidence of motive on his part to burn his home for the insurance money of a much lesser amount, which would have become payable to him, had his home been destroyed by fire. On the trial of the action, in addition to the specific rebuttal by defendant to which reference has been had, and as tending to show that no motive could exist in him for burning his home, as hereinbefore indicated, he made several unsuccessful attempts to show that within the house at the time the fire occurred were these sacred "relics," which, because of his religious belief, were dearer to him than life itself.

As an inference therefrom it would seem most reasonable that if defendant had contemplated the burning of his house and that within that home were located certain precious objects of such religious significance that without their possession he could not hope for religious salvation, prior to setting fire to his home he would have taken the precaution to remove such objects to a place of safety. Not having done so, the further inference would follow that he did not set fire to his home. As the admitted evidence stood —that is to say, the mere fact that the religious "relics" were within the house at the time the fire occurred, with no explanation as to their import or significance to defendant—the undoubted effect was to deprive defendant of the benefit of a most substantial portion of his defense. Without an explanation of the significance of the "relics," which meant so much to defendant, they might as well have been so much junk, so far as the jury was concerned, because it cannot be presumed that the members of the jury were, or that any one of them was, versed in matters of that kind, or that they or he had even the slightest knowledge of the bearing which the loss of such "relics" would have upon the issue of motive which had been introduced into the case.

Considering the fact, as expressed by the trial judge, that "all you (the prosecution) have here is a suspicion" of defendant's guilt, it is impossible for me to agree with my brethren of the bench in their statement that the exclusion of the evidence to which reference has been had was of no material consequence and that it had no "important influence against the defendant." To the contrary, to my mind, it manifestly appears that—the extreme weakness of the case against defendant being considered—the probabilities are that, had such evidence been admitted, defendant would have been acquitted of the charge preferred against him. Prejudicial error affecting the substantial rights of the defendant having been shown, together with the affirmative conclusion that such error in all probability resulted in a miscarriage of justice, there is no room for the application of the provisions of the Constitution (section 4½, art. 6) affecting the question at issue. The liberty and good name of defendant were at stake, and in a decision of so great import the defendant should not be obliged to take any more of the "rough chances of the law" than have been thoroughly established and recognized in principle either by existing statutes or by adjudicated cases.

Another matter discussed in the main opinion herein, in the conclusion of which I am unable to concur, is that with reference to the "stipulation" by which "the court allowed a continuance of several hours in order that defendant might obtain the evidence of two witnesses." The so-called "stipulation" was entered into some time after 11 o'clock in the morning, and a recess of the court at that time was taken until the usual time for convening court in the afternoon, to wit, 2 o'clock p. m. So that whatever accommodation, or courtesy, or consideration was involved in the matter (the usual noon recess of two hours being deducted) amounted in reality to something less than one hour's time. It appears that, relying upon the time he thought the introduction of certain evidence would take, one of the attorneys for defendant excused a certain witness until 11 o'clock. As a matter of fact, the taking of the evidence which counsel had in mind occupied less time than he had estimated, with the result that defendant "ran out of witnesses." It is also shown that defendant had subpœnaed three witnesses to appear at 2 o'clock p. m., none of whom was present in court at the time the so-called "stipulation" was entered into. Counsel for defendant desired an early recess, in order that the witnesses might testify in defendant's behalf. A transcript of a part of the proceedings had with relation thereto is as follows:

"The Court: No, Mr. Dixon (the witness expected at 11 o'clock) I will not wait for. The only stipulation and condition under which I will continue this case until 2 o'clock is that those two women—you told me what they will testify—that those two women will be the only two witnesses you will call at that time; otherwise, you will go to the jury now.

"Mr. Ramey (Attorney for Defendant): Your honor, it is not our fault.

"The Court: It is your fault that Mr. Dixon is not here. Here comes this man strolling in here, and we have been waiting quite a while. * * * In my discretion I will give you time to get these two witnesses, on the condition that you will call no others at that time.

"Mr. Ramey: I think your honor is laboring under misapprehension as to the facts. We have no agreement with any of those witnesses, except Mr. Dixon, who was to be here at 11. All of the other witnesses have been in attendance, and have been in the courtroom during the entire trial until this morning, and we didn't know until we called them that they were not here.

"The Court: Mr. Dixon should have been here. He was to be here at 11 o'clock. Now, I don't care to take any further time. Are you willing to stipulate that?

"Mr. Ramey: We have subpœnaed also, your honor, one witness, the rabbi.

"The Court: When did you subpœna him?

"Mr. Ramey: Last night.

"The Court: And he is not here.

"Mr. Ramey: He was not subpœnaed to appear until 2 o'clock. That was our fault.

"The Court: Now, I will not allow you to put him on.

"Mr. Ramey: There is nothing more that I can say, your honor.

"The Court: All right. You had something to say. Will you agree to the court's condition, because if not, we are going on now? * * * You don't have to agree to that condition, but, unless you do, we are going on with the case. * * *

"The Court: We are going on with the rebuttal and the argument, unless you accept my conditions. * * * I am not going to allow Mr. Dixon to testify, and I am not going to let you make me talk much longer in hopes he will be in here. Now, I will ask you now, and I want an answer, do you stipulate to the condition I made?

"Mr. Ramey: Yes, your honor."

It thus conclusively appears that the so-called "stipulation" was brought about by means of a threat on the part of the judge of the trial court. In order that defendant be permitted to introduce the testimony proposed to be given by two witnesses, he was forced to agree that the testimony which might have been given in his behalf by two other important witnesses be left out of defendant's case. It would seem that a sense of justice, or at least a more liberal spirit of fairness to the defendant, on the part of the trial judge might have suggested to his mind the inequality of the "stipulation." The case should either have been open for all proper purposes to the defendant, or absolutely closed as to his defense. If the trial were to be continued for any reason it is clear that so far as defendant was concerned, all his rights in the premises should have been reserved to him and protected by the trial court. The defendant was either entitled to a short recess of the court, or he was not. If not, the case should have been closed, so far as further taking of testimony by the defendant was concerned. If he was entitled to a recess, then it should have been extended to him, without the penalty attached thereto of losing some of his valuable rights.

At any rate, it is plain that whatever fault was committed, it was not of the defendant personally. If within the judgment of the judge of the trial court some punishment ought to be inflicted, the penalty should have been visited, not upon the defendant personally, but upon the person, if any, who committed the fault. A stipulation is nothing more than a form of agreement, and an agreement which is induced by any form of menace, or by overreaching, or by taking advantage by one of the parties to the agreement of the necessities of the other, if not absolutely void, certainly is not such a "meeting of the minds" as is contemplated in a court of justice as fair and reasonable, especially where a trial judge in the course of a trial is one of the parties, and a helpless litigant, with his back to the wall, fighting for his liberty and good reputation, is the other party to the agreement. A stipulation made between such parties and in such circumstances would amount to nothing less than an order of the court. If, in the first instance, whether, pursuant to a motion made by the district attorney, or through the initiative of the judge of the trial court, an order of the character of the "stipulation" here under consideration had been made, its effectiveness from a legal standpoint as affecting the ultimate constitutional and statutory rights of the defendant might well be doubted.

Additional reasons, affecting other points raised by appellant, might be given for my failure to agree in the judgment herein; but to my mind sufficient has been said. By constitutional guaranty the defendant was entitled to a fair trial. In my humble opinion he did not get it.

With the greatest respect for the good judgment of my colleagues on the bench, I cannot agree with their conclusion that justice has been done.

PEOPLE v. SINGH.
(Cr. 1286.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 22, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑598(2)—Conclusion that motion for continuance to take depositions as foundation for alienists' opinions was not made in good faith and with due diligence held authorized.

Where defendant's counsel was in constant communication with him for two months before date of trial, and indicated about a month before such date that he would move for continuance, judge was authorized to determine that motion for continuance to take depositions of residents of foreign country as foundation for opinions as to defendant's insanity was not made in good faith and with due diligence.

2. Criminal law 🔑608—Denial of motion for continuance because of impracticability of locating witnesses of shooting held not abuse of discretion, in view of counter affidavits.

Denial of motion for continuance because of impracticability of locating witnesses of shooting held not abuse of discretion, in view of counter affidavits showing ease with which prosecution arranged for attendance of 12 such witnesses and practicability of discovering whereabouts of others.

3. Criminal law 🔑586, 1151—Granting continuance is within discretion of trial court and decision will not be disturbed, unless abuse clearly appears.

Granting of continuance rests in sound discretion of trial court, whose decision will not be disturbed, unless abuse of discretion clearly appears, though considerable indulgence and liberality generally should be exercised.

4. Criminal law 🔑589(2)—Refusal of continuance for defendant's illness held not reversible error.

Refusal of continuance, asked on ground that defendant was ill and could not be consulted by his counsel, held not reversible error, where court adjourned on such suggestion until following day when defendant had recovered, so far as shown by transcript, and no renewal of motion was made.

5. Criminal law 🔑1166½(8)—Denial of challenges to jurors, who stated they would follow court's instructions and accord impartial hearing on merits, held not reversible error.

Denial of challenges to jurors, who stated that they would follow court's instructions as to defenses presented and accord defendant impartial hearing on merits, held not reversible error, though parts of their examination left some question of their openness of mind toward him and defense of insanity, as to which he introduced no evidence; court's discretion not being clearly abused nor defendant harmed.

6. Criminal law 🔑130—Denial of oral motion for change of venue after exhaustion of peremptory challenges held not error (Pen. Code, § 1034).

Denial of oral motion for change of venue, after exhaustion of defendant's peremptory challenges, on ground that 52 of over 80 veniremen examined were excused for cause, showing that defendant could not have fair trial, held not error, in view of Pen. Code, § 1034, requiring written verified motion.

7. Criminal law 🔑438—Admission of photographs of scene of shooting, taken two days later, held not error.

Admission of photographs of scene of shooting taken two days later, without showing that surroundings then were identical with those at time of shooting, held not error; they being intended merely to illustrate, not as exact representations of conditions at time of shooting.

8. Witnesses 🔑282½.

Refusal to permit cross-examination of prosecution's witnesses as to matters elsewhere testified to by them, held not reversible error.

9. Criminal law 🔑369(1).

Evidence of defendant's commission of other offenses than those charged is generally inadmissible.

10. Criminal law 🔑1169(11)—Admission of evidence of defendant's attempt to kill another after killing deceased held not reversible error, where insanity was only defense.

Where insanity was only defense in murder trial, admission of evidence that defendant attempted to kill another after killing decedent held not reversible error; such evidence tending to support, rather than prejudice, such defense.

11. Criminal law 🔑406(7)—Defendant's statement that he "wasn't crazy," but "just mad," held admissible as admission.

In murder trial, wherein defense was insanity, defendant's statement to witness that he "wasn't crazy," but "just mad," was admissible as admission against interest.

12. Criminal law 🔑1036(1)—Defendant not objecting to questions to, nor examining witnesses testifying as to voluntary character of defendant's statements, cannot complain of admission thereof.

Defendant, not objecting to questions to witnesses who testified as to voluntary character of statements by defendant, nor examining witnesses on voir dire or cross-examination, waived such right and cannot complain of admission of such statements on ground that they were not shown to have been made voluntarily.

13. Criminal law 🔑406(3)—Voluntary character of mere admissions by defendant need not be shown.

That statements by defendant in nature of admissions, as distinguished from confession of guilt, were made without coercion or duress, need not be shown as foundation for their admission in evidence.

14. Criminal law 🔑1168(4)—Refusal to strike witness' reference to conversation with defendant as occurring "on night of murder" held not prejudicial error.

In murder trial, refusal to strike witness' reference to conversation with defendant as having occurred on "the night of the murder" held not prejudicial error, in view of vast amount of evidence of defendant's guilt.

15. Criminal law 🔑721½(1)—District attorney's argument as to defendant's examination of jurors concerning a defense which he "let go glimmering by" held not reversible error.

District attorney's statements, in argument to jury, that he had never before seen attorney question and excuse jurors on some defense for days, "and then let it go glimmering by," and that it was necessary for prosecution, because of their insanity plea, to have alienists and other witnesses present, held not reversible error; everything said by him being before jury, at least by inference.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Parker Singh was convicted of second degree murder, and from the judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 248 P. 986.

Edgar B. Hervey, of El Centro, and O. V. Willson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ernest R. Utley, Dist. Atty., and Lee Nuffer, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of El Centro, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of murder in the second degree, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Very briefly, from the evidence adduced at the trial, it appears that defendant had charge of the growing of a crop of lettuce on a large ranch belonging to a man named Victor R. Sterling, who was receiving financial assistance in the enterprise from one John B. Hager, in whose employ was a man by the name of William R. Thornberg. On March 31, 1925, some controversy occurred between defendant on the one side, and Hager and Thornberg on the other, regarding some detail of the work of harvesting the crop of lettuce. The next day Hager and Sterling had some further conversation and apparent difficulty with defendant, following which defendant fired a pistol at Sterling, who attempted to escape by running away, but who was pursued by defendant and by him killed by a second shot from the pistol near the place where the first shooting occurred. Defendant then ran after and overtook Hager, whom he also killed by shooting him with the pistol. Defendant then took an axe and with it crushed the heads of both Sterling and Hager. Immediately thereafter defendant drove a distance of five or six miles to a town where Thornberg was employed, and made an unsuccessful attempt to kill him by shooting him with the same pistol.

[1] The first assignment of prejudicial error by appellant is that of the denial by the lower court of defendant's motion for a continuance of the date of trial. From the affidavits (which include one made by defendant) filed in support of such motion, it appears that the principal defense upon which defendant expected to rely for an acquittal of the charge of murder which had been preferred against him was that of insanity; that he was a native of India, where his close relatives and most of his friends resided; that by the testimony only of such relatives and friends (proposed to be taken by deposition) would defendant be able to establish certain facts, including the life history and family history of defendant; that the father of defendant was afflicted with epilepsy (which it is alleged is a form of insanity); and that in a fit of insanity a brother of defendant had killed two or three named persons—all of which facts, together with the circumstances surrounding the killing of Sterling and Hager, were to be used as a foundation for an opinion or opinions as to the sanity of defendant, to be given through the testimony of alienists to be introduced by defendant on the trial of the action.

Defendant was arrested for the commission of the crime of which he was convicted on the same day on which the offense was committed. Five days thereafter he was indicted by the grand jury, and on his arraignment his trial was set at a date exactly two months after the date of the commission of the crime. It appears that on at least one occasion, approximately one month before the date of the trial, counsel for defendant stated to the judge of the trial court that he had "a motion to make in the above entitled case; * * * that he was sure his motion would be granted and that the above-entitled case would not be tried on June 1, 1925"—the date set for the hearing of the action.

So far as the record discloses, prior to the date of the trial, no motion other than that for a continuance was ever presented to the lower court; from which fact it may be deduced that the motion to which defendant's counsel referred was the one now under consideration. No affidavit is presented by an alienist that the facts which were expected to be proved by the witnesses testifying by deposition, together with the facts testified on the trial, would have resulted in the expression of an opinion that defendant was insane; nor is there any intimation by any such proposed expert witness that the evidence of the facts that defendant's father was afflicted with epilepsy, and that defendant's brother in a fit of insanity had slain three persons, in any way would have affected the determination of the question whether defendant was insane at the time when it is charged that he committed the offense set forth in the indictment. Notwithstanding allegations in the affidavits presented by defendant in support of the motion for a continuance of the date of trial, to the effect that counsel for defendant became acquainted with the facts relative to said family history of the defendant at a time within one week of the date of the presentation of the motion—from the fact, as appears from the affidavits, that counsel for defendant had been in constant communication with defendant ever since the day of his arrest, and consequently might have learned at a comparatively early date of the existence of the facts relative to defendant's said family history, together with the additional fact that approximately one month before the date of trial counsel for defendant had indicated that he would make a motion for a continuance—the judge of the trial court was authorized to determine that such motion, when presented, was not made in good faith, and that defendant had not exercised due diligence in presenting it.

[2] The motion for a continuance of the date of trial was also based upon certain facts which tended to show the impracticability of locating the witnesses who were present at the scene of the shooting when the crime was committed. Counter affidavits disclosed the ease with which the prosecution had arranged for the attendance at the trial of each of twelve witnesses whose names, in accordance with the provision of the statute, were indorsed on the indictment, and also showed the practicability of discovering the whereabouts of any other persons who were either present at, or in the vicinity of, the scene of the tragedy at the time of the commission of the offense.

[3] The law appears to be well established that, although as a general proposition considerable indulgence and liberality should be exercised, the granting of a continuance is a matter which rests in the sound discretion of the trial court, whose decision will not be disturbed unless it very clearly appears that such discretion has been abused. 5 Cal. Jur. 968–70, and cases there cited.

In the case of People v. Collins, 195 Cal. 325, 233 P. 97, it is said:

> "It is a settled rule of practice that an application for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be reviewed except for the most cogent reasons. The trial court is apprised of all the circumstances of the case and the previous proceedings, and is, therefore, better able to decide upon the propriety of granting the application than an appellate court; and when it exercises a reasonable, and not an arbitrary discretion, its action will not be disturbed. * * *"

An examination of the several affidavits presented to the trial court and appearing in the record herein fails to convince this court that any such abuse of discretion by the trial court is shown in its order in denying the motion.

[4] Appellant further complains of the refusal of the court to grant a motion for continuance made during the trial of the action on the ground that defendant was ill and could not be consulted by his counsel. The record on appeal, however, satisfactorily shows that on such suggestion being made by counsel for defendant, an adjournment of court was had until the following day, at which time, so far as appearances as disclosed by the transcript are concerned, defendant had recovered from his indisposition and was able to advise with his counsel. At any rate, no renewal of the motion was made, and it must be presumed that defendant suffered no hardship from the course pursued by the court.

[5] Objection is also registered by appellant because of the denial by the court of each of two challenges interposed by defendant to jurors who were sworn to try the cause. Although from a reading of certain parts of the examination of each of such jurors it would appear that there might be some question of his openness of mind toward defendant and his proposed defense of insanity, the concluding portion of such examination would clearly indicate that such juror would follow the instructions of the court with reference to any defense which might be presented by defendant, and that he would accord him a fair and impartial hearing on the merits of his case.

As a matter of fact, no evidence was introduced in behalf of defendant, and the defense of insanity was an issue in the case to the extent only that it was an arguable question arising solely from such inferences as might be deducible from facts presented by the prosecution, which, in the very nature of circumstances of the character of those surrounding the case, were exceedingly meager from a standpoint of actually establishing anything upon which a jury would be justified in reaching a conclusion in accordance with defendant's contention. Because of the discretion concededly vested in the trial court to determine the question of the fitness of a juror to serve, because no abuse of such discretion is apparent, and because, viewed from a practical standpoint, no harm resulted to defendant by reason of the action of the court in the premises, it must be concluded that appellant's position is unsustainable.

[6] Appellant complains of the action of the court in that after more than 80 veniremen had been examined touching their qualifications to serve as trial jurors in the cause, and after defendant had exercised all the peremptory challenges allowed him by the statute, the trial court denied an oral motion made by defendant for change of venue on the ground that 52 veniremen had been excused for cause, and, therefore, that it was apparent that defendant could not have a fair trial. No authorities are cited by appellant to sustain his position. On the other hand, the statute (section 1034, Penal Code) applicable to motions for change of venue, provides in part that such a motion must be made in writing, verified by the affidavit of the defendant, and a copy thereof served on the district attorney at least one day prior to the day of application. In the case of People v. Nolan, 34 Cal. App. 545, 167 P. 642, it is held that where such a motion is made orally and without the affidavit for which the statute provides, no error is committed by the court in denying the motion. See, also, People v. McGarvey, 56 Cal. 327. We are therefore unable to agree with appellant in his contention.

[7] It is next urged by appellant that the trial court erred to defendant's prejudice in admitting certain photographs in evidence over defendant's objection, for the reason that while the shooting occurred on April 1, 1925, the photographs of the scene thereof were not taken until two days later, and no foundation for the introduction of the photographs was laid by showing that the surroundings when the photographs were taken were identical therewith as of the time when the shooting took place. From a reading of the evidence herein relating to the photographs, it is clear that no claim was made at any time, nor could it have been understood by the jury, that the photographs were exact representations of conditions prevailing at the time when and the place where the tragedy occurred. The photographs were intended (as maps or diagrams might be used) merely for the purpose of illustrating the conditions present at the time in question. We are of the opinion that so considered no error was committed by the trial court. People v. Crandall, 125 Cal. 129, 133, 57 P. 785; People v. Phelan, 123 Cal. 551, 56 P. 424; People v. Mahatch, 148 Cal. 200, 82 P. 779; People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 P. 515; and see, generally 13 Cal. Jur. 710, 711.

[8] Certain errors are also specified relating to the refusal of the trial court to permit counsel for defendant to interrogate one of the witnesses introduced by the prosecution as to whether he had seen the shot fired by defendant or had heard such shot only. An examination of the reporter's transcript discloses the fact that the witness was elsewhere fully examined by defendant's counsel with reference to the point at issue. One question and answer will suffice:

> "Q. You heard the shot fired, but you didn't actually see him point the gun when he fired the shot, did you? A. I only heard the shot, was all."

It is therefore clear that appellant has no grounds for complaint.

[9, 10] Appellant also contends that prejudicial error was committed by the court in that, over objection by defendant, evidence was introduced which showed in substance that after defendant had killed Sterling and Hager, he went to the town of Calipatria and attempted to kill Thornberg. It appears that Hager was the manager of the Certified Fruit Company and that Thornberg was an employé thereof; that defendant regarded Hager and Thornberg as partners; that on three or four occasions on the afternoon of the day of the killing and preceding the assault made on Thornberg, defendant drove his automobile very slowly past the business office in which Thornberg was employed—the defendant "looking into the office each time as he went by." Finally, in the words of Thornberg:

> "I was standing there, and I noticed Parker Singh (defendant) drive up in front of the office > and cut straight across the street. He didn't go to the corner and turn around the button. He stepped out of the car and stepped up on the edge of the curb and said, 'God damn you, Thornberg, I am going to kill you,' and he pulled a gun out of his back pocket and I closed in on him, and he shot as I closed in on him."

The general rule (with some exceptions) is that evidence of the commission of offenses other than those charged in the information or indictment is inadmissible. On the theory that evidence of the assault by defendant on Thornberg was directed toward the showing of malice, motive, or guilty intent on the part of defendant as affecting the crime of which he was charged, it is readily conceivable that such evidence might be admissible. People v. Selby (Cal. App.). See People v. Selby (Cal. Sup.) 245 P. 426.[1] The evidence in the instant case was convincing as to the guilt of defendant—in fact, no claim is presented by appellant to the contrary. Judging from the record before this court as hereinbefore indicated, the only defense suggested by defendant was that he was insane at the time the crime was committed. Such being the case, evidence that in addition to killing Sterling and Hager, defendant had also attacked Thornberg, far from being prejudicial to a defense of insanity, might be considered as supporting it. Indeed, if without provocation defendant had also assaulted or attempted to kill a dozen or more people, such a circumstance might have presented a sound basis for argument that the insanity of defendant was an established fact. Having in mind, therefore, the defense upon which defendant relied for an acquittal of the charge preferred against him, it is somewhat difficult to understand how or in what manner evidence of what from one viewpoint might be considered as an insane act on the part of defendant, could be prejudicial to his case. But, to adopt the language used by the Supreme Court of this state in the Selby Case (245 P. 426, 429):

> "In any event, even if it be assumed the rulings complained of were erroneous, we think that the errors were not sufficiently prejudicial to appellant to justify a reversal, in view of all the evidence in the case and that it tended to support his claim that he was insane."

Appellant suggests a question of error in that defendant was not permitted to have answered a certain question which had been propounded to one of the witnesses introduced by the prosecution. An examination of the transcript of the record on appeal discloses the fact that no harm resulted to defendant by reason of such action of the court, for the reason that elsewhere in the cross-examination of such witness the matter embraced in defendant's question had been fully covered. From a practical standpoint, the same thing is true with reference to the additional specifications of error predicated upon the refusal of the trial court to permit a witness to answer a certain impeaching question which was put by defendant to one of the witnesses for the people. While the question might well have been answered, the situation which apparently was sought to be shown had been adequately presented through other testimony given by the same witness, with the result that no substantial injury was suffered by defendant from the action of the trial court.

[11] Appellant complains that defendant was prejudiced in his rights because the trial court denied his motion to strike out a part of an alleged conversation had between one of the witnesses and the defendant. The witness stated:

> "I don't remember now just all of it, but I remember him saying that he wasn't crazy. That is the first thing he said—that he wasn't crazy; that he was just mad."

We are unable to agree with appellant in his contention. The witness was attempting to give the substance of the conversation. If defendant made a statement that he "wasn't crazy," but that he was "just mad," it constituted an admission against interest which the jury had a right to take into consideration in making up its verdict.

[12, 13] Appellant further contends that a sufficient foundation was not laid for admitting certain statements made by defendant, in that it was not shown that the defendant was not under either coercion or duress, nor that such several statements were made freely and voluntarily. But it appears that each of the several witnesses testified in exact terms covering the identical parts of the foundation which appellant suggests were lacking. If for any reason defendant was dissatisfied with the conclusive character of either the question or the answer, the opportunity was open to him to correct such answers either through the medium of objection to such questions, by examination of the witnesses on voir dire, or through the ordinary channel of cross-examination. Having waived that right, he is in no position to complain. But, aside therefrom, it is not contended that the statements made by defendant amounted to confessions of guilt, but to the contrary, that they were concededly only in the nature of admissions. In such circumstances the rule appears to be well settled that no foundation of the nature of that required for the admission in evidence of a confession was necessary. People v. Parton, 49 Cal. 632; People v. Le Roy, 65 Cal. 613, 4 P. 649; People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 50 P. 15.

[14] Because one of the witnesses in the course of the testimony given by him referred to a certain conversation between him and defendant as having occurred on "the night of the murder," appellant feels aggrieved and specifies the refusal by the trial court to grant his motion to strike such remarks from the record as prejudicial error. While it may be that the court should have acceded to defendant's request in that regard, yet even though it may be assumed as error, considering the vast amount of evidence of defendant's guilt, the inference deducible from the remark to which reference has been had was of such small importance that we are constrained to hold that defendant's cause was not seriously affected thereby.

[1] On hearing in Supreme Court after decision of District Court of Appeal.

[15] Misconduct by the district attorney is specified as error by appellant in that, in the course of the argument before the jury, the district attorney used the following language:

> "Mr. Hervey (attorney for defendant) says, 'Oh, gentlemen of the jury, if you have any blame, don't blame the defendant, blame it on us.' I think there is plenty of blame, and there is room for plenty of blame in this case, and plenty of blame on him. Never before in all my life did I ever see an attorney question, for days and days, jurors, and excuse jurors on some defense, and then let it go glimmering by. By reason of their insanity plea, it was necessary for the prosecution, in order to be properly prepared in this case, to have alienist witnesses here, and other witnesses, and putting the county to a large expense by this insanity plea that—"

The record shows that timely objection thereto was made by counsel representing defendant; that misconduct was specified; and that the court declined to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks made by the district attorney to which we have referred. But assuming that appellant is right in his contention and that error was thus committed, when it is considered that everything said by the district attorney to which exception is taken was before the jury, at least by inference, it becomes difficult to understand how any damage to defendant's cause resulted because of such statement. At most, it cannot be said that either such error, nor any nor all of the errors committed in the course of the trial, resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

PEOPLE v. SINGH. (Cr. 1328.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 22, 1926.)

1. Criminal law 🔑656(8)—Judge's statement that no further evidence of what caused death was required held prejudicial error as indicating his belief that defendant killed in manner stated by witness.

In murder trial, trial judge's remark on objection that no sufficient foundation was laid for question to witness as to whether deceased's wounds were sufficient to cause death, that "I don't think it requires any further evidence than that he found a man's skull crushed and his brains dashed out," held prejudicial error, as indicating judge's belief that defendant killed deceased with ax after shooting him, as witness had testified.

2. Criminal law 🔑656(5)—Judge's statement that state's witness' testimony on defendant's former trial for another murder did not tend to impeach him held prejudicial error.

In murder trial, trial judge's statement that he knew that state's witness' testimony on defendant's former trial for another murder did not tend to impeach him, held prejudicial error as probably affecting weight of remainder of his testimony in juror's minds.

3. Criminal law 🔑656(9)—Judge's remark, "After he had exhibited a gun," following statement of defendant's attorney that witness said that two men jumped on defendant, held harmless.

Judge's remark, "After he had exhibited a gun," following statement of defendant's attorney that witness said that two men jumped on defendant, held harmless to defendant as capable of explanation as statement merely that witness said that defendant had exhibited gun.

4. Criminal law 🔑656(9)—Judge's statements that defendant's counsel had not proved certain fact, that he had no case if he had no more evidence, and that evidence of defendant's good reputation was immaterial, held prejudicial error.

In murder trial, judge's statements to defendant's counsel that "You haven't proved that anybody jumped on him," that if defendant had no more evidence he had no case, and that testimony as to defendant's good reputation was immaterial before any evidence of self-defense was offered, held prejudicial error.

5. Criminal law 🔑1166½(12)—Damaging effects of remarks, indicating judge's conviction that defendant had introduced no legal defense, held not removed by instructions to disregard court's expressions of opinion.

Trial judge's instructions that jury was sole judge of evidence and should disregard any seeming expression of opinion thereof by court held insufficient to remove damaging effects of remarks, indicating conviction that no legal defense had been introduced by defendant.

6. Criminal law 🔑1129(1)—Failure to assign court's misconduct in making remarks, harmful effect of which cannot be obviated by retraction or instruction, does not affect defendant's rights.

Failure to assign court's misconduct in making objectionable remarks of such character that harmful effect could not be obviated by retraction or instruction does not affect defendant's rights.

7. Homicide 🔑188(6)—Exclusion of evidence that deceased, to defendant's knowledge, was in habit of carrying gun and had threatened several persons with it, held prejudicial error.

In murder trial, exclusion of evidence that deceased, to defendant's knowledge, was in habit of carrying a gun and had threatened several persons with it several times within month before his death, held prejudicial error, though evidence was immaterial on issue of insanity.

Parker Singh was convicted of first degree murder, and he appeals. Reversed.

Edgar B. Hervey, of El Centro, and O. V. Willson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ernest R. Utley, Dist. Atty., of El Centro, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction of murder in the first degree, from which resulted a sentence of life imprisonment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Very briefly, from the evidence adduced at the trial it appears that defendant had charge of the growing of a crop of lettuce on a large ranch belonging to a man named Victor R. Sterling, who was receiving financial assistance in the enterprise from one John B. Hager, in whose employ was a man by the name of William R. Thornberg. On March 31, 1925, some controversy occurred between defendant on the one side and Hager and Thornberg on the other regarding some detail of the work of harvesting the crop of lettuce. The next day Hager and Sterling had some further conversation and apparent difficulty with defendant, following which defendant fired a pistol at Sterling, who attempted to escape by running away, but who was pursued by defendant and by him killed by a second shot from the pistol near the place where the first shooting occurred. Defendant then ran after and overtook Hager, whom he also killed by shooting him with the pistol. Defendant then took an ax and with it crushed the heads of both Sterling and Hager. Immediately thereafter defendant drove a distance of 5 or 6 miles to a town where Thornberg was employed and made an unsuccessful attempt to kill him by shooting him with the same pistol.

[1] Appellant's first assignment of error is that, to the prejudice of defendant, the judge of the trial court was guilty of misconduct during the trial in that it having been proved that defendant had shot John B. Hager and afterward had struck him on the head with an ax as he lay on the ground, a witness was asked if the wounds so inflicted upon the body of Hager were sufficient to have caused death, to which question counsel for defendant objected on the ground that no sufficient foundation had been laid. Whereupon the judge of the trial court remarked:

> "I think that would be a matter requiring technical evidence; but so far as the other wounds are concerned, I don't think it requires technical evidence. I don't think it requires any more evidence than you already have in. I don't think it requires any further evidence than that he found a man's skull crushed and his brains dashed out, as to what caused his death."

Defendant excepted to the remarks of the judge of the trial court and requested that the jury be instructed to disregard such remarks, which request was by the court denied. Although another witness testified to facts from which the jury might have inferred that Hager was dead at the time his head was crushed with the ax, the witness, who was testifying at the time of the remarks to which objection was made, later testified that "if he (Hager) had been alive up until the time his head was crushed, then that might have caused his death," and a physician testified that such crushing of the skull would cause instant death.

The prejudice which resulted to defendant's cause by reason of the statement made by the judge was that it may have been taken by the jury as an indication of a belief in the mind of the judge that the blow struck by the ax in the hands of defendant was the cause of Hager's death—the effect of which, so far as the comment by the judge of the trial court on the facts of the case was concerned, was that in the opinion of such judge they showed that after defendant had shot Hager and while he was lying helpless, defendant had killed him by striking him on the head with an ax. The effect of the remark was further prejudicial in that it tended to show a belief in the mind of the judge of the trial court that the death of Hager resulted from malice aforethought, as indicated by the willful, deliberate, and premeditated act of defendant in crushing Hager's head with an ax after he had fallen from the pistol shot—thus affecting defendant's right to have the jury determine, first, whether defendant was guilty of any crime; and, secondly, if at all guilty, what degree of murder; or, if not murder, whether manslaughter had been committed by defendant in killing Hager by shooting him.

[2] The second charge of misconduct on the part of the judge of the trial court consists in that, at a time when counsel for defendant were attempting to impeach a witness introduced by the prosecution by reading to such witness a portion of certain testimony given by him on the trial of defendant for the murder of Victor R. Sterling, in response to an objection thereto by the district attorney to the effect that such former testimony of the witness did not tend to impeach him, the trial judge said:

> "I know that it does not tend to impeach the testimony of this witness."

An exception thereto was taken by counsel for defendant and a request made to the court that it instruct the jury to disregard the statement. An examination of the record would lead to the conclusion that at least some inconsistencies existed in the two statements of the witness to which reference has been had—notwithstanding which, the probability is that the statement made by the trial judge referred to nothing more than the absence, in his opinion, of an impeaching quality in the offered evidence—just as would have been inferable from a ruling by him of "objection sustained." The particular testimony given by the witness, in connection with the remark made by the judge of the trial court, was of itself of no great importance. It is possible, though scarcely probable, however, that the remark made by the trial judge may have produced an effect upon the minds of the jurors so far as the remainder of the testimony given by the witness was concerned, and thus may have adversely affected the defense of defendant.

[3] A third specification of misconduct on the part of the trial judge is that at a time when defendant was endeavoring to introduce evidence to the effect that Hager was known to carry a "gun"; that he had threatened other persons with a "gun"; and that prior to the time when Hager was killed such facts had been communicated to defendant—and in connection with such attempt to introduce said testimony, counsel for defendant had stated that evidence had already been introduced showing that Hager had "jumped at, or toward, or on defendant," and the judge of the trial court remarked, "after he (defendant) had exhibited a gun"—to which remark counsel for defendant excepted and requested an instruction to the jury that it disregard same.

Without reference at this time to the question of the admissibility of the proposed evidence, it is nevertheless apparent that a bald statement by the judge of the trial court, in substance that Hager had jumped at, or toward, or on defendant after defendant had exhibited a "gun," if considered as made gratuitously and without consideration of either the context or the circumstances surrounding the making of such remark, would constitute a comment by the court on the evidence in the case which might injuriously affect defendant's defense or self-defense, or weigh with the jury in the determination of the degree of murder, or whether manslaughter only had been committed by defendant. But in connection with the statement of which complaint is made, the transcript of the proceedings had on the trial of the action shows, among other things, the following:

> "Mr. Hervey (attorney for defendant): It is already in evidence that the two men jumped at or towards Parker Singh. The witness said 'jumped on Parker Singh,' whatever that may be.
> "The Court: After he had exhibited a gun."

With even so much of an explanation the language of the judge of the trial court is capable of the explanation that the judge was merely saying that the witness said "after he had exhibited a gun," and not that the defendant had exhibited a gun. So viewed, it is clear that the remark credited to the trial judge resulted in no harm to the defendant.

[4] In connection with the specification of misconduct last considered and as a part of the same incident, appellant directs attention to alleged additional judicial misconduct in that after some considerable discussion was had among counsel and the court, the trial judge stated that, "you haven't proved that anybody jumped on him"; to which remark defendant excepted and made the usual request that the jury be instructed to disregard it, but to which request no attention was paid by the trial court. Immediately thereafter and following a direction by the court for counsel to "proceed with the case," counsel for defendant stated, "If your honor is going to exclude all of the evidence, I don't know whether we have any case or not;" to which statement the judge of the trial court rejoined, "If you haven't any more than that, you haven't." Furthermore, in the course of the trial defendant introduced a witness by whom he was endeavoring to prove the general reputation of defendant in the community in which he lived "as a peaceful, law-abiding citizen." In sustaining an objection to testimony of such nature, the trial judge said:
